A Consul. The Athenian Embassadors likewise were at this assembly. And first the Macedonians (with whom a league was but lately concluded, and therefore freshest in remembrance) had audience, who said, "They had no new matter to speak of, seeing there was no new occurrence and business fallen out: only this, that upon what motives and considerations they were entered into an accord and peace with King Philip, (as having experience that the alliance with the Romans never did them good) for the very same they should maintain it still, being once concluded & confirmed. Or, love ye rather (quoth one above the rest of the Embassadors) to imitate the Romans licentiousnes or their levity, I know not whether? who, as they gave order and commandment, that your Embassadors being at Rome, should receive their dispatch and answer in these terms: Come ye now to us indeed my masters of Erolia, when without our consent and warrant ye have made peace with Philip: so likewise at this present are ready to require that ye should band with them, and war upon Philip. They pretended aforetime that they took arms against him, by occasion of you, in your quarel and defence; & now they forbid you to be in peace with Philip. At first, they entred into Sicily for to aid and succour Messana. A second time they went thither to set free and deliver Syracuse out of the oppression of the Carthaginians. And now at this time they hold in possession both Messana and Syracuse: and all Sicily entire they have made it tributary, yea, and reduced it into the form of a Province, to be ruled under their sword, and the jurisdiction of their Deputies and Magistrates. In good faith, I assure you, that as ye according to your laws & customes hold your Diets & Councils at Naupactum, by your own Magistrates elected and created among your selves, wherein ye have liberty to make choice both of friends and enemies whom ye will and to entertain either peace or war at your pleasure: so, writs are sent out to the States of Sicily for their knights and burgeses, to assemble in Parliament at Syracuse, at Messana, or Lilybaum. And the Roman Pretor it is and no other that summoneth them thither, as also to their Assises and Sessions: at his commandment & not otherwise they are cited to general Councils. Him they see sitting on high in his tribunal seat, guarded with Lictors, attended upon with Ushers, there to hear and determine causes, and from aloft to pronounce hard sentences and proud awards. His rods threaten their backs and sides, his axes are ready to chop their heads from their shoulders: & from year to year new Lords still they choose and send among them. And this dealing, none of them either can or ought to marvel at: for why? they see Cities of Italy, by name Rhegium, Tarentum, and Capua, (to speak nothing of their neighbour Towns by whose fall they arose, by whose ruins Rome grew mighty) subject likewise to the same rule and government. As for Capua, the very sepulcher and tomb of the Comitanion (now that the natural people thereof are either dead and buried, or driven out as exiled persons) remaineth at this day as a monster and wonder in nature, resembling a headless and limbleless dismembred trunk of a body: a Town (I say) without Senat, without Commonalty, without Magistrates: where more cruelty was shewed, in leaving it to it self thus abandoned, and in this manner to be inhabited, than if it had been clean rased and laid even with the ground. Meer folly it is and without all sense and reason, to believe or hope, that if these strangers and aliens born (who differ more from us in language, in customes and laws, than they are distant and disjoyned by space between of land and sea) be once seized and possessed of these places, that any thing will continue long entire in the present state. The Kingdom of Philip (ye will say) is a block in your way and seemeth to prejudice your freedom & liberties: yet he being made your heavy friend, and that through your own fault and desert, required no other thing at your hands for amends, but peace: and even now desireth nought else but your alleageance, and the faithful observance of the same. Acquaint forein legions once with this your countrey: you take the yoke of servitude upon your necks for ever. Accept the Romans once for your Lords: too late it will be then and in vain for you, to seek Philip again, and with him your ally. Small matters and momentary occasions may well cause the Aetolians, Acarnanians and Macedonians, (men of one language) to fall out, and as slender motives, will soon make them friends again: a little thing setteth them at a jar, and as little bringeth them in tune. But all Grecians both are and ever will be at war with Barbarians: enemies they are by nature, which is perpetual and immurable: and not by occasions which alter every day. But where I began my speech, there will I leave & make an end. In this very place you the same men, agreed three years past to have peace with Philip: and the self-same Romans as they disliked then & disfavoured that peace, so now they wil needs disquiet and trouble it after it is once passed and accorded. And since the case still is all one, and fortune hath made no alteration, I see no reason why ye should vary and change your minds.

After the Macedonians, the Athenians entred in place, for the Romans were well contented therewith, and would needs have it so: "These Athenians having suffered many wrongs and indignities at the Kings hands, had juster cause of complaint, and more reason to inveigh and aggrave matter against his cruelty and outrageous dealings. First, they bewailed the piteous spoil & miserable lackage of their territories: neither complained they so much and found themselves grieved in that they had sustained harms and suffered hostility from an enemy, (for there be certain laws and rights belonging unto war, by vertue whereof, to give and take, to suffer harm and to do harm interchangeably is an ordinary matter and allowable: As for example, the burning of standing corn in the field, rasing and pulling down of houses, harrying and driving of booties both of men and carvail, rather piteous calamities, than shameful indignities to endure.) But this is the point say they, and hereof we complain, That he who termed the Romans,

The Oration
of the Roman Embassadors.

"strangers born, and barbarous, hath so polluted and violated at once all laws of God and man:
"so as in his former rode and expedition he seemed to make most impious war with the infernal "Gods and Spirits beneath: and in the second, with the heavenly powers and Gods above. All "the monuments and tombs within their confines are defaced and destroyed: the dead in their "graves are all laid bare, not so much as the bones of any one lie covered with mould. Temples
"we had and Chappels, which, as in times past when our ancestors inhabited those small holds,
"hamlets and villages, they consecrated and hallowed: so when they were reduced into one City,
"and enrolled into wards and parishes, they forsook not nor abandoned altogether. Rounda"bout these sacred Churches hath Philip set fire, and consumed all: the holy images of the Gods,
"lie some scorched and half burnt: others headless and dismembred, among the pillars and posts "of the Temples thrown along on the ground. And look what ioul work he hath made in the "country of Attica, so rich and so beautifully adorned in times past, the like havoc it he might "be let alone, would he make in Etolia and in all Greece throughout. For had not the Romans "come in time to succour, our very City also had been so served and piteously disfigured. For
"with like mischievous intent came he to the City which worshipped those Gods, not sparing
"the goddess Minerva, the patroness and protectress of our Town and Castle: the same wicked "mind he carried against the Temple of Ceres Eleusina: and no better affected was he to Jupiter
"and Minerva in Pyreum. But being repulled by force and arms not only from our Temples, "but also from the walls of our City, he wreaked his anger and raged against those Chappels and "religious houses, which had nothing for their defence, but only the reverent regard of the Gods, "whereof he had none. Hereupon, they prayed and humbly beought the Etolians, to have com"passion of the Athenians, and to enterprise the war, under the conduct first of the immortal "Gods, and then of the Romans, who next to the Gods are most powerful and mighty. Then "the Roman Embassadors spake in this wise. "The Macedonians first, and after them the Athe"nians, have altered the whole course and form of my speech. For, whereas my coming hither
"was to complain of the injuries done by Philip to so many Cities of our allies and associates, the "Macedonians by accusing the Romans first, have put me so hardly to my shifts, that I need ra"ther to employ my wits in making a defence of our selves, than in framing an accusation against "others. The Athenians again in reckoning up and recounting the impious, abominable, and in"human parts of King Philip committed against the Gods, both above and beneath, what have
"they left behind for me or any man else to object against him besides? What they have said,
"you may well think, and truly suppose, that the men of Chios, Abydos, Enus, Maronea, Tbasos, "Paros, Samos, Larissa and Messene: those also here of Achaia, complain of the same, yea, and
"of more grievous and cruel enormities: as whom he had greater means to annoy and hurt. As "for such things as he hath laid to our charge, if they deserve not honor and glory, I confess they "cannot be answered and defended. Reproached us he hath with Rhegium, with Capua, and Sy"racuse. I cannot deny, but during the war of Pyrrhus we sent a legion to Rhegium, there to lie "in garrison at the instant prayer of the Rhegians themselves, who requested us to lend them.
"This legion I confess, most wickedly and treacherously seized upon the City, and possessed it "to their own use, for the guard and defence whereof they were first sent. A vowed we (I pray "you) that act of theirs? Nay, pursued we not by arms that lewd legion and ungrateful? and "when we had them in our power and at our devotion forced not we them to make amends and "satisfaction to our allies, with the smart of their back and sides, and with the loss of their heads "in the end? And when we had so done, restored we not unto the Rhegians their City, their "Lands, all their goods whatsoever together with their liberties, franchises, and laws? As for "the Syracusians, when they were oppressed by strange and foreign tyrants, we judging it to be a "great indignity, relieved and succoured them: and after we had been (for three years space al"most) wearied and toiled out with continual siege and incessant assault both by land and sea of "their City, so exceeding strong and so well fortified: we seeing that the Syracusians themselves
"made choice rather to be in servitude under those tyrants, than to be taken by us, gave them "their City again both forced and freed by the same armies. Neither deny we that Sicily is our "Province: and that the Cities which took part and sided with the Carthaginians: & jointly with "them accorded to wage war against us, are tributaries unto us, and pay us yearly rents and pen"sions: nay, we are so far from not taking this upon us, that contrary-wise we would, that both
"you and all nations besides well knew, that every one received at our hands that measure of for"tune that he duly deserved. And now as touching the Capuans, should we repent that we have
"chastised them in such sort, whereof they themselves verily can not complain? These men, after "we had maintained war against the Samnites in their quarrel and defence, for the space well near
"of seventy years, to no small dispende of ours, and with many a loss and overthrow, after we had "linked them unto us, first by league and alliance, then by marriage and affinity, and last of all, by "freedom and burgesie of our City: these men I say, in our adversity, were the first all other "nations of Italy, that villanously massacred our garrison there, and revolted unto Annibal: and "then for very spite and indignation that they were by us besieged, sent Annibal to assault the City "of Rome. And if we had proceeded in that rigour against them, that we had left neither City "standing nor any one person of them living, who could take offence thereat, and justly say, That "they had been more hardly entreated and dealt withal than they deserved? There were more of "them, that upon touch and prick of guilty conscience for their lewd and wicked deeds, made

A them, thus we are to punish them severely to daunt and put to death; for the more we look from them, more their Terms are to be feared of their possessions and living, yet for as we left them poor and in obsequy and plagues dwelling; the guilds of Towns which we suffered to stand full of life and sound, that who do such in this day forth in; can not find the way to be they of a City, nor in a day or more. But what speak I of Trayne? seeing we have Trayne into us, and a City, conquered and subdued both peace and all liberty. Inasmuch as we have could rather to be ruled by confidence and our willings to pardon those whom we have yet Trayne, we have seen from many more to be in hold as to this the peace and the form of warfare. And thus I had no by inference of our lives. Now for what I have to speak AGAIN, Trayne, which horrible murders committed upon those of this Trayne, even his deeds, and his death, to look big and unbridled in (more Trayne and Trayne in manner than his Trayne) yet know how much he is to be feared of Trayne. As for you, my dear Trayne, we have for this time begun war with Trayne, and you again without us have concluded peace with him. It may be you will object; that while we were occupied in the Punish us, we were forced and compelled to take such conditions of peace at his hands, who was the stronger. We know it (providing good and affairs and troubles) for bare to profe-rre and sell our honour in which by your self was laid down and given over. At this present time by the grace and goodness of the Gods, the Danick war is come to an end, both we have employed and befall our lives against Trayne, and you have good occasion and opportunity offered to become to any way and alliance with us, lest you fall rather perill with Trayne, than you with the Romans. And I should be glad to see you bid him, and if he be not

When the Roman Ambassador had ended this Oration, the Aetolians generally were dismissed and directed to the Roman camp, but Demostratus their Pretor (corrupted at the speech went with a inn of money received from King Philip, and made for him) gave silent notice to the one party nor the other, but said, "That in councils of great weight and importance, there was nothing more hurtful and prejudicial than haste for appearance of the follow it never so soon, when a thing is once done, yet is somewhat late and bootless nor considering, that such councils can not be revoked, hasty and headlong courses cannot possibly be recalled, nor matters once past be reduced again to their former state." As for the proper time of that resolution now in hand, whereof my self am of advice, that the due maturity & multiplicity should be observed, might now at this present be set down and concluded upon. For seeing that by laws & ordinances provided it is, that we may not treat of any affairs concerning peace or war, but in the general councils called Panetolick or Pylaike, therefore for the present I would have you to ordain and decree, that your Pretor without fraud or guile might call and hold a general court of Parliament, whensoever he is minded so to treat of war or peace; and whatsoever things and more may be proposed and determined, it may stand in as good force, strength, & virtue, as if it had passed in a full Panetolick or Pylaike council. Thus the Ambassador being dismissed and sent away for silence, and nothing decided and concluded, he said, That he had performed a singular piece of service to his nation and country. For now they would side and take part with those, whose fortune it were to speed better in the field. Thus went matters in the assembly of the Aetolians.

* Panetolium: A general council, where the States of Ætolia were assembled.

* Pylæicum concilium: Another Diet holden at Thermopylae, where the States of Greece or Amphibylones met, and sent each one their deputy or agent, called Pylagoras.

Now Philip with all diligence prepared for war both by sea and land. His sea forces he assembled together unto Demetrius a port in Thessaly, making account, that Antiochus and the Roman fleet would in the beginning of the next spring depart from Adria. Over his navy and all the sea coasts he appointed Heraclides Admiral, like as he had done aforetime. Himself levied and gathered his land forces, supposing verily that he had debarred and bereft the Romans of two great means of aid, to wit, the Etolians of the one side, and the Dardaniens of the other; in that the narrow freights and passage of Pelagania, was stopped and made sure against them by his son Perseus. The Consul on the other side made not preparations for war, but was on foot and in action already, conducting his army through the confines of the Dassaretians, and transporting with him one of his wintering harbor all the provision of grain, whereof the country yielded him sufficient to the maintenance of his soldiers. The great Towns and Villages were surrendered unto him, partly for love and partly for fear: some were forced by assault, others abandoned by the inhabitants, and were found desolate by reason that the barbarous people were retired into the mountains near by, to save themselves; and at Leugim near the river Drinus he encamped, from whence he sent to purvey for corn out of the garners and barns of the Dassaretians. Philip saw well enough that the country about was in a hurry, and the people in great fear and fright; but being uncertain to what place the Consul intended to march, he sent out a cohort of light horsemen as espials to discover what way the enemies took, and whither they pretended to go. The Consul likewise for his part was as doubtful: well he wist that Philip was dislodged from the places where he had wintered, but in what quarter he journeyed, he knew not; and therefore he also had set forth certain horse in espial to scour the coasts. These two bands or troops from divers and contrary parts, encountered in the end in one way, after they had a long time wandered at adventure through the country of the Dassaretians. Both parts knew well by the noise they heard so far off, as well of men as horse, that the enemies approached; and therefore they had both horse & men in readiness, before they were in sight one of another; for so soon as ever they were within their enter view, they made no stay, but charged immediately and joyned issue. It fortuned, that for number and valour both, they were equally matched, and being choise and elect men of either side, whereupon they fought for certain hours like, until such time as their own weariness and the faintness of their horses put ted the battail in doubtful victory. Of the Macedonians there died 20 horsemen: and of the Romans five and thirty. And for all this neither brought the Macedonians any better successe to their King, nor the Romans to their Consul, of the place where the combats were fought. But certain fugitive traitors gave advertisement thereof: who commonly in all wars upon a winning head and light humour that naturally they have, are given to hearken after news, and to enquire in what terms enemies stand. Philip imagining that it would avail some what both to purchase the affectionate love of his souldiers, and also to induce them more cheerfully and bravely to undertake all hazards for his sake, in case he seemed to have a careful regard to bury those horsemen which were slain in the journey and expedition aforesaid: commanded their bodies to be brought into the camp, to the end that all men might see what honour he did them in their funerals. But see how nothing is more uncertain, nor whereof a man may make less reckoning than the minds and affections of the multitude. That which was thought would have made them more willing and forward to enter into any danger and jeopardy whatsoever, even that, wrought a contrary effect, and caused them to be both fearful and backward. For they who were used to fight with Greeks and Illyrians, and to see mens bodies wounded with push of pike, galled with arrows, and pierced with lance here and there, in this or that part: after they beheld once their fellows so burthenly mangled with the Spanish curtelaxes and cutting swords, the arms cut away from the body, the heads either smitten clean off by the neck, or cloven down right, and lying on the floun-ders: their patches ripe with the bowels open, and guts drawing after: with other deep wounds and broad slashes, most hideous and fearful to behold: then they saw all full well (fearful creatures as they were) what manner of weapons, and what kind of men they were to deal against. Nay the King himself was terribly afraid, who had not as yet encountered with the Romans in any set field.

 Whereupon he sent for his son to come back with the garrison that he had in the streights of Pa-lagania, thereby to increase and strengthen his own forces: and so laid open the way into Macedonia, for Plauratus and the Dardanians. Himself in person with a power of 20000 foot, and 4000 horse, guided by the fugitives aforesaid, marched toward the enemy, and about a quarter of a mile or somewhat less from the Roman camp, possessed himself of a little hill neer to Atabacum, which he fortified with trench and rampier. From whence, when he beheld the Romans encamped hard under him, he wondered (by report) to see not only the whole body of the camp, with the form and order thereof in general, but also how every part was ranged and set out in several both in the manner of quartering and pitching their pavilions, and also in the proportion of the wayes for breadth and length between. And having viewed and considered every thing accordingly: Believe me (said he) there is no man who seeth this, that can either think or say, it is the camp of a barbarous nation. For two daies space the Consul and the King (expecting one anothers attempts and enterprises) kept their souldiers close within their holds. When the third day was come, the Roman General brought forth his whole power into the field. But the King fearing to hazard all, so soon upon a cast, drew forth 400 Triballians (which were, as we have said elsewhere, of the Illyrian nation) and 300 Cretensians, all footmen, accompanied with the like number of horsemen: and sent them under the conduct of Athenagoras, one of his courtiers and gallants, for to brave the Cavalry of the enemies, and to challenge them to fight. The Romans, whose main battail was little above half a mile off, put out against them their light armed van-couriers, and as it were, two companies or cornets of horsemen: to the end, that they might be equal with the enemy in number, both of foot and horse. They of the Kings part supposed verily, that they should fight after their old and accustomed manner: namely, that the horsemen should by turns, one while ride forward in the face of the enemy, other while retire again: sometimes follow in chase and have use of their darts and weapons, and sometimes turn and shew their back parts: that the nimbleness and activity of the Illyrians would stand in good stead to make excursions and suddain skirmishes: also that the Cretensian archers should be employed in shooting arrows aloof at the enemies, as they advanced and came forward, or flung out all abroad on every side: but the violent charge of the Romans, no less continual and obstinate, than fierce and eager, put them quite out of this manner of service, and disordered all. For no otherwise than if it had been a set battail between two entire armies, their footmen lightly armed, so soon as they had lanced and let go their javelins from them, took them to their swords, and came to hand fight: the horsemen likewise, no sooner affronted the enemies, but either staying their horses they fought on horseback, or else alighted on foot, and among the footmen maintained the skirmish. By this means neither the Kings Cavalry could match the Romans, because they had not been used to a steady battel: nor his footmen who were wont to traverse their ground, and skirmish, never standing still, and withal in manner half naked for any harness they had, was able to make their parts good with the Roman light appointed footmen, who had their swords and bucklers, and were furnished with armour, as well defensive as offensive. So they could not endure long to maintain fight, but were forced to retire into their camp, and by nothing else saved themselves but by good footmanship and riding apace. These passed one day between, when the King minding to trie a conflict with all his forces of Cavalry, and footmen lightly appointed, had laid in a wait by night certain targatiers, whom they call Peltastes, in a convenient place between both camps, and given direction and charge unto Athenagoras and his men of arms. That if they sped well in open battel and plain fight, they should on still and follow their good fortune: but if they went by the worse,

A waste, and were too weak, they should give ground by little and little, and train the enemy to the place of ambush. Well it fell out so, that the horsemen indeed retired accordingly, but the leaders of that cohort aforesaid of targetiers, not attending the signal long enough, but raising their men out of ambush before time, lost the opportunity of playing their part & performing a good service. The Roman Consul having both obtained victory in open battel, and escaped the danger of a covert snare, retired himself into his camp. The morrow after, he came down into the plain field with all his forces, and put them in battel array, having arranged his Elephants in the forefront of the vanguard. And this was the first time that ever the Romans had use in their wars, of this beast; by occasion, that in the late Punick war they had taken some of them alive from their enemies. But perceiving that Philip kept himself close within his camp, he approached under the very rampiers, yet, and reproached him for his cowardise. And seeing for all that, he could not even then be drawn to a battel: considering also, that if he kept there a standing camp long, so near unto the enemy, his provision of corn should be exposed to dangers: for no looner should the purveyors and forragers be gone abroad into the country, and spread over the fields, but the enemies light horsemen would be ready at their heels to fetch them in, and cause them to come short home: therefore he removed his camp to a place almost eight miles off, called Oelaphum, where he might make his provision with less danger. Now when the Romans purveyed for corn and victuals in the territory thereabout, and were come upon a time somewhat neer and within danger of Philip, he left the King let them alone, and kept his men within their camp, to the end, that they might be more bold and venturesome, and withal, less wary and circumspect: but espying them once straggling asunder here and there out of order, he set forward with all his Cavalry, and the auxiliaries of the Caudians, and marched so fast, as the swiftest of his footmen by running might keep pace with the horsemen: thus having gotten between them and home, he pitched down his ensigns betwixt the Roman camp and the forragers. Then divided he his forces in two companies, the one he sent forth to course and chase them, so dispersed as they were: giving special charge and direction, not to leave any of them alive that they could reach: with the other he staid himself behind, and beset all the waies, and stopped the passages by which the enemies were like to retire and have recourse unto their camp. Soberly were they killed or put to flight in every place, and as yet not one escaped to the Roman camp, for to bring news of this discomfiture: for, as many as fled back, chanced upon the guard that the King had set: and more were slain by them, than beset the waies, than those that were sent out to the pursuit and execution. At length some hapned to escape through the midst of the Kings corps de guard, and in great hast and fearful manner came into the camp with a tremendous noise and tumult, rather than any certain tidings. The Consul, after order given to the horsemen, that every man should incurr and rescue what way soever he could, their distressed fellows in this extremity, himself led forth the legions out of the camp, and marching in a four-square battaillon advanced toward the enemies. The Horsemen being spread over the fields in divers places, some lost their right way, being deceived by other outcries heard from a contrary part: othersome met with their enemies, and at one instant, the skirmish began in many and sundry places. The band that guarded about the King, fought most fiercely and cruelly: for both they were for their own number as well of horse as foot, a full army well-armed; and also most of the Romans light upon them, because they kept the very port and roadway in the mids. In this regard also were the Macedonians the better and had the vantage, because the King himself was present in person to encourage and exhort them: and withal the auxiliary Caudians wounded many of the Romans ere they were aware of them: for why, they were well prepared aforehand, ranged thick and close together, and so fought against them that rode scattering abroad one from another, and without array. And verily, if they could have kept any mean and measure in their chase, they had mightily advanced themselves, not only in winning the honor of that day, but also, in the main point of the whole war. But pursuing them beyond all reason, and without discretion, upon a bloud-christly desire that they had of massacre, they chanced upon the Roman Squadrons which were gone before with the Tribuns and Colonels: in so much as the Horsemen aforesaid, who before fled, when they once saw the ensigns of their own infantry, reined their horse heads, and turned again upon the enemy that ran with bridle in horse neck: and so in the turning of an hand, the fortune of the battail changed and came about; and they that erewhile made pursuit, now shewed their backs, and fled again. Many of them were slain that came to close handfight, many likewise of those that ran away. Neither fell they all upon the edge of the sword, for some there were who plunged into bogs and marishes, where both horse and man sunk in the deep mud and mire, and so were swallowed up and perished. The King himself also was in great danger: for his horse being wounded under him and fallen, he also came headlong down to the ground, and hardly escaped, but he had been troden under foot, and mischieved as he lay along. One horseman above the rest, saved his life, who hastily leapt himself from horseback, and withal mounted the King (so scared as he was) upon his own horse: who being now on foot, and not able to run as fast as the horsemen that fled away, was with many a stab and thrust soon dispatched by the enemies that came running together to the King when he was seen to fall. And the King after he had ridden in fearful flight about the sunny meers, one while where there was some way, and other-whiles where there was none at all to be seen, chanced at length to come to his camp, when most men were in despair that he could possibly escape in safety. In this skirmish there were 200

Macedonians slain, a hundred almost taken prisoners: fourscore brave and goodly conquests, with rich spoils and other furniture, together with the spoil of his armour carried away. There were that blamed the King for being too rash that day, and the Consul for his slackness. For Philip say they, should have kept him quiet in rest and repose, knowing, as he did, that the enemies within few dayes would have been brought to extreame want and penny, now that the territory all about was clean spoiled and wasted. And the Consul for his part, when he had foiled the Cavalry and light armed footmen of the enemies, and as good as taken the King prisoner, ought presently to have advanced against the Kings camp: for never would the enemies be discomfited have stood to it: and so in the minute of an hour, they had been vanquished forever. This is soon said, but (as most things else) not so soon done. For in case that the King had likewise brought forth into the field all his Infantry, peradventure in that tumult, when all his men were discomfited and driven to the out of the field to their camp, yea, and to keep within the rampier, for fear of the enemies ready upon his victory to get over the counter-camp and other fortifications, the King might have been distressed of his hold, and lost all. Again considering, that the whole power of Philip his footmen remained still intire within the camp, the Consul guarded before the gates warding: the sentinels and watch set in convenient places of the rampier attending: what other good should the Consul have done in advancing further, but imputed the rash fool-hardiness of the King, who a little before so hotly followed the chafe of the horsemen discomfited? Neither was the Kings first judgement to be reproved and found fault with, when he charged upon the foragers, scattered as they were over all the fields: if he could have seen when he was well, and have used his good hand in measure and moderation. Less marvel it is besides, that he was willing to trye the fortune of a battail: because there ran a rumor, that Pleurant and the Dardanians were departed from home, and with a puissant power entered already into Macedonia. And if he thus were beset round about with these armies, there was no doubt but the Romans might have vanquished and subdued him, and never stirred foot for the matter. Philip therefore supposing that upon these two late received soils of the horsemen, he should have but unquiet and dangerous sitting in the same standing camp still: and minding to dislodge from thence, and in his remove to beguile the enemy and not be seen, dispatched a Pursevant, at arms or herald, unto the Consul a little before sun setting, to crave surcease of arms, until he had buried his horsemen that were slain: and at the relief of the second watch he deceived the enemy: for leaving many fires through all his camp, he marched without any noise and departed. The Consul had newly suspected, and was going to rest, when he was advertised that a Pursevant was come, and what his errand was. And for the present, he made the matter over no other answer but this, that the next morning he would talk with him, and give him audience. But Philip by this means got the advantage of that whole night, and part of the next day, to gain riddance of way in his journey, which was the only thing he sought for. And toward the mountains he took his flight, for that way he wist well the Romans would not follow after, with an army so heavy and charged as it was. The Consul by day break, granted the Pursevant a cessation of arms, and gave him his dispatch: but it was not long after that he was advertised how the enemy was gone; and not knowing which way to follow after, he passed some few dayes in foraging and purveying provision all about the place where he lay encamped.

After this he marched to Scutaria, and gathered together all the grain that was to be had about Pellagonia. From thence he went forward as far as to Pluvina, and all this while knew not for certain into what quarter of the countrey the enemies were retired. Philip having first set him down and encamped before Bruana, and departed from thence by crofs and crooked wayes, struck a suddain fear into the enemy, whereupon the Romans dislodged from Pluvina, and deer unto the River Ofphagus: pitched their pavilions. The King likewise rested himself not far from thence, and had cast a trench and raised a rampier along the banks of the River, which the inhabitants call Erigonus. And after he was for certain advertised, that the Romans intended to go to Erdnea, he marched afore to seize upon the streights, and to impeach the enemies, that they should not gain the passage that lyeth as it were in a narrow gullet, barred and enclosed on each side. There he raised in one place a rampier, and cast a trench in another; made barricades here and there, partly by piling stones up on heaps in stead of a wall, partly by felling of trees across, according as either the ground would give leave, or the place afford matter. And thus stopping up all the wayes by sundry devices and means, he made the place (to his thinking) both unpassable and impregnable, which of it self by nature was hard enough and troublesome. The countrey all about was for the most part Forrest, and full of wood, very incommodious, especially for that manner of battailions and ordnance of array, which the Macedonians call Phalanx: which serveth them in small or no stead at all, unless with their long pikes they may make a passade, or stay (as it were) and oppose them before their shields: which they cannot well do, unless they have free scope and liberty of plain and open ground. The Thracians also were sorely troubled and cumbered with their spears named Rhomphae, which were likewise of a mighty length, and by reason thereof (catching as they did, and snarling within the boughs and branches of Trees that grew in their way every where about) hindered them very much. There remained the Cohort or band of the Candians, that seemed of some use for to be employed. And yet the same also as it was able to discharge arrows against both Horse and man, and to annoy them so long as they lay open and exposed to shot, if haply they offered

A offered to charge; so they were not of strength sufficient to drive their shafts level, and to pierce thorough the Roman targets: for otherwise there was no part of the body offered it self unarmed and naked for to aim at. And therefore so soon as they perceived that kind of shot to serve them to little or no purpose, they caught up stones which lay all over the valley, and let them flie at the enemy. Which stones, as they light and beat upon their bucklers, kept a great clattering, and with the sound they made (rather than with any hurt besides) kept the Romans for a time from mounting up the bank. But the Romans making no reckoning of these stones neither, partly by pavoises and target-fences over their heads, made way directly through the thickest of their enemies; and partly by wheeling a little and fetching some compass about, gained the pitch of the hill, and were got up to the very top: from whence they drove the Macedonians (all affrighted as they were) down the hill, and chased them from their holds and guards: and by reason they had much ado to flie (the ground was so rough and uneven) most of them were killed and cut in pieces. Thus the difficulty of the freights was overcome, and they were possessed thereof, with far less trouble and conflict than they looked for and made account of. Then they marched on forward as far as to Erduas, where the Consul after he had put the fields all over to the wast, retired himself to Eliman. From thence he forced Orestides, and assailed the Town Celerum, situate as it were, in a demy island: there is a lake that environeth the walls, and but one way by land that leadeth to the Town from the main, and the same very freight and narrow, in form of a gullet. At the first when the Town was summoned, the inhabitants trusting to the natural strength of the place, kept their gates shut against the Consul, and refused his summons. But after they saw once the ensignes displayed and marching against them, when they perceived the enemies defended under a pavoise to approach close to the gate, and the narrow freight and avenue aforesaid, beset with a band of them: before they would encounter and fight, they yielded themselves for very fear. From Celerum he marched on towards the Dassaretians, and war by assault the City Pridum. From thence he carried away the bondslaves, with the rest of the pillage: but all persons whatsoever free born, he let go at liberty without paying ransom. The Town he gave them again, after he had planted in it a strong garrison for it stood well, and in a very good place, for to make rodes and incursions into Macedony. Thus the Consul having ranged over the countrey of the enemies, brought his army back through the peaceable parts into Apollonia, where he began first to make war.

Now the Ætolians, the Athamians, and Dardanians, and many other wars rising suddainly at once, some from one place and some from another, had diverted and turned Philip a contrary way. Against the Dardanians (as they returned out of Macedony) he sent Arbenagoras with the footmen lightly armed and appointed, and the greater part also of the horse giving him in charge and direction to follow them hard at their heels as they departed, and to play upon their backs, and cut off the rail of their reeward: to teach them against another time, not to be so hasty to come abroad with an army again. Democritus the Pretor of the Ætolians (who in the Diet aforesaid held at Naupactum persuaded to take a longer time for to consult about this war) had in the next Council or Parliament following, moved the Ætolians to enter into arms: namely, upon the same that was spread abroad of the horsemens fight before Oetolophus, and also upon the coming of the Dardanians, and Pleurains with the Illyrians into Macedony: besides the arrival of the Roman fleet at Oreum, and the general voice and bruit that went, how Macedony should shortly be assailed also by sea, over sea above so many nations that from all parts about were come already by land. These motives regained Democritus and the Ætolians to friend the Romans again. Who joyning unto them Aminander the King of the Athamians, went forth together for to besiege Ætolium. They within the Town had shut their gates, whether by constraint, or willingly of themselves, it was not known for they had the Kings garrison within among them. However it was, within few dayes Cerchum was taken and burnt. As many as remained alive after that great defeat, as well bond as free one with another, were with the rest of the pillage carried away. This fearful example moved all the people inhabiting about the marsh of Babe, to abandon their cities, and to retire themselves for security into the mountains. The Ætolians for want of rich prey and booty (which they could not find there) turned from them and marched toward Pryphasia. In that quarter they won by force the City Chryse, and cruelly put it to the sack. The inhabitants of Aradas knowing of themselves without compulsion and were received into protection as allies. One of Pythecus Arminius was of advice and desirous to march against Comptus by reason that the countrey of Athamania bordered so neer upon that City, and it seemed best to be fought without much trouble. But the Ætolians fingers tickled and itched again to be doing within the rich and fertile fields of Thessalie, and thither went they to raise booties and seek pillage. Aminander followed still for company, albeit he liked well neither of these fashions of the Ætolians nor of their glory to make rodes and to spoil every where: nor of their manner of encamping and adventuring. In what places soever they chanced to come, without all consideration regard and care of fortifying and guarding the army. Fearing therefore lest their inconsideratelines and inpine negligence, might be an occasion that he or his should come to a throw and, and thus some damage, lost his time: and seeing them to incamp in a plain neer to the City Pharsalus, he took a little Hill little above half a mile off, where both he and his might with the help of any small guard, lie in security. Now when as the Ætolians seemed in manner to have forgotten that they were in the enemies country, but that they drove some booty: while they were some of them wandering and stragling, disbanded and half armed, others others within their camp without any surp. de guard swelling and sleeping all night and day long, and made no difference of the times, Philip came upon them before they looked for him. And it being once known by the report of some that fled out of the fields in great affright, that he approached; then Damocritus and the rest of the Captains began to quake for fear. Now was it about noonetide of the day, at what time as most of them having taken their full lode of wine and viands, lay along fast asleep. Then they fell to awake and raise one another, and to give the alarm: anon they sent out every way to call in those that were spreading abroad in the fields. So much they were astonied, that for hast many of the horsemen went forth without their swords, and most of them forgot to put on their cuirasses. Thus being led out in post hast, and hardly in all (foot and horse together) able to make up the number of six hundred, they light upon the Kings Cavalry, for number, armour, and courage much better than themselves: And therefore at the first push were discomfited: for before they were well entred into skirmish, they fled shamefully away toward their camp. Some of them came short thither, and were either slain or taken prisoners, even as many as the Kings horsemen overtook, and gat between them and their other companies. Philip, when he saw his men approach neer unto their camp, commanded to sound the retreat: for both horse and man was weary, not so much with fight as with their long journey and the exceeding speed that they made. Whereupon he gave commandment, that the Horsemen by troops, and the light armed Footmen by their companies and Squadrons should water their horses one after another, and go to their dinner and repast. Others he kept still in armour for a guard attending the Regiment of the footmen, that came but slowly forward, by reason they were heavily armed at all pieces: who being come, they also were enjoined to pitch down their ensigs, and lay their weapons before them, and to take a short bait and hasty pittance, sending two or three at the most out of every band for to water the horses. All this while the horsemen, together with the light armed souldiers, stood well appointed and in readines, if haply the enemy would have given any attempt. The Aetolians bettowed armed men all about the gates and the rampier, intending to guard and defend their strength and fortifications, for now by this time they also that were scattered over the fields, had retired themselves into the camp. And so long as they beheld the enemies to keep quiet, and not stir, and were themselves in a sure hold, they made their bravadoes, and were very lusty: but after that the ensigs of the Macedonians began to advance forward, and march in order of battel well appointed, close unto their trench: all at once they abandoned their guards and quarters, and ran out at the back part of their camp, and fled to the foresaid hill, where the Athamanians were encamped. Many of the Aetolians were likewise in this hasty flight killed or taken prisoners. Philip made no doubt, but that the Athamanians also might have been driven from their hold, if there had been day enough behind: but the day being spent already first in the skirmish, and afterward in the ransacking of their camp, he set him down upon the next plain, hard at the foot of the hill aforesaid, intending very early the next morning to assail the enemy. The Aetolians scared as much now, as they were before when they quit their own camp, fled scattering away the night following. Here Aminander stood them in very good stead, by whose good guidance and direction, the Athamanians being skilful in the coasts of the country, conducted them into Aetolia, over the high mountains, whereas the enemies followed after them in blind and unknown by-ways. Some few of them happened in this confused and scattered flight to lose their way, and stumble upon the Macedonian horsemen, whom Philip by day light, had sent to cut off the tail of the enemies, so soon as he perceived the hill abandoned. About the very same time, Athenagoras a Captain under the King, overtook the Dardaniens as they returned into their country, and at the first put their reerward in disarray. But afterward the Dardaniens turned head again, and embattelled themselves: so they fought on even hand, and nothing was won nor lost on any side. The Dardaniens began not so soon to advance forward and march on again, but the Kings power, with their horsemen and light armed souldiers came upon them afresh, and put them to great trouble. For they had no such means of help, and were besides furcharged with heavy armour, and withal, the place gave great advantage to those of the Kings part. Very few were slain, more wounded, none at all taken prisoners: for the manner of the Dardaniens, is not to break out of their ranks and armies for a litle, and upon small occasions; but as they fight close, so they retire together, and part not. Thus Philip having restrained these two nations, by two brave exploits, which were as happily performed as bravely enterprised, recovered the losses again, by him received in the Roman war. These hapned besides, another occurrent, which diminished the number of his enemies the Aetolians. For Scopas, one of the chief noblemen of that nation, being sent from Alexandria by King Ptolemy, with a mighty mass of gold, caried away with him into Egypt six thousand footmen, and certain horsemen, waged for money to serve. Neither had he left behind him any of the flour and youth of Aetolia, if Damocritus had not chastised and rebuked them, and so by that means kept some of them at home; making remonstrances unto them, one while of the war that was toward, and another while of the desolation which was like to ensue thereupon. But whether he did this upon a good zeal and care that he had of his countrey, or only to cross Serpes, becaie he had not fed him well with rich rewards and fat presents, it is not known. And thus much concerning the affairs passed between Philip and the Romans for that summer.

The Roman fleet having in the beginning of the same summer committed to Sea from Corynna, together with the Lieutenant An. Apustius passed beyond the point of the cape Malta, and joyned

A joined with King Demetrius and Sylla to the city of Heraclea. Then the whole City and State of Athens upon hopes of peace and safety, sent Demetrius and Sylla to the City and shewed and shewed which they had conceived against Philip, and with a long time for very fear they had held in, and therefore kept themselves in good and reasonable terms with him. Now in this City there never was a tumult or any manner of sedition, and provoke the common people to a commotion, as did in all the rest generally. All kind of men are contained and born out by the favour of the multitude, so in Athens especially, where discipline is in most request, and beareth greatest sway. Presently therefore an Act was put up and proposed unto the common people, and by them granted and confirmed. That all the Statues and Images of King Philip, together with their names and titles, the wife of all his progenitors and predecessors, as well men as women, should be defaced, pulled down, and destroyed. That all the Festival daies, the sacrifices and sacrifices, which had been instituted and ordained for the honor of him, should be profaned and unallowed again. That the very places, wherein ought had been erected, or inscriptions given to his honour, should be held as detestable and accursed: and that from thence forward, it might not be lawful to set up there any of those things that ought to stand, and be dedicated in a pure and clean place. That the publick Priests of the City, in allies, for the preservation of their amities and armed forces, should desert and come by name King Philip, his children and heirs, his forces both by land and sea, with all the race and name of the Macedonian nation. Moreover, it ran on in the decree, That if any man from that time forward, would prefer and propound any thing that might tend to the disgrace and infamy of Philip, the whole people of Athens should approve and allow the same whatsoever, and make an Act thereof. Contrary-wise, if any person say or do anything for honour, or to impeach and check his dishonour, whatsoever should happen to kill the said party, he should be deemed and reputed, that he had killed him justly and lawfully. Finally, this branch was comprised within the decree, That all things ordained in times past against Philip and his line and progeny, should be observed and stand in force against Philip. Thus verily warred the Athenians against Philip with letters and words: wherein they are right valiant, and to say truth, good at nothing else. But Arralus and the Romans, having from Heraclea shaped their course for Pyrrhus, arrived there. And after they had sojourned some few daies in Athens, and were laden with a number of decrees, wherein the Athenians recounted the praises and commendations of their allies beyond all measure, like as they had before exceeded in shewing their malice against their enemies. They set sail from Pyrrhus to Andros. Where, riding at anchor in the bay called Stauron, they sent certain men to sound the minds of the inhabitants, whether they would chuse to yield the Town willingly, or rather abide the hazard of a forcible assault. Who answered again, that the Kings garrison being possessed of the Castle, and keeping it for Philip, they were not their own masters. Whereupon the King and the Roman Lieutenant for their forces on land, and with all preparation of engines and artillery fit for an assault, approached the City divers waies. The Roman standards and their arms, not seen before in those parts, the resolute courage of the soldiers, who so lustily and nimbly came near to scale the walls, terrified and amazed the Greeks, much more than any thing else. Therefore immediately they fled into the Castle, and the enemies were LL. of the City.
 Now, after they had for two daies space held out in the fortress, presuming more upon the strength of the place, than the force of their armout and weapons: they and the garrison together, compounded upon the third day to quit the place, so they might be brought with a convoy to Delium, a Town in Boeotia, and every man to have one single suit of apparel. Then the Romans leaving the bare City unto King Arralus, ransacked it themselves, and took away with them all the pillage and ornaments that beautified the same. And to the end, that the Isle should not lie waste and desert, Arralus perswaded the Macedonians in manner all, and certain also of the Andrians, there to remain. Afterwards, they also who by composition were transported to Delium, were by the fair promises of the King drawn away from thence: which they gave ear and credit unto the sooner, for the love of their native country, the miseries whereof they might hardly brook.
 From Andros they crossed to Cythera. There they spent certain daies in assaulting the City, to no purpose: and seeing the gain would hardly quit their pains, they departed from thence. Next unto Prasia, (which is a place of Arralus within the main) there joined unto the Roman fleet twenty pinnares of the Isleians, who were sent to rob and spoil the territory of the Carystians: the rest of the fleet remained at Girafum, a noble rode and port of Euboea, until such time as the Isleians were returned from Carystum. Then all together they made sail, and passing the mids of the main sea, they fell with the Isle of Saxos, near unto Syracusa. There they were staid for certain daies, by reason of the raging Northwind: which being once laid and the sea calm again, they passed to Syracusa, a City lately pillaged and ransacked by K. Philip. The soldiers ranged over the country, and brought com with them to their ships, & whatsoever else was fit for mans food. Other booty neither war there any nor deserved had the Greeks to be spoiled at their hands. Thence they bent their course for Cassandria: first they rode at anchor near unto Aradus, a village situate by the sea side, and belonging to that State. From whence having sailed beyond the cape, & desirous to come about with their vessels, for to approach the very walls of the City, there arose a tempest & sudden gulf: wherein they had like to have been cast away: but scattered they were asunder, & having for the most part lost the tackling of their ships, they escaped with much ado to land. This tempest at sea, was also a fore-taken pressing unto them, that they were to follow the war by Land and Sea, and to be in service for when they had brought all their ships together, and set them on shore, and they sailed the Town: but they had the repulse with many thousands slain before them (for there was a strong garrison of the King) whereupon they gave over their attempt, turned back and sailed over to Carthage, a City of Africa, and having doubled the point of Tunis they sailed on for Africa. There as they found the territory, they found the Town and made it. And for that their ships had their full freight and charge of pillage they sailed no farther forward, but returned from whence they came to Syrtis, and from thence to Sicily, where leaving behind them their main power, they went with smaller ships lightly appointed, so the Emperor of Sicily, for to parley with the Romans about the whole course and managing of the war. The chief of this embassy sent from the Senate, was one Sipthianus an Italian, who came to Hieracles for to treat and confer about the business together with the King and the Roman Lieutenant. They demanded of Hieracles by virtue of the accord and agreement before made, to furnish them with a thousand soldiers: for so many ought he by right to furnish and maintain, who offered they were to wage war against Philip. But this demand was denied to the Romans: in regard that sometime they likewise thought much to make a road to spoil Hieracles, at what time as Philip sent forth his fleet about Syracuse, burning all edifices before him, as well sacred as profane, when they might have drawn him perforce from thence into his own realm to look unto his proper affairs there. Thus the Romans were dismissed with more hope than help: for the Romans fed them only with fair words, and large promises of all things. Then Aspilius with King Attalus returned to the fleet.

After this they laid their heads together, and began to consult about the siege and assault of Oronum. A strong City this was both in regard of the walls, and also of a good garrison by reason that heretofore it had been once assailed. Now there were in full of Rhodian ships all close covered with harbores and docks, which under the conduct of Captain Agessibronus sailed joyntly with the fleet of Attalus and the Romans after the winning and conquest of Andros. These ships they sent to lie in the Bay of Zelasum, (a promontory or cape above the City Damastium, lying very conveniently over against Isthmia) for this intent, that if the Macedonian ships should come abroad from thence, they might be ready in hand to make sail against them. Hieracles an Admiral for King Philip, lay there at rods with the navy, attending either some opportunity or advantage of the enemies negligence, than by plain and open force. The Romans and Attalus in the mean time planted their ordnance against Oronum at divers parts. The Romans at the Castle side that standeth upon the sea. The King from the vale that lieth between two forts, where as the City is enclosed also with a wall. And as they assailed in sundry places for their manner of a sailing was much different, and their engines diverse. The Romans assayed to approach the wall with tortoises, pavoises and mantlets, and to shake it with the Ram. They of the Kings part used Crossbows, Balists, Catapults, and all manner of engines to shoot forth quills and darts, yea, and to level and weigh mighty stones of exceeding great weight. They undermined also: and in sum, they practised all means which they saw by experience did good during the former assault and siege. But the Macedonians were not only more in number than the time before to defend the City, but also of better courage and resolution: by reason that the King had rebuked them sharply for their fault passed: and they remembered well both his menaces, and also his promises for the time to come: in so much as the assailants had small hope to win the Town in haste. Mean while the Roman Lieutenant, supposing that some other exploit might be performed, leaving a sufficient number (as he thought) for the finishing of the Fabricks begun and other engines of assault, put over to the next places of the continent: where he surprised on a sudden Lariss (not that noble and renowned City in Thessaly, but another, which they call Cremaste) and won it, all but the fortrefs. Attalus in like sort took Egeston, fearing nothing lest that such an accident from them that were busie in besieging another Town. By this time, as the engines and other Fabricks without Oronum were at the point of finishing, and ready to perform the battery for which they were made: so the garrison within was overtoiled with continual pain and travail, spent with watching night and day, and faint with many grievous wound. Moreover, part of the wall, shaken underneath with a hurt and push of the Ram, was already fallen down in sundry places, in so much as the Romans entered by night at the open breach, and all the way above the Key, and so were possessed of the Castle. Attalus likewise by the break of day, after he saw the banner reared upon the fortrefs, and the signal which the Romans put forth, entered the City: for now the walls in many places lay along. The garrison and the Townsmen fled to a second citadel that they had, from whence after two dayes they yielded. The City was the Kings lot: the bodies of the prisoners were the Romans share. Now drew the sun near unto the Equinoctial line in Autumn, at what time the Euboean gulf called Gelis is dangerous, and not well trusted of mariners. Therefore being desirous to be gone into a place of safe retreat, before the troublesome winter weather overtook them, they turned their course and made head to Pyræum, from whence they came: where Aspilius leaving behind him thirty ships, set a compass about the cape of Attalus, and sailed to Corinth. But the King stayed still so long as the festival dayes of Ceres continued, because he would be present at the celebration of those solemnities. After the feast ended, himself likewise retired into Asia: but first he sent Agessibronus and the Rhodians home again. These were the affairs and exploits performed this summer by sea and land, by

The other Consul C. Aurelius being come into his Province when the war was brought to an end, could not smother and conceal his anger conceived against the Prætor for fighting in his absence. When he had taken order therefore to send him into Etruria, himself with the legions invaded the country of the enemies: where by way of robbing and spoiling he warred so as he got more prey than praise. But L. Furius, seeing there was little to do in Etruria, and withal desirous rather than his life of a triumph over the Gauls (which he supposed to obtain with more ease, while the Consul was absent, who was both angry with him, and also envied at him) arrived at Rome before any man looked for him, and assembled the Senat in the Temple of Bellona. Where,

B after he had declared what acts he had achieved, he requested that he might be permitted to ride into the City with triumph. In great credit and account he was with many of the Senators, both for his noble and worthy deeds, in which regard they honoured him: and also for a special favour and love, in which respect they affected him. But the more ancient and elder Senators denied him triumph, as well for that he had warred with the army of another, as also because he had abandoned his own Province and government, upon a greedy desire to catch a triumph, by waiting his opportunity, and taking advantage: a thing not warrantable by any former precedent or example. And as many of them as had been Consuls said moreover, That above all things he ought to attend upon the Consul his return. "For well might he (say they) being encamped near unto

C "the City, have defended and guarded the Colony only, and so have drawn the time out untill his coming, and never needed to have fought a set battell for the matter. And although the Prætor have omitted to do, yet ought not the Senat to follow his example, but expect the Consul. When as therefore they have heard the Consul and Prætor discoursing and arguing the matter both together face to face, then they should be able to judge better and more soundly of the cause. A great part of the house was of opinion that they ought to look unto nothing else but the good service done, and whether he were lawfully called thereunto, as a Magistrate of himself, to manage his affairs by his proper conduct and the guidance of his own fortune. "For,

D "of the two Colonies (say they) which were oppoled as two forts and bulwarks to restrain the sudden impressions and tumults of the French: when the one was sacked and burnt, and the same fire like to leap from it to the other so near, (as from house to house that joyn together) what could the Prætor have done otherwise in that case? For if there might be nothing attempted without the Consul, it must needs follow, that either the Senat did amiss in giving the Prætor the charge of an army (for if their will was that the war should be managed not by the Prætors army, but by the Consuls, they might have limited it in the Commission by especial words, expressly forbidding the service to be done by the Prætor, but only by the Consul) or else the Consul hath committed a fault, who having commanded the army to go out of Tuscan into

E "France, came not himself in person to Ariminum to encounter the enemy, and be present in that war, which without him might not be lawfully fought. Over and besides, the occasions and seasons of war attend no staies, and tarry for no politick delays of Generals. And otherwhiles, fight a man must, not because a man is willing thereto, but because his enemy puts him to it. To conclude, the very battell itself, and the happy issue thereof, ought only to be considered and regarded. The enemies are defeated and slain; their Camp taken and ransacked; the siege raised

F "from the one Colony, and it preserved; the captives of the other recovered and restored to their friends: and to be brief, in one battell the quarrell is decided, and the war finished. And not only men have rejoyced for this victory, but also there have been processions for three daies space to the honour of the immortall gods; [For that L. Furius hath managed the Commonwealth well and happily and not ill and rashly.] Finally, these French wars fall by a fatall destiny to the house and race of the Furii. By these and such like remonstrances alledged by himself and his friends, the majesty of the Consul himself was overweighed with the reason born to the Prætor present. And so in a frequent assembly of Senators a decree was granted, That L. Furius should ride in triumph. Thus triumphed over the Gauls L. Furius Prætor, while he was in office. He brought into the common treasury 320000 Asles, 170000 pound weight of silver. But neither were there any prisoners led captives in show, nor spoils carried in pomp before his chariot, nor yet his souldiers followed after. So as it appeared, that all other things besides victory alone, pertained properly to the Consul.

After this were the plaies exhibited with great magnificence by P. Cornelius Scipia, which he had vowed in Affrick, during his Consulship. Also there passed an order for the lands of his souldiers: That for so long, as each one had served in Spain or Affrick, he should have two acres for every year: and that these lands should be set out and assigned unto them by ten Decemvirs for the purpose deputed. There were certain Triumvirs created for to supply and make

G up the number of the Roman Inhabitants in Venusia, by reason that during the time of Annibals his war, the strength of that Colony was much enfeebled and impaired. C. Terentius Varro, P. Quinctius Flaminius, and P. Cornelius Scipia the son of Cneus, enrolled new Coloners to inhabit Venusia.

The same year C. Cornelius Cethegus, who governed Spain as Pro-Consul, discomfited a great host of the enemies in the country of the Sederans. In which battell, by report, were slain 1500 Spaniards, and 78 military ensignes taken. C. Aurelius the Consul, when he was returned out of his Province to Rome against the solemn election of Magistrates, complained, not as men made reckoning he would have done, (That the Senat expected not for his coming, nor that the Consul was not permitted to debate the matter with the Prætor) but found himself grieved, "That the Senat had decreed a triumph so, as the party only was suffered to speak who was to triumph, and none of them might be heard who were present at the battell. And whereas our forefathers ordained, that Lieutenants, Colonels, Marshalls, and Centurions, yea, and in one word, the souldiers should be at a triumph: for this end and purpose, that the truth might appear to the world, of all things achieved by him unto whom so great honour was to be done: Was there any one (quoth he) of all that army which fought with the Gauls, I say not a souldier, but so much as a lackey or horse-boy following the Camp, of whom the Senat might enquire, whether the Prætor spake true or false? This done and said, he published the day of assembly for the election abovesaid: wherein were created Consuls L. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Villius Tappulus. After them were Prætors chosen L. Quintius Flaminius, L. Valerius Flaccus, L. Villius Tappulus, and C. Bibius Pampilius. Grain and other victuals that year were cheap. Great store of corn was brought out of Affrick, which the Ediles of the chair distributed to the people, at two Asses a Modius. They also set forth the Roman games and pastimes right sumptuously; yea, and represented them one day more than ordinary. Moreover, of the silver raised by fines and forfeitures, they made seven brazen statues, which they set up in the treasure-house of the City. The Plebeian plaies likewise were thrice renewed all over by the Ediles of the Commons L. Terentius Maffalora, and C. Bibius Pampilius Prætor elect. Finally, the funeral games that year were four daies together exhibited in the common place of the City, occasioned by the death of M. Valerius Levi-Knus: and celebrated they were by his two sons P. and M. who also shewed unto the people a brave spectacle ofencers at the sharp: wherein there were five and twenty couples that entered the lists and performed combat. M. Anicius Cotta, one of the Decemvirs, that year departed this life; and in his place M. Acilius Glabrio was subordained. In the solemn assembly for electing Ediles of the chair, it chanced that those two which were chosen might not immediately enter into office: for C. Cornelius Cethegus was created in his absence, while he governed the Province of Spain. And C. Valerius Flaccus who was present at his own election, might not be sworn to maintain the laws, because he was the Flamin or Priest of Jupiter. For lawfull it was not for any Magistrate to exercise his place above five daies, unless he were sworn to the laws. Then Flaccus preferred a petition that he might be dispensed with: whereupon the Senat ordained, That if the Edile would find one to swear in his name at the good pleasure and discretion of the Consuls, then the Consuls (if they thought it meet) should deal with the Tribunes of the Commons, to propound it unto the people that it might pass under their grant. So L. Valerius Flaccus (the Prætor elect for the year following) was presented to take the oath for his brother. Then the Tribunes put it to a canvass before the people, and they enacted, That the oath of his brother should be of the same validity as if the Edile himself had taken it in his own person. Concerning the other Ediles also there passed an act of the Commons. For when the Tribunes proposed unto the people, Which two they would have to go into Spain as LL. deputies, with command over the armies; the people ordained, that C. Cornelius the Edile of the chair might come home to bear his office, and L. Manlius also after so many years, depart out of his Province: the people ordained, that Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Stertinus should have the conduct and government in Spain, in quality and title of Pro-Consuls.

The two and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the two and thirtieth Book.

Many strange and prodigious sights (as they were reported from divers countries) are here related and set down: among which, this is one, that in Macedony there was a bay tree sprung up of itself in the poop of a galley. T. Quintius Flaminius the Consul fought fortunately against Philip in the streights of Epirus: and having put him to flight, he compelled him to return into his own kingdom. Himself, with the assistance of the Ætolians and Athamans, infested sore and plagued Thessaly, which bordereth upon Macedony. L. Quintius Flaminius the Consul his brother, by the aid of King Attalus and the Rhodians, made conquest by war at sea, of Eubœa and all the sea-coast. The Achæi were received into amity. The conspiracy of slaves, that conspired to deliver and set at large the hostages of the Carthaginians, was detected and took no effect. The number of Prætors was increased to six. The Consul Cornelius Cethegus defeated the French Insubrians in battell. League and amity was concluded between the Romans and the Lacedæmonians, with their tyrant Nabis. Over and besides, there is contained in this book the winning of many Cities in Macedony.

The third and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

When the Consul and Prators were entred into office upon the * Ides of March, they ^{* 15 of March} call lots for the government of the Provinces. To L. Lentulus, fell Italy; and to P. Vilius, Macedony. As for the Prators, L. Quintius had the jurisdiction of the City of Rome; and C. Babius the government of Ariminum; L. Valerius ruled Sicily; and L. Villius his lot was to command Sardinia. Lentulus the Consul had order given him to levy new legions, and Vilius to receive the army of P. Sulpicius, with commission and licence to take up as many souldiers as he thought good himself to furnish the same with a fresh supply. Those legions which C. Aurelius Consul had in charge, were assigned over to Babius the Prator, with condition to keep them with him, untill the Consul were arrived in France with a new army; and so soon as he came, to discharge and discharge all the souldiers hometo their houses except 5000 milles: forasmuch as this number was thought sufficient to govern the Province about Ariminum.

The Prators of the former year continued still Commanders of their armies. Cn. Scipius was enjoyned to see and take order, that certain lands should be set out for those souldiers who had served many years together in Spain, Italy, and Sardinia. And Q. Minucius had in charge to go through with that inquisition of certain conspirators and traitors in the Brutians country, upon which he had siren already as Prator with great fidelity and diligence: and also to send unto Locris for to receive due punishment of those prisoners, whom being attainted and convicted of sacrilege, he had sent bound to Rome. And finally, to cause all the treasure taken out of the Temple of Proserpina, to be restored thither again, with an over-encrease, to make satisfaction and to raze out the wicked part committed. The Latine feasts and holy-daies were solemnized again by verne of an ordinance of the Bishops, upon this occasion, That certain Embassadors from Ardea complained in the Senat, how they had not their ordinary allowance of flesh at the Latine feasts aforesaid in the mount Alba, according to the old custome. News came from Suessa, that two of their City gates, and all the wall between, was smitten with lightning. Messengers also from Farmia reported: that their Temple of Jupiter was likewise blasted. Moreover, they of Ofia brought word of the like mischance with them in the Church of Jupiter. And from Velitra tidings came of the like mishap: fallen upon the Temples of Apollo and Sangus. And that in the Temple of Hercules there sprung up a bush of traile. Letters came also from Q. Minucius the Pro-Prator out of the Brutians country, that there was a colt soled with five feet, and three chickens hatched with three feet apiece. After all this, P. Sulpicius the Pro-Prator sent letters from out of Macedony, containing among other matters this news, that there was a Laurell tree grew of it self in the poop of a galley.

The Senat in regard of all the former prodigious sights, ordained, that the Consul should sacrifice greater beasts unto what gods he thought good: but about this last rehearsed, the Sooth-sayers that pry into beasts inwards, were sent into the Senat-house: and by direction of their answer, an Edict went forth, That the people should go in procession, and make supplications one day, and in all Temples and Altars of the gods there were sacrifices celebrated with great devotion.

The Carthaginians this year came to Rome with the first payment of the tribute imposed upon them: and forasmuch as the treasurers and receivers of the City made report, that the silver was not good and lawful, and being brought to chetrial, was found too light by one fourth part washed away: those Carthaginians were constrained to take up money of the bankers of Rome, and to make good the defect and loss of the silver aforesaid. They put up a petition besides unto the Senat, that it might stand with their good pleasure to re-deliver now their hostages. Whereupon an hundred of them were rendered back, and good hope there was of the rest, if so be they continued loyal and fast in their allegiance. And when they made a farther request in behalf of those hostages which were not delivered that they might be transported from Norba (where they were not to their good liking and ease) to some other place, granted it was, that they might remove to Syracusa and Perrentinum. In like sort, the Gaditans made humble suit, and obtained this liberty, that there should not be sent from the Romans a captain to govern Gades, any thing to the contrary to their covenant (concluded with L. Marius Septimius, when they yielded themselves under the subjection of the Romans) notwithstanding. Moreover, forasmuch as the Embassadors of Narva made complaint, that they had not their full number of inhabitants, and that there were certain strangers enmingled among them, not of their own nation, who bare themselves as Citizens: therefore L. Cornilius the Consul was commanded to create three Deputies of Commishoners, called Trimvirs for to reform this disorder. And chosen there were for this purpose, Publius and Septimius Elus, who had both of them the surname of Patrus, and C. Cornelius Lentulus. Publius was granted to them of Narva, was denied to the Embassadors of Cossa, who likewise requested that the number of their inhabitants might be increased.

The states thus finished at Rome that there were to be done, the Consuls went into their severall Provinces. P. Vilius so soon as he was arrived in Macedony, was welcomed at his first coming with a dangerous mutiny of the souldiers, which long afore being kindled, was not well quenched at the first beginning. These were those two thousand, which after the defeat of Annibal, were sent out of Affrick into Sicily; and from thence, a year after almost, transported into Macedony for voluntary souldiers; but they thought it stood thowly to it, that it was no voluntary act of theirs, but that they were shipped by their Colonels and Tribunes full against their wills. And howsoever it was, whether they served willingly or unwillingly, it was but meet and good reason, that the time of their souldiery should run out, and their service have an end at length. All things, that for these many years they had not seen Italy; that they waxed old men under their harness, having borne arms in Sicily, in Affrick and in Macedony; that with toil and travel so tedious, they were weak and feeble; and after so many wounds and hurts received, they had no more blood to lose. The Consul made them answer, that their cause was good and reasonable, but marred in the handling; and meet he thought it, that they should be dismissed, if they could have requested it in modest terms: but neither it, nor any cause else whatsoever was warrantable to make a mutiny and sedition. Therefore, if they could be content to keep to their colours, and be at command as loyall souldiers, he would in their behalf write his letters unto the Senat, as touching their conge and dismissal: for be they well assured, that they shall get more by sober and gentle behavior, than by any such stubborn, toward, and wilfull demeanor.

At the same time Philip besieged the City of Thaumaci with terraces & mantelets in all forcible manner, so that he was now at the point to batter & shake the wall with the ram. But the sudden arrival of the Ætolian enforced him to surcease his enterprise; who by the conduct of Archidamus having passed through the midst of the Macedonian guards, & entered the town, never ceased day nor night to make sallies forth, one while upon their standing watch, other whiles upon their fabricks & engines. The natural situation of the place yielded them good help and vantage: for the town of Thaumaci is seated on high to amans thinking as he goeth from Pyla & the gulph of Malaea by the way of Lamia & sheweth it self aloft, seeming to overlook & command the streight passage of the forrests called Cela. Again, when one travelleth over the craggy places, and the crooked waies entangled with so many windings in the vallies of Thessaly, and is approached once near to the City, all on a sudden he may discover before him a mighty large and open plain, as it were a wide and vast sea. So: a man shall have much ado to reach with his eye so far as these downs lie out every way under him, and see all over them. And herenpon by reason of this strange and marvellous prospect, the City is called Thaumaci. Over and besides that the high grounds affordeth it security, it standeth also upon a huge rock, divided into divers crags and broken cliffs. These difficulties forced Philip to give over his attempt, and namely, when he considered and weighed withall, that the town it self when it was won, would not quit the painful labour, and pay for the danger about it. Besides, the winter was now at hand, when he departed from thence, and retired his forces into Macedony, there to harbor. Where, when all others, during the time that they could catch any repose and rest, refreshed their spirits and bodies with some recreations and disports; Philip only how much respite soever he had, either of intermission or remission from continual labour of marching in journey, and fighting in battell; so much more trouble he had in his mind while he couied and discoursed with himself, what the total and final issue might be of this war: while he stood not only in fear of the enemies, which persecuted him by sea and land, but also in doubt, as well of the hearts of his allies, as of the affections of his own subjects: lest the one in hope of the Romans friendship should revolt, and the other (even the Macedonians themselves) desire novelties, and long for a change. Therefore he addressed his Embassadors into Achaia, both to exact an oath of the Achaens for their allegiance (for they had capitulated in the accord and agreement made yearly to swear fealty unto Philip) and also to deliver in to their hands, Orchomenus, Heraca, and Triphylia. And when they demanded also Aliphera, the Embassadors answered, that the City never pertained to Triphylia, but that of right it ought to be restored unto Philip: as being one of them, which in the generall councill and assembly of the Arcadians, were assigned and set out for the building of Megalopolis. And thus verily he entertained firm alliance with the Achaens. As for the Macedonians he gained their hearts unto him, by occasion of Heraclides: for seeing that by means of him he incurred their exceeding ill will and hard conceit, and that he was charged with many grievous crimes, he cast him in prison to gratifie his own subjects: whereat the people took great joy and hearts content. Then made he preparation for war, with an earnest endeavor, as at any time before: he exercised as well the Macedonians as mercenary souldiers in pay, namely, to wear their armor and handle their weapons; & in the very prime of spring, he sent all his forrain aids and light armed souldiers, under the leading of Athenagoras into Chaonia by the way of Epirus, to seize upon the straight passage near to Antigonis, which the Greeks call Stena. Himself a few daies after followed with his main army more heavily appointed. And when he had well viewed & considered the situation of the country, and how it lay, he judged that the quarter consisting upon the river Aous was the meetest place to fortifie and encamp in. This river between two hills the one by the pealants of the country called Epirus the other Asinus, runneth within a narrow vale, and yieldeth but a small passage upon the bank side. He commanded Athenagoras to gain and fortifie Asinus with his light armed souldiers: himself encamped upon Epirus. And look what way as the hill was fenced with broken and cragged rocks, there he kept a small guard of some few souldiers: but whereas there was more danger, and easier access for the enemy, he fortified with trens, hes, rampiers and bulwarks. He planted also and disposed in convenient places a great number of engines to send out quarrels and other shot, for to keep the enemies aloof,

the City Thaumaci.

* Admirable, or wonderfull.

Above the royal pavilion of the King himself was pitched before the rampier upon a bank in a most conspicuous place of open fight, for to terrifie the enemy, and also to encourage and hearten his own men when they should see him so confident and resolute. The Consul advertized by Charopus the Epistat, what passages the King with his army was possessed of, after he had passed the winter in Corcyra, himself likewise in the beginning of Spring, went up into the main land, and held on his march toward the enemy. And being advanced almost within five miles of the Kings camp, he left his legions in a strong fenced place, and went himself in person forward with certain lightly appointed in especial to discover the quarters, and the morrow after held a consultation, Whether he might do better to assay to pass through the place which the enemy kept (notwithstanding he saw evidently before his eyes great trouble and hazard in that adventure) or to bring his army about and fetch a compass the same way, whereas the year before Sulpitius entered into Macedony. This deliberation held him for certain daies in even balance and suspense, untill news came unto him that T. Quintius was created Consul; and having the Province of Macedony allotted unto him made haste thither and was already passed to Corcyra.

Valerius Antias writeth how Vilius was entered the pass aforesaid & because he could not take the straight and direct way (by reason that the King and his forces had beset all places) followed the valley along, through the middle whereof the river Aous runneth: and having made a bridge over it, in great haste passed over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there fought a battle: wherein the King was discomfited and put to flight, and driven out of his camp: that 1200 enemies were slain in that conflict, 2200 taken prisoners, 132 ensignes won and carried away, besides 20 horse. Also that during the combat there was a Temple vowed unto Jupiter, in case the Consul should well in the battell. But all other writers both Greek and Latine, at least wise whose Annals I have read, report that Vilius performed no memorable act, and that the Consul T. Quintius who next succeeded took in hand the whole and entire war himself.

While things thus passed in Macedony, the other Consul L. Lentulus who staid behind at Rome, held a general assembly for the election of Censors: And among many famous and noble personages who sued for that dignity, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and P. Aelius Paullus were created Censors. These two agreeing together in great concord, both elected a Senat without defaming any person; and also farmed out the toll for portage of all things that were sold at Capua: Item, they set & so farmed let the custome for passage that way whereas the camp stood and where now there is a town built: and entold three hundred Coloners (for that number was limited by the Senat) there to inhabit. They sold also the lands of Capua lying under the hill Tifala.

About the same time L. Manlius Acidinus departed out of Spain, and was prohibited by M. Porcius Cato a Tribune of the Commons, to enter at his return into the City with the solemn pomp of an Ovation notwithstanding he had that honour granted by the Senat. So he came into Rome as a private person, and brought into the Chamber of the City 1200 pound weight of silver, and thirty pound weight well near of gold. The same year Cn. Babius Lamphilus, who had received the Province of France from C. Aurelius the Consul of the former year, engaged himself rashly within the marches of the French Insubrians, and was environed and enclosed round about, both he and in manner his whole army. He lost above 6600 men. See what an overthrow was received in a war, whereof there was no reckoning made, and from whence no danger was feared any more. This caused L. Lentulus the Consul to come out of the City of Rome, who being arrived into a Province full of trouble and tumult, after he had received the charge of a frightened and dismayed army, gave the Praetor a great check and rebuke, & took him up roundly with reproachfull terms, yea, and commanded him to get him gone out of the Province, and to repair to Rome. Neither performed the Consul himself any exploit worthy of remembrance by reason that he was called home to Rome for to hold the solemn election of Magistrates: which also was staid by M. Fulvius and M. Curius Tribunes of the Commons: who likewise would not suffer T. Quintius Flamininus, having been but Quaestor, for to stand for a Consulship. "Now adays, say they, the dignities of Aediles and Praetors are nought set by, and not worth the seeking for: and these noblemen will needs troinat into the Consuls place, not by steps and degrees of other offices, wherein they should make proof and give good testimony what their carriage is, but leaping over those in the midst, joyning the lowest and highest together. This debate which began in Marcellus in the assembly of the people, came at length to be decided before the Senat. And the Senat ordained, That forasmuch as he which sued for that dignity, was by law capable thereof it was reason that the people should have plenary and absolute power to create him, of whomsoever else they pleased. So the Tribunes submitted themselves under the authority of the Senators. And for Consuls were elected Sex. Aelius Paullus, and T. Quintius Flamininus. Then ensued the election of the Praetors, in which were created L. Cornelius Merula, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Porcius Cato, and C. Atilius, who had been Aediles of the Commons. By whom the Plebeian plaies were re-commenced; and a solemn feast made in the honour of Jupiter in regard of those plaies. The Cnule Aediles likewise P. Valerius Placcus, who also was the Flamine Dialis or Priest of Jupiter, and C. Cornelius Cethegus, exhibited the Roman games with great magnificence. The great Pontifices or Bishops Sex. Sulpicius and L. Galba died that year: In whose places were entailed M. Aemilius Lepidus and Cn. Cornilius Scipio. Now when Sex. Aelius Paullus and Titus Quintius Flamininus the Consuls were entered into their Magistracy, they assembled the Senat in the Capitoll: where the

they gave orders, that concerning the two Provinces of Macedony and Italy, the Consuls should either agree between themselves, or else cast lots whether of them should govern the one or the other: And that he, whose hap was to have the charge of Macedony, should enroll of Romans three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen: Also of Latine allies five thousand foot, and five hundred horse, for to supply and furnish out the legions. And for the other Consul it was decreed, that he should have an army all entire and new. L. Laetilius the Consul of the former year, continued still Governour in the Province with expresse commandment, that neither himself should leave the government, nor withdraw his forces from thence, before the Consuls were come with the new legions. So the Consuls referred themselves to the direction of the lots. To Publius fell Italy: and Macedony to Quintius. As for the Prætors, who all were guided by lots, L. Cornelius Merula had the jurisdiction of the City of Rome, M. Claudius governed Sicily. To M. Perseus was allotted Sardinia, and C. Helvius his lot was to be L. Deputy in Gaul. After this they began to take musters. For over and besides the Consular armies, the Prætors also were charged to levy souldiers. To Marcellus were assigned four thousand footmen of Latine allies, and three hundred horsemen to go into Sicily. And for Cato three thousand foot of the same kind of souldiers with two hundred horse to serve in Sardinia: upon condition, that when both these Prætors were come into their Provinces, they should discharge all the old souldiers there, as well footmen as horsemen.

Then the Consuls granted the Embassadors of King Attalus leave to come into the Senate-house: where having audience given them, "after they had declared how their King and Master had assisted the State of Rome with his forces as well by sea as land, and shewed himself chearfull, ready, and obedient to this present day for to execute and perform whatsoever the Roman Consuls had enjoyned him to do: they said now, that they much feared lest from henceforward he would not be able to do the same, by reason he was impeached by Antiochus. For Antiochus taking his vantage, and finding the realm of Attalus disurnished of garrisons, and unprovided of forces both by sea and land, had invaded the same. For which occasion Attalus besought the LL. of the Senat there assembled, that if they minded to use his navy, and employ the means that he could make, in the service of the Macedonian war, they would then send him a sufficient garrison to defend his kingdom: but if they thought not well thereof, his request was to permit himself to return with his fleet and other forces, to the defence of his own. The Senat gave order to return this answer unto the Embassadors: "Whereas King Attalus had succoured the Roman Captains with his Armado and other means of war, the Senat accepted thereof in the best part. But as touching Antiochus the King, an ally and friend of the people of Rome, they neither would send any aid against him: nor yet detain the aids of King Attalus in any service of theirs, longer than the King himself should think it stood with his own commodity. For the manner of the people of Rome hath alwaies been to serve their own turn with the help and assistance of others, but yet at the good pleasure & discretion of others. And whosoever were willing to relieve the Romans, they were at their own liberty to begin and end when they would themselves. Howbeit they purposed to address their Embassadors unto Antiochus, to advertise him and let him understand, that the people of Rome employed the help of Attalus his ships and souldiers against Philip, a common enemy: and the Senat would take it kindly at his hands, if for their sakes he forbore the Realm of Attalus, and abstained from war. For meet and reason it was, that the Kings who were friends and allies to the people of Rome, should likewise entertain peace and amity among themselves.

T. Quintius the Consul made haste to be gone into his Province: and when he had levied and mustered his souldiers so, as that he had enrolled those old experienced servitors for the most part, who had given good proof of their valour in the service of Spain and Affrick, he was detained so long at Rome by occasion of certain prodigious signs reported, untill he had taken order for the appeasing of the gods, and expiation of them. The lightning scorched and blasted the great part way from Venus: the Common Hall likewise of publike assemblies, and the Temple of Jupiter in Lavinium: also the Temple of Hercules in Ardea: the walls besides and turrets of Capua, and the Temple there which is called Ala. At Arretium the sky appeared to be on a light fire. At Velitra the earth setled and sunk down, leaving a great gaping chink for the compass of three acres of ground. Word moreover was brought, that in Suessa a lamb was yeaced with two heads: and in Sirussæ a porker with a mans head. In regard of these prodigies, there was a procession and supplication one whole day, and the Consuls intreated devoutly to their sacrifices: and after they had pacified the gods, they took their journey into their Provinces. Publius together with C. Helvius the Prætor went into France and gave unto the said Prætor the army which he received of L. Laetilius, and should have dismissed and discharged of their service: because he purposed himself to employ in his own wars the fresh and new legions which he brought with him: but he performed no action worth the report. The other Consul T. Quintius having taken the sea, and departed from Brundisium sooner than other Consuls were wont, arrived at Coryra with eight thousand foot, and eight hundred horse. From thence he crossed the seas with a galley of five ranks of oars, directing his course for the nearest coasts of Epirus, and by great journeys made haste untill he was come to the Roman camp: from whence after he had licensed Publius to depart, and staid there some few daies, untill his forces which were at Coryra could overtake him, he called his Council together to resolve, Whether he should keep on his journey directly, and make way through the midst of his enemies where they lay encamped, or rather without any such

A such attempt (which could not but carry with it great pain and perill) fetch a compass about with safety, and to enter into Macedony by the way of the Dardaniens country and Lingus. And verily, this latter course of the twain had taken place, but that he feared, when he were retired once far from the sea, and had let the enemy slip out of his hands, if the King haply were minded (as he had done before) to defend himself within the deserts and forests, that he should spend all the long summer and do no good. Therefore come what would of it, he resolved to assail the enemy in that very place as difficult as it was, with all the disadvantage whatsoever. But as they determined in their intention thus to do, so they were not so ready in the means to execute and effect the same. Thus they sat still and spent forty daies within the eye of the enemy, and made no attempt. Then Philip conceived some hope to assaye a peace, by the means and intercession of the Epitot B nation. And after consultation had there were certain agents chosen for that purpose to wit, Pan-fanias the Prætor, and Alexander Generall of the horse: who brought the Consul and the King together for to pass unto a place whereas the river Aous is narrowest, and the banks nearest together. The demands of the Consul in sum were these: That Philip should remove his garrisons out of the Cities Item, That whose territories or towns he had pilld and spoiled, he should make restitution again unto them all those things that were extant and to be found: as for the rest, they should be prized and valued indifferently to their worth. Philip made answer again, "That all those peeces were not of like quality and condition. As for such as he had taken himself, he would be content to set them at liberty: but for those that were left unto him by his progenitors and predecessors, he would not forgo the possession thereof, since he held them lawfully in right of inheritance. Finally, if those Cities wherewith he had warred made complaint, that they were ever endamaged by him, he would report himself to what Cities and States they would themselves, and stand to their award, so they were neutrals, or in peace as well with the one side as the other. The Consul hereunto replied and said, That for this matter it was needless to refer themselves to the arbitrement or doom of any. For who seeth not evidently (quoth he) that he hath done the wrong who first took arms? And that Philip before ever that he was molested and troubled by any war from others, offered violence first unto all? After, when it was debated what Cities should be set free, the Consul named first of all Thessalonicas at which word the King was in such a heat of choler that he cried out aloud, "What harder condition O Quintus would you impose upon him that you had vanquished? and withall, he sung away in a chase from off the place of meeting and interview, and would no longer parle. And much ado they had on both sides to hold their hands from shooting one at another, for the river ran in the midst between them that they could not tryt out by the ears. The morrow after there passed many light skirmishes between the corps de guard on both parts by way of excursions, first in a plain that lay out broad enough for that purpose: but afterwards as the Kings men retired themselves into the narrow straights and rough fugged places, the Romans of an ancient desire to be fighting, entered thither soon after. The Romans had on their side the benefit of good order and military discipline and were furnished with such kind of weapons as were fit for to maintain a skirmish in a set battell. The enemies again for their parts had the vantage of the ground, and the help of sundry engines cast forth shot far off (as ballists and catapults) planted and ranged almost upon every cliff and rock as it had been upon the walls of a City. After they had on both sides given and taken many a wound, so as divers of them were left slain on the earth, as if they had fought in a full battell. At length parted them asunder.

Things thus standing in these terms, there hapned a certain herdsman sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epitots to be brought before the Consul: who gave him to understand that he kept cattell grazing in that Forrest (which then was overspread with the Kings pavillion) and knew all the banks, all the windings, turnings, and blind waies of those mountains: promising, that if he would send out a band of souldiers with him, he would conduct them thorow a place that was neither dangerous nor yet difficult and hard of ascent: which if they had once gained, they should browe their enemies heads and able to command them. And these things (quoth he) if you truly relye upon: for Charopus willed me to make declaration, That he could with you the Consul were Master of all rather than any other. The Consul was desirous to beleieve all, but doubt notted him. And thus being troubled in spirit, whiles he entertained in his heart both joy and fear together, at length the authority of Charopus induced him to resolve and give the adventure of this hope thus offered and presented unto him. And to the end that the enemy might distrust and suspect nothing, for two daies following he never ceased to assail and provoke him, sending companies of armed souldiers in every place, to charge upon him, and ever seconding them with fresh men as succed in the place of the wearied. After this, he delivered to a Tribune or Colonel four thousand chosen footmen, and three hundred horsemen: with this direction, to lead forward the Cavalry, as far as the ground would give leave: and when they were come to a place where the horsemen could not pass nor march farther, then to plant them in some plain and even ground: willing the footmen to march on as the guide should lead them, and point out their way. But after they were mounted above the enemies heads, according as he understood and made promise, then to give a sign by smok, and not to shout and to set up a cry untill one might see the smoke of battell by him given, the battell was begun. And the Consul gave commandment to march by night (for as good hap was, the Moon was at full, and shone through cloudy) and take their recreation and sleep in the day time. As for the guide aforesaid, he

he made unto him many fair and large promises, if it might appear, that he meant truth, and dealt faithfully: howbeit in the mean time he delivered him bound to the custody of the said Colonel. When these companies were thus sent away, the Roman Generall travelled and endeavoured so much the more to gain vantage of the enemies guards. All this while, the Romans that were sent out with the Colonel, marched forward: and upon the third day, when they had given token by smoke, that they had won the pitch of the hill as they intended, and held it still: then the Consul divided his forces into three squadrons, and entred the midst of the valley with the main strength of his army, but he led forth the wings of his battell, both the right and the left, against the very camp of the enemies. Who also for their parts were not behind to re-encounter and receive him. And all the whiles that they advanced without their fortifications of defence upon a hot desire of conflict, it fell out, that the Roman souldier had the better a good deal, as being more valourous, more skilful, and better appointed with weapons for that kind of service. But after that the Kings souldiers, whoe many were wounded or killed outright, retired themselves to places of safety, either by natural situation or by art of man, the danger returned upon the Romans heads, who inconsiderately were engaged into places of disadvantage, and into narrow streights, from whence they could not retire with ease. And surely they had not returned back again unpunished for their rashness, but that the Kings men hearing first an outcry behind their backs, and seeing also a skirmish begun, were astonished at the sudden terror, and put besides themselves. Some fled here and there away; others that made a stand and tarried still, for that they rather wanted ground to flee than had heart enough to fight it out, were environed by their enemies both before and behind. The whole army might have been utterly defeated, if the winners had lustily followed the chase. But the straights and the roughness of the waies hindered the horse, and the weight of armor cumbered the footmen. At first the King rode amain with bridle in horse neck, without regard of any thing, or looking behind him: but after he was got five miles before & guessing (as it was indeed) that by reason of the disadvantage of the place the enemy could not possible make way after, he rested upon a certain mount and sent his people all abroad over hills and dales, to rally his souldiers together that were dispersed. Thus with the loss not all out of two thousand men, the rest of the multitude met together, as if they had repaired to a Rendezvous upon some signal given. & so marched with a great train into Thessaly. The Romans pursued them as far as they might with safety, killing them, and rifling the dead, yea and ransacked the Kings camp which though it were naked without defendants, yet for the difficult access unto it, they had much trouble to win: & that night they lodged in their own camp. The next day the Consul made pursuit after the enemy along the straight, whereas the river runneth among the vallies. The King came the first day unto the hold or camp of Pyrhus (a place so called in Triphilia, belonging to the territory of Melotis). From whence the morrow after he made a mighty journey with his whole army (for needs he must go that fear drives) & approached the mountain Lingos. These mountains are in Epirus, situate between Macedony and Thessaly. The side that lieth to Thessaly regardeth the East; that which butteth upon Macedony hath the North directly before it. Covered they are and overspread with abundance of woods; yet so as the very tops do afford open plains and running waters. The King keeping his camp there for certain daies, was much troubled and perplexed in his mind, casting and revolving, whether it were expedient for him to return immediately into his own kingdom, or possible to retire himself into Thessaly. In sum, his resolution was to bring down his army into Thessaly. And so to Tricca he marched the next way he possibly could. From thence he passed in great haste through all the Cities that were in his way. As many men as were able to follow, he forced to quit their habitations and dwelling houses. The towns he set on fire: yet he permitted every one to carry away with him as much as he could of his own goods; all the rest fell to the souldiers share. No manner of cruelty there was, that the very enemy could exercise, but he practised among his own allies. And Philip himself in the execution thereof, grieved not a little, and was vexed at the heart: but alas he could do no other: yet his desire was, in that country which within a while should be possessed by the enemy to save the bodies at leastwise of his associates. In this manner were ransacked & spoiled these towns following, Phacium, Iresia, Eubydrium, Eretia, & Palapharnu. Against his coming to Phera the gates were shut upon him. And because it would ask some time to win that town by assault, and no leisure he had thereto, he gave over that enterprise, & passed into Macedony: for the bruit went that the Stolians also approached. Who having heard of the issue of the battell fought by the river Aous, first wasted and ransacked all the country near unto Spartia and Marra Come (as they call it) and having from thence passed over into Thessaly, won Cymines and Angra with the first assault. Howbeit, a repulse they took at Metropolis, while they harried the fields about it by reason, that the townsmen ran together to the defence of their walls. After this they gave the attempt upon Callithera, where they found the like resistance and violence of the enemies: but there they persisted longer, and gave not over, nay, they drove the enemies that issued forth within their walls, and contenting themselves with that victory, they departed thence seeing no great hope to force the town. Then they won and pilld two villages, Thousma and Alathana. As for Acharra, it was surrendered by composition. And upon the like fear Xymia also was abandoned of her own inhabitants. These Citizens thus driven out of their own houses, stumbled at a venture upon a garrison which was a leading into Asbanania, for the better guard of the forragers that were to purvey corn. This multitude, I say, marching disorderly without armour, pell-mell together, with a sort that were unmeet for war, was hewn in pieces by

by the armed soldiers, and Xynia was sacked, thus left and forsaken as it was. After this, the Aeolians won Cyparissia, a fort and town of strength, well seated for to empeach and command Dolopia. These exploits performed the Aeolians hastily, all in few daies.

Neither rested Aminander nor the Athamians quiet and still, after they heard the news of the prosperous battell which the Romans had fought. But Aminander reposing small trust in his own soldiers, craved of the Consul a small supply of other forces: and as he marched toward Gomphi, he surprized forthwith and forced a town named Phoca, situate between Gomphi and the straight that divide Thessaly from Athamania. From thence he advanced before Gomphi, and assailed the town, which was defended right valiantly for certain daies: but after that he had erected scaling ladders against it, he forced the townmen within, for very fear to yield and render all into his hands. The surrender of this City terrified the Thessalians exceedingly: in such sort, that the Citizens of Argentea, Pharimium, Thimium, Lisium, Stimon, and Lampsum, one after another submitted themselves, with other peeces thereby of small importance.

Whiles the Athamians and Aeolians (secured from all danger of the Macedonians) made spoil and raised again to themselves by the victory of others: whiles Thessaly was pillied and sacked by three armies at once, and knew not their friends from their foes, nor whom to trust: the Consul passed over into the country of Epirus by the way of the Straights which he had opened and made clear by reason that the enemies were fled. And albeit he knew full well which way all the Epirots in general went, and with whom they had sided, excepting only Prince Charopus, yet because he saw them not only careful to make amends and satisfaction, but also willing and forward to do whatsoever he commanded, he esteemed and regarded them by their present state, more than by their demeanor past, and so by shewing himself inclined to mercy and came to pardon a fault, he won their hearts and gained them unto him for the time to come. After this he dispatched messengers to Corcyra, to will that the hulks and ships of burden should put into the gulph of Ambracia, whiles himself travelled by easie journeys: and the fourth day after pitched his tents upon the hill Cercidius: and thither he sent for Aminander to repair with his aids, not for any need he had of his forces, so as much as of his guidance to direct him in his journeys for Thessaly. Most of the Epirots also, for the same intent were received, who voluntarily offered their help and assistance. The first City that he assailed in Thessaly, was Phaleria, wherein there lay a garrison of two thousand Macedonians. Who at first held out and resisted most manfully, and as much as either armor or the walls were able to do, defended themselves. But the assault & battery continuing incessantly both night and day, overcame at length the constant and resolute valour of the Macedonians. For the Consul made this reckoning: That upon this point depended the hearts and dispositions of all the other Thessalians, if the first should not be able to abide the violence and force of the Romans. Phaleria was no sooner won, but there came Embassadors from Metropolis and Piera to render up their Cities into his hands, who craved pardon and obtained it. Phaleria was burnt and sacked. From thence he set forward to Aginum, but seeing the place defensible with any small garrison and in manner impregnable, he bestowed some small store of darts upon the next corps de guard, and turned his army toward the country against Gomphi, and from thence he marched down into the Plains of Thessaly. And because his army was dispersed of all necessities (for that he had forbore to make spoil in the territories of the Epirots) after he had sent out espies afore, to discover whether the hulks above said were arrived at Ambracia or Ambracia, he sent out his companies one after another to Ambracia, for to survey corn and victuals. The way between Gomphi and Ambracia, as it is lumberous and hard for passage, so again, it is but short and very compendious: So that within few daies he had transported certain convoies of wheat: from the port of Ambracia, whereby the camp was stored with plenty of all provision. From thence he passed to Rhodes, a town almost ten miles distant from Larissa. The Citizens thereof are descended from Perrhabia, and the City is self seated upon the river Peneus. The Thessalians were nothing afraid at the first coming of the Romans. As for Philip, like as he durst not himself in person march forward into Thessaly, so having taken a place within Tempe, which he held with a standing camp, he espied into what quarters the enemies intended to go, and even as he could find opportunity and advantage, sent underhand succour and relief thither accordingly.

Much about the same time that the Consul first encamped against Philip in the Straights of Epirus, L. Quinctius also, the Consul his brother, who by commission from the Senat had the charge of the fleet and the government of all sea-coasts, sailed beyond Corcyra with two Gallies of five banks of oars: and hearing that the navy was departed from thence, seeing also there was no staying there, he made sail after apace, and having overtaken them at the Isle Zamma he dismissed Apollonius in whose place he succeeded: from thence he went fair & softly, haling after him the most part of the ships which followed with the provision of victuals, untill he came to Malea. From whence, when he had given order, that the rest should make as good speed as possibly they could after him, he went with three Quinquereines lightly appointed, and arrived before at Pyræum, where he received the other ships that L. Apollonius the Lieutenant had left there for the guard and defence of Athamania.

At the same time there were two Armadoes set out of Asia, the one conducted by King Antiochus, consisting of four and twenty sail of Quinquereines: the other were of Rhodians, and stood of twenty coverd ships with decks and hatches, commanded by Agemobrotus the Admirall. These

These fleets joyned together about the Island. And so crossed the narrow sea from thence to Euboea. And first they foraged the territory of the Carystians: afterwards seeing Corinth strong enough against them by reason of a garrison sent to them in all haste from Chalcis, they approached not to Ererie. L. Quintus having intelligence that King Antalus was come, repaired thither also with those vessels which had been at Pyraeum, & gave commandment, that as many ships arrived thither belonging to his fleet, should bend their course for Euboea. Now was Ererie by all forcible means assaulted, for not only the vessels of three joyned navies had brought thither all sorts of engines and artillery devised for to shake and batter the walls of Cities, but also the fields and country hard by, yielded them plenty of timber, and other matter to make new. The towns-men from the very first day shewed no valour and courage in defending their walls: and afterwards when they were wearied, and some of them hurt, and saw withall a part of their wall overthrown by the ordnance and engines of the enemy, inclined to yield: but they had amongst them a garrison of Macedonians, whom they feared no less than the Romans. Moreover, Philotas a Captain under the King, sent messengers unto them from Chalcis, assuring them, that if they could hold out still and endure the siege, he would in good time be with them, and bring relief. Thus hope and fear together constrained them to drive off longer than either they were willing or well able to do. But when they heard once that Philotas had a repulse by the way, and in great haste and fear was retired and fled to Chalcis again, then immediately they sent their Embassadors unto Antalus, to crave pardon and protection. Whiles they were wholly bent to seek peace (whereof they had some hope) and forelacked the affairs of war-service, opposing their corps de guard on that side only of the wall where the breaches were, and neglecting all besides, behold, Quintus in the night-season gave a camissado in that quarter which was least suspected, and with scaling ladders won the town. The whole multitude of the inhabitants fled with their wives and children into the Castle, which also afterwards was tended up. As for money, gold, and silver, there was no great store to speak of: but images, and painted tables of antique work, artificially wrought, and such like ornaments, there were more found, than for the proportion of the bigness, or other wealth besides, of such a City as that was. From thence they set sail, once again for Carystus, where the whole multitude before the enemies were put on land, having abandoned the City, were fled into their fortress: from whence they sent their Orators unto the Roman Generall, humbly craving their mercifull protection. The towns-men presently had their lives and libertie granted them. But the Macedonians were put to their ransom and they compounded to pay $\text{three hundred silver sesterces}$ apiece, and to give up their armour and weapons, and so to depart: With this sum of money having redeemed themselves they were set out disarmed into Boeotia. These forces at sea having in few daies gained two noble and renowned Cities in Euboea, coasted about Sunium, a promontory or cape within the territory of Attica, and arrived before Cenchree, a town of merchandise and traffick belonging to the Corinthians.

The Consul all this while had a longer and more dangerous piece of service in the siege (of Rhagus) than all men looked for. And the enemies within made resistance, where he would have least of all suspected. For he supposed verily that all the trouble and difficulty would be in battering down the wall, & making some breach. For thus he thought that if he had once opened way for his armed souldiers to enter into the town, the enemies afterwards would either flee or be slain, as it falleth out commonly in Cities when they are forced. Howbeit, when part of the wall by the battery of the Ram lay flat along, and the enemies were got over at the breaches & ruins thereof: then began their labour and pains anew, as if they had had no trouble nor toil a fore. For the Macedonians in garrison, who were many in number, and those approved and select souldiers, thinking how honourable a service it would be to defend the City by valour and dint of sword, rather than by the strength of walls had ranged themselves in a battell within, strongly marshalled into many ranks and files close together, and when they perceived the Romans were mouning over the breaches to enter the City, they repelled and beat them back in that place of great disadvantage, where they had much ado to recover and retire themselves. The Col. hereat was much displeased, and vexed in him self: and making this account, that such a foul foil and disgrace was not only an occasion of a longer tract of time, before he could force that one City: but also material and important for the main progress and proceeding of the whole war, which commonly depended upon the occurrences of light matters and of small moment in the beginning: after he had rid and cleaned the place which was choaked up with the ruins of the half-broken wall lying there upon heaps, he reared a tower or frame of timber of a huge height to overtop the walls, consisting of many stories and floors one over another, which contained and carried a mighty number of armed men, and drave the same upon wheels and rollers close to the wall. Moreover, he sent out certain ensignes, one after another by turns, to break through by force (if it were possible) that strong and close battailon of the Macedonians (which they themselves call Rhalanx). But the place being so streight (for that the breach of the wall was nothing broad) the enemies had the vantage both in regard of the weapons which they used, and of the form of battell wherein they were ranged. For when the Macedonians standing close one to another with a continued roof or fence of targets over their heads, opposed their pikes before them which were of an exceeding length: the Romans neither with their darts could hurt them a far off, nor with their swords drawn come near them to fight close at hand, or cut their pikes in twos: and if it chanced that they whipt off or snapt any a funder, yet the steel and trunk of them thereof

A thereof being sharp still at the point (headless though it were) among the other pikes that were headed, served to make a fence as it were an hay or pallisade. Over and besides that part of the wall that stood whole and sound still, was a sure defence unto both flanks of the enemies: neither had the Romans any room at length to return, and from thence to fetch their beir, and so give a violent charge, which is the thing that usually breaketh and disordereth ranks. Moreover, there chanced one thing by meer fortune that encouraged them within: for as the tower aforesaid was in driving over a terrass or bank whereof the floor was not fast and soundly hardned with the rammer, one of the wheels hapned to sink in and make a deep rout in the ground, whereby the whole frame nodded so forward, that the enemies without thought verily it was ready to fall, and the armed souldiers standing upon it within, quaked for fear, and were put well-near besides their wits.

B Thus when nothing that was provided might avail and come to any great effect, the Consul was vexed at the heart, to see himself so over-matched in souldiers, in armour, and in manner of service; and withall he considered, that he had no help to force the City and to win it in any short time, nor could make means to pass the winter in those parts so far from sea, and left naked already and waste by those calamities that follow wars. Whereupon he raised the siege: and because there was no haven in all the tract and coast of Acarmania and Etolia, which was able both to receive and harbour all his hulks that brought victuals for his army, and also to yield winter lodging for his legions; he thought upon the Isle Anticyra within the country of Phocis; which lying toward the gulph of Corinth, seemed to him most fit and commodious for his purpose; because they should not remove far from Thessaly, and the territories belonging to the enemies having besides Peloponnesus affront even over against them, divided but by a small arm of the sea: as their back Etolia and Acarmania: and of each side Locris and Bœtia. At the first assault, the Consul without any resistance won Panopea in Phocis. Anticyra likewise long endured not the siege. Then Ambrysus and Hyampolis were received by composition. Daulis by reason that it was situate upon an high hill could neither be scaled nor forced by instruments and engines of battery.

C But the Romans by lancing their darts and shooting arrows against them that were in guard, trained them forth to skirmish; and after some light scuffings to no effect, whiles one while they seemed to flie, and other whiles to pursue, they brought them to be so careless, so negligent and so little respective, that when the enemies fled back within the gate, they entered pell-mell with them, and so were Masters of the town. Other small forts likewise of Phocis yielded rather for fear than any force offered unto them. Elæia kept their gates shut, and made a countenance, that unless they were driven thereunto, they would receive within their walls neither Roman captain nor army.

D While the Consul lay at the siege before Elæia, there was presented unto him the hope of a greater matter, namely, of withdrawing the nation of the Achaes from the Kings alliance to the amity of the Romans. For they had expelled and banished Cycliades the chief of that faction that sided with Philip: and Aristhenus who friended the Romans and sought to be confedered with them, was Prætor for the time.

Now the Roman Attalus, together with Attalus and the Rhodians, rode at anchor in the haven of Cenchrea, and they all were agreed in common to assail Corinth. But the Consul thought good, before that they should put that designment in action, to send Embassadors to the State of Achaia, promising, if they would revold from the King and turn to them, to deliver Corinth into their hands, for to be incorporate into the ancient league and councill of their nation. And so by the advice of the Consul, there were Embassadors addressed to the Achæans from his brother L. Quintius, from Attalus, the Rhodians and the Athenians. And at Sicyone was there a Councill and Diet held for to give them audience. Now the Achæans were not all of one mind and alike affected. The Athenians (a dangerous, an ordinary, and continuall enemy of theirs) put them in fear of one side: the Romans they had in dread and horreur of another. To the Macedonians they were obliged and bound by many good turns and favours, as well old as new. The King himself they held in jealousie for his cruelty and treachery: and casting a proof and conjecture by those

F courtes which he then took, and by his practises for the time, they foresaw well, that after the war ended he would be intollerable and a very tyrant over them. They were besides not only ignorant, what every man had said in the severall counsels of every particular State, and in the general Diets of the whole nation, when they were required to deliver their opinions; but also uncertain and unresolute among themselves in their own minds what to will or wish. Unto men thus doubtfully disposed and unsettled, the Embassadors aforesaid were admitted, and license was given them to deliver their message. First, the Roman Embassador L. Calpurnius: after him, those that were for King Attalus: and in the third place, the Rhodians spake and made discourse: and consequently, the Embassadors of Philip were permitted to speake. The Athenians had audience given them last of all, and were reserved of purpose to confute whatsoever should be spoken and alledged by the Macedonians. And these Athenians inveighed most sharply and bitterly against the King, for none had received either more wrongs, or suffered the like indignities at his hands as they had. So this assembly verily for that time (by reason that the day was spent in hearing the continued orations of so many Embassadors) brake up about sun-setting. The morrow after they assembled again: where the Magistrates by the voice of the Beadle or publike crier (after the custome of the Greeks,) gave liberty to every person to deliver his mind, and no man stepped forth. Great silence there was, and not a word among them for a long time, looking wistly wisly one upon another who should begin first. And no marvell if they whose spirits were afflic-med in some sort within them; when they of their own accord cast and tossed in their minds things so different and contrary, were now more troubled and perplexed by those orations besides that had lasted all the long day, broaching, uttering, & advising many matters so harsh, so difficult, and unpleasant unto them. At length, because the Councill should not be dissolved without some speech and parl, Arifthenus the Prator of the Achæans began to speak, and said: "What is become (my Masters of Achaia) of those hearts of yours and couragious stomacks, whereby at all your feasts and in your private meetings (when talk is ministred of Philip and the Romans) you can hardly hold your hands, but are ready to fly one in anothers face? And now, when as this honourable Cour of Parliament is published & holden for the same purpose only; when ye have heard the reasons & allegations of the Embassadors of all parts; when the Magistrats propound I the matter to be debated in council; when the publike crier calleth you to give your opinions, ye are mum and mute? If the regard of the common good and welfare of us all, will not cause you to open your lips; cannot the private respects and affections neither (which have enclined and carried your minds to the one side or the other) fetch out a word from any of your mouths?

 Considering especially, that no man is so gross and blockish, who can be ignorant that now is the very time or never for each one to say and deliver his mind as he will himself, and as he thinketh best, before we resolve and determine of any course: and when a decree or act is once passed, that all men are bound (even they themselves that before misliked it) to defend and maintain the same, as a good and profitable accord. This admonition of the Prator was so far short of drawing any one of them to utter his opinion, that it caused not so much as the least noise or humming in so frequent an auditory and congregation of so many States together. Then Arifthe-nus the Prator began again and followed his speech in this manner. "It seemeth (my Masters and friends of Achaia here assembled) that ye are not so much to seek for counsell and advice, but ye are as short of your tongues and loath to speak. And every one here is unwilling to provide for their generall good for fear least he should incur some particular perill. My self likewise peradventure would be silent and hold my peace if I were a private person: But now being Prator, I see thus much: That either there should have no audience at all been given unto the Em-bassadors, or else, that they ought not to be sent away from hence without an answer: and answer them how can I without your ordinance? now seeing that there is none of you all, who have been summoned hither to this Councill, that either will or dare say a word to the cause: I will examine thoroughly and consider well in lieu of your opinions, those speeches which yesterday were pronounced by the Embassadors: let us (I say) revise them so, as if they had not demanded those things which concerned their own good and commodity, but as though they proposed such points they esteemed profitable and expedient for us all. The Romans, the Rhodians, and King Antiochus require our alliance and amity: and in that war which they wage against Philip they think it reason to be aided from us. Philip again putteth us in mind of our society with him and of our oath. One while he requireth us to stand and band with him: otherwhiles, he saith he will be content that we should sit still, and meddle neither one way nor other. Is there no man here knoweth the reason, why they that are not yet our allies demand and crave more than he that is our ally already? It is neither the modesty of Philip, nor the impudency of the Romans that is the cause hereof. The ports and haven-towns they be of Achaia, which minister confidence and assurance to those demanders, and take away the same from them again.
 From Philip we see nothing but only an Embassador. The sea-forces of the Romans and their fleet, ride in the harbor of Cenchrea: they carry afore them in shew the spoiles of the Cities in Euboea. The Consul himself with his land-army of the legions we see disjoyned from us by a small arm only of the sea, ranging at their pleasure all over Phocis and Locris. Marvell now longer if you can, why Cleomedon the Embassador of Philip demanded erewhile so coldly and diffi-dently, that we should take arms for the King against the Romans: who, if we by vertue of the same league and oath, wherewith he seemed to charge us in conscience, required of him again, that Philip should defend us both from Nabis and the Lacedæmonians, and also from the Romans; would be to seek not only of a garrison and power of armed men to shield us, but likewise of a very answer to shape us. And verily he would be no more ready to satisfie us, than Philip was himself the last year: who notwithstanding he frankly promised to levy war against Nabis & thereby assailed to train and draw the flower of our youth from hence into Euboea, after that he saw once that we neither agreed to send him that power, nor yet were willing to entangle our selves & be interested in the Roman war; forgot soon that society that now he stan-deth and vanteeth so much of, and left us to the mercy and devotion of Nabis and the Lacedæmonians to be spoiled, pilld, & wasted at their pleasures. And surely so much as I can conceive of Cleomedon his Oration methinks it hangeth not well together and one peece thereof sorteth not well with another. He seemeth to speak of the Roman war contemptuously: as if it were a matter of nothing; saying the event & issue thereof would be like the former, which they maintained with Philip. How is it then, that he keepeth himself away, and in his absence demandeth our help rather than with his personall presence protecteth us both from Nabis & the Romans?
 Yes, I say, his ancient allies? But what speak I of us? Why hath he suffered them to re-force and win Euboea and Cynus? Why endured he, that so many Cities of Thessaly should be lost?
 How could he abide Locris and Phocis to be over-run so as they are? And Elaris now at this day

- A "day so freightly besieged, and horly assaulted? Why quit he the freights of Epirus, and abandoned those impregnable holds upon the River Aous, by force, for fear, of his own accord, or howsoever? and when he had forgone and disleised himself of that pais which he held, why retired he into the inland parts of his realm for his safety? If willingly and of his own accord he abandoned so many of his allies, and lets them to be ipoiled and ransacked by the enemy, what can he alledge or say for himself, why those allies aforesaid may not provide for themselves the best they can? If for fear, let him pardon us likewise, if we be afraid. But if he were vanquished by force of arms, and therefore retired back, shall we, good Cleomedon, sustain and endure the Roman puissance and their mighty armies, against which ye Macedonians were not able to stand? Or, would you have us to believe you, that bear us in hand, how the Roman war not at this present, either with greater numbers or stronger forces than they have done heretofore, rather than trust our own eyes, and that which daily we see before our faces? In those daies they succoured the Ætolians with their navy, and warred neither under the conduct, nor with the army of a Consul. The maritime Cities of the confederats of Philip, were then in trouble and tumult: but all the mediteranean parts within the continent, were to secure and fortified from the Roman forces, that Philip spoiled and foraged the Ætolians, imploring and seeking for help of the Romans, but all in vain. But now at this day the Romans having finished the Carthaginian war, which for sixteen years space they supported in the very heart and bowels of Italy, have not sent a garrison to succour and maintain the Ætolians in their wars, but are come themselves, as leaders and commanders General, and by Land and Sea at once have warred upon Macedony. And this is the third Consul of theirs, who at this present mainraineth mortal war upon it, to the uttermost of his power. Sulpicius hath encountred the King in the midst of Macedony, bidden him battel, discomfired and put him to flight, after he had laid wast and desolat the wealthiest quarter of all his Kingdom. Quintius lately hath driven him out of camp and field, notwithstanding he were possessed of the freight avenues of Epirus, and bare himself boldly and confidently upon the natural situation of the grounds, of his strong defences, and force of a complete army: and having pursued him as he fled into Thessaly, hath taken the garrison Towns of the King, and in manner within his own sight, won by mere force his conederate Cities. Suppose and say, that all those things which the Athenians erewhile have alledged concerning the cruelty, the avarice, and unbridled lust of the King, be not true, but supposed slanders: admit that those enormities and wicked parts committed within the Attick land, against the Gods of Heaven above, of the infernal spirits beneath, touch not us at all, and are much less pertinent, than those outrages which the Elauntii and the Abydens, so far remote from us, have endured. Forget we our selves, if ye will, the hurts, the wounds, and losses that we have received, the murders, the pilling and rifling of the goods of Messena in the midst of * Peloponnesus. * Moria. Likewise, how his friend and host Garitenes at Cyparissia, was killed against all Law of God and man, even in a manner sitting at the board with meat in his mouth. Say we nothing also of Attalus the father and son, both Sicyonians, who were cruelly massacred, and yet he was wont to call the silly and wretched old man, Father. Also forbear we to speak of the sons wife, who was carried away into Macedony, to make her his harlot and concubine, and to abuse her at his pleasure. Let other rapes of virgins, forcings of honorable dames be forgotten: let us imagine that we have nothing to do, nor to meddle with Philip for fear of whose cruelty ye were all so mute, and could not open your mouth. For what other cause of silence had ye, being called hither to this counsel? Let us put the case, that we were to debate the matter with Antigonus, that most mild and just Prince, at whose gracious hands we have received so many favours and pleasures above all other Kings: would he demand, think ye, that we should do that which possibly then could not be done? Peloponnesus is a demy Island, joined to the firm continent and main land, by the narrow freight or bank of Isthmus, lying open and exposed to nothing more than to Sea-forces. If one hundred covert and decked ships with hatches, and fifty lighter vessels which are open, together with thirty Brigantins or foists of Issa, should come to pill and spoil our sea coasts, and begin to assail our Towns and Cities that lie open upon the River, even on the very strand and Sea banks: should we retire our selves, think ye, into our Cities within the Land? Why? what else? As though we were not already afflicted and plagued with intestine war, which sicketh even within our ribs and bowels? When Nabis and the Lacedemonians by land, the Roman navy by Sea shall lie upon us, to do us all annoy, how should I call upon the Kings society, or for the help of the Macedonians? Or shall we of our selves, by our own strength and means save our Cities which shall be assaulted against the puissance and power of the Romans? For in the former war we bravely defended (did we not?) the City of Dyma. We have examples enough of the fearful calamities and losses of others, that we need not to make our selves examples unto others. Take heed (I beseech you) how you set light and disdain, that the Romans have of their own motive offered their friendship and alliance, which indeed ye were to wish for, and seek all that ever ye could. It is for very fear (no doubt) that they are driven, being in a strangeland to flie unto you for your alliance, because they would gladly shroud themselves under the shadow of your wings, be harboured within your havens, and sustained by your victual and provision. No, no, Lords they are first of the seas, who can deny it? there is not a land they set foot into, but immediately it is their own, and in subjection unto them: whatsoever they seem to request, they can command if they list. And because they are willing to spare and forbear you, therefore “ therefore it is that they suffer you not to enter into any action that might be cause of your ruin “ and overthrow. For whereas Cleomedon erewhile seemed to shew and lay before you a mean and “ indifferent course, and that forsooth, which should be the safest way that you could take, name“ ly, to enter into no arms at all, to sit still and sleep in a whole skin; that, I say, is no middle way, no, “ nor (to speak truth) any way at all. For besides this, that ye must either accept or refuse the alli“ ance with the Romans, what else wil become of us, but to be a prey unto the conqueror, having “ lost the grace and favour both of the one and the other? as men that like neutrers, expecting the “ issue of the war, frame our designments and counsels to the blind direction of fortune. Well, once “ again I say, take heed you think not scorn of that which with all your heart you should wish & “ pray for, only for that it is tendered and presented unto you. And never think, that because to “ day you have the choise of both in your own hands, therefore ye shall ever have the same liber“ ty hereafter. Occasions & opportunities are not alwaies the same, neither do they continue long.

 “ All this whiles have ye had a desire to save and free yourselves from Philip, but evermore by “ wishes & prayers in secret heart, rather than by taking arms in open hand. Now there are those “ which with great armies & armadoes have passed the seas, who without your pain and peril are “ ready to deliver you from his hands. These men, if ye reject and refuse for your allies, ye are not “ well in your wits, & have them you must either your allies or your enemies, there is no remedy.

After this Oration of the Pretor, there arose a muttering and noise in the assembly, whiles some approved and gave assent unto that which he said, others rebuked in churlish wise those that accorded. Insomuch, as they jangled not one with another in particular, but the very States there assembled were at variance, yea, and this debate between the Magistrates of the whole nation (whom they call Demiurgi, and ten they are in number) was as hotly maintained, as among the multitude. Five of them said, they would propound unto the people, and debate with them in counsel about accepting the alliance of the people of Rome, and put it to voices. The other five protested, that this was directly against a law, in that case provided, forbidding expressly that no Magistrats should either propound or determine ought in any Diet, prejudicial to the society and league with Philip. Thus was this day also spent in debating and wrangling, and nothing done.
 There remained one day yet of a full Diet and Councel, for by law they were to conclude and decree somewhat within three dayes at the farthest. Against that time, the parties were so hotly bent one against the other, that the fathers could hardly forbear to offer violence to their very children. There was one Rhisiastus of Pelleræ, who had a son named Memnon, and he was a Demiurgi, who took part and sided with them that would not permit the matter to be put to questio-on, and determined by a scrutiny of voices. This Rhisiastus having instantly a long time importuned his son, and besought him to suffer the Achæans to provide for their weal publick, and not by his peevish stowardnes undo the state of the whole nation: when he saw once that all his prayers prevailed nothing, he swore a great oath that he would kill him with his own hands, and not take him for his son, but for an errant enemy. By which his menaces, he gained thus much in the end, that content he was the next day to joyn with them that put the matter to question: who now being more in number than the other, made a report, and proposed the cause to the assembly: and when all the States in manner there met, enclined thereto, and approved thereof, so as they avowed openly what they would ordain: the Dymzans, Megapolitans, and certain Argives, before the decree was enacted, rose up all at once, and departed out of the assembly, and no man either wondred at it, or blamed them for it. As for the Megapolitans, no longer ago than in their grand-fires dayes, at what time as they were expelled out of their country by the Lacedemonians, K. An-rignonus had restored them again. The Dymeans being but lately taken prisoners, and ransacked by the Roman army, Philip having given order that they should be redeemed wheresoever they were in slavery and bondage, he not only set free, but also replanted in their own country. The Argives last of all, besides that they are of a settled opinion and belief that the Macedonian Kings are descended from them, were for the most part linked unto Philip in the right and regard of privat hospitality, and familiar friendship. In these respects, they went out of that assembly which inclined to the contract of alliance with the Romans, and were held excused for this departure; being thus obliged unto Philip the adverse part, by great favours and benefits, yea, and those newly received at his hands. All the other States of the Achæans, when they were demanded their opinions, without delay confirmed by their immediat decree, the society with Attalus and the Rhodians: but the league with the people of Rome, because it could not be ratified and established without the Act of the people, was referred and put off until the time that Embassadors might be sent unto Rome. But for the present it was thought good that three Embassadors should be addressed unto L. Quintius, and that all the forces of the Achæans should march toward Corinth, for that Quintius having won the port of Cenchrea, was already at the siege and assault of that City.

These Achæans encamped themselves over against that gate that openeth toward Sicyone: the Romans lay against that part of the City which looketh toward Cenchrea, and Attalus having led his army through the narrow freight of Isthmus, assailed them of Lechaus side, which is an haven of the other Sea. At the first they made no hot assault, hoping that there would be some mutiny between the Towns-men and the Kings garrison. But perceiving they were all of one mind and resolution, and that both the Macedonians defended the City, as their own native country:
 and also the Corinthians were content to be at the full command and direction of Androsthenes the Captain of the garrison, as well as if he had been their fellow-citizen, and lawfully chosen by their

A their own election and suffrages: then the assailants had no other hope but in the violent force of arms and engines. And of all sides they had raised banks and mounds, and were come close to the walls, although with hard access thereto. Now had the Ram, from that quarter where the Romans lay, beaten down a good part of the wall. To which breach, because it lay naked without defence, all the Macedonians ran to guard and defend it by strength of arms: where there was a cruel fight between them and the Romans. At the first the Romans were soon repulsed by means of the great numbers of defendants: but after the succours of the Achæi and Arctus came unto them, they received them with equal valour: neither doubted they but to be able with ease to drive the Macedonians and the Greeks from their standings, and force them to retreat. But there were within the Town a multitude of Italian fugitives revolted and fled from the Romans: part of them, a residue left of Annibal his army: who having transgressed the laws, for fear of punishment were fled from the Romans, and took part with Philip: part also were mariners and seafaring men, who for hope of more honorable intertainment and service, had abandoned their ships, and were gotten into the City of Corinth. These fellows past all hope of life, if the Romans haply should have the better hand, sared more like mad men than hardy and audacious souldiers. Now there is over against Sicyone a promontory of Iune, which they call the Cape of Acree, and it runneth into the Sea: from whence the passage over to Corinth is a cut almost of seven miles. Thither Philocles, a Captain also under King Philip, had conducted through Boeotia 500 souldiers: and certain Brigantines of Corinth were there ready to embark that supply of aid, and to transport them to Lycheus. By this time Arctus advised to let on fire the engines and fabricks that they had made, and presently to give over the siege. Quintus persisted yet more obstinately in his enterprise begun. But he also seeing the Kings guards ranged and quartered at every gate, and that if they should hap to fall out, their violence would hardly be sustained, was of the same mind with Arctus. So without effecting any thing, the Achæians were dismissed, and the rest returned to their ships, Arctus to Piræum, the Romans to Corcyra.

During this service by Sea forces, the (other) Consul who lay in camp before Elate in Phocia, first assaid to gain the City by conference and parly with the principal citizens thereof: but after answer made, that it lay not in their hands, and that they who were for the King, outwent the Towns-men both in number and strength: then at once from all parts he gave an assault unto the City both by force of arms, and also by engines of artillery. The Ram was bent against the walls, and as much thereof beaten down with a mighty crash and fearful noise, as stood between the Towers: whereupon the Town was dismantled and laid naked, and withal a cohort of Roman souldiers entred at the open breach: so as from all parts the defendants abandoned their guards, and ran to that place that thus was distressed by the enemies. And at one instant the Romans advanced themselves over the breach, and set up scaling ladders against the wall which was standing, and while the enemies were amused wholly, and had their eye only upon that one place where the conflict was, the wall in many parts was scaled, and armed souldiers mounted into the City. At which suddain tumult and alarm, the armed men having quit the place which they guarded with a thick troop fled all into the castle for fear: and the unarmed and naked multitude followed after. Thus the Consul was master of the City: which being ransacked, he sent unto the Castle certain messengers, promising life to as many of the Kings garrison as would depart away without arms, and offering liberty to the Elatians: and after security given hereof, within few dayes the Castle also was rendred into his hands. Moreover, by the arrival of Philocles (a commander for the King) in Achaia, not Corinth only was delivered from siege, but the City also of the Argives, was by certain of the principal rulers betrayed unto Philocles, who before had sounded and solicited the minds and affections of the common people. There was a custome in this City that upon the first day of their general assemblies, the Pretor should in token of good luck pronounce the names of Jupiter, Apollo, and Hercules: and afterwards ordained it was besides by a law, that the name of Philip should make up the fourth. Now after the alliance accorded between them and the Romans it hapned that the beadle or publick cryer left out the name of Philip: whereat the multitude first began to mutter and grumble: then arose a loud cry of those that put him in mind to name the King, willing him to give him his honor due by law: until at last his name was also pronounced with great applause and consent. Upon the confidence and assurance of this favour Philocles was sent for, who by night seized upon an hill that commandeth the City, which commonly is called the fort of Larissa, and having put a garrison there, the next morning betimes he advanced forward with banner displayed, and came down toward the common place lying under the fortels aforesaid: where there encountered him a band of armed men well appointed in order of battail. These were the garrison of the Achæi lately there placed, to the number of 500 elect men chosen forth of all the States of Achaia: and one Ensidemus a Dymeian was their commander. Unto him Philocles (one of the Kings Captains aforesaid) addressed a special messenger to persuade and exhort him to quit the City: giving him to understand, That he and his Company were not able to match the Town-men alone, who carried the same mind that the Macedonians had done: much less then should they stand out when the Macedonians were joined unto them: the Macedonians (I say) whom the very Romans themselves could not sustain at Corinth. At first he did no good either with leader or souldier: yea, and when within a while they beheld the Argives also marching armed against them with a great troop from another part, and saw present death before their eyes, yet it seemed they would have put it to the hazard of a conflict, and fought to the last man, in case their Captain would have stuck to it, and not relented. But Ensilinus for fear left together with the City, the flower of all the youth of Achaia should perish, espoused with Philotes, that they might be permitted to depart and go their way: but himself kept his ground till in his armour, with some few of his followers and vassals, and removed not a foot. Then Philotes sent out unto him, to demand, What he meant thereby? Unto whom he gave no other words, but holding forth his shield before him made answer, That armed as he was he would live, and die in the guard and defence of that City which was committed to his charge. Then by the commandment of the Captains, the Thracians lanced their darts and shot at him, and so both he and the company about him were slain every one. Thus after the accord of alliance between the Achaeans and Romans, two most noble and famous Cities (Argi and Corinth) came under the subjection of the King. These were the acts achieved by the Romans as well by Land as Sea this summer.

In France there was no exploit performed worth remembrance by Sext. Aelius the Consul, notwithstanding he had under his government two entire armies: the one that he retained still with him, which by order he should have discharged, and was the same that had before been commanded by L. Cornelius the Pro-consul, and now by him was committed to the charge of C. Aelius: the other, that he brought himself with him into the Province. So that he employed the whole year almost in compelling the men of Cremona and Placentia to return into their Colonies, from whence by sundry casualties of war they were chased and dispersed. As France that year was in quiet beyond all hope and expectation, so about the City of Rome there had like to have been a commotion and tumult of bondslaves. The Carthaginian hostages were in guard and kept at Setia, where they had attending about them (as meet was for the children of the chief Nobles and Princes of Carthage) a mighty train and retinue of servants. The number of them was the greater by occasion of the late African war; during which time and presently after, the Setins also themselves had bought up many of that nation which were taken captives, and came in port-ſle with the rest of the prizes. These having conspired together, sent out certain of their own company to sollicite also the other slaves that were in the territory of Setia, and so forth, as many as they could find about Norba and Circelii. Their plot was, that when all things were provided aforehand, they should upon the very day of the solemn games and plaies (which shortly were to be exhibited and set forth in Setia) take the opportunity of the time, when as the people were busy in beholding the spectacle and shew repented unto their eye, and to run upon them: and when they had by massacre in this suddain hurlyburly possessed themselves of Setia, then to go forward and surprise Norba and Circelii. This horrible complot and conspiracy was detected, and information given at Rome to L. Cornelius Merula Pretor at that time of the City. For two bondslaves early in a morning before day, presented themselves unto him, and opened from point to point in order, namely, what had been contrived and done, and what remained yet to do. The Pretor having taken order for their safe custody at home within his own house, called the Senate together; where, after he had recounted and declared unto them what these informers had revealed, he was commanded to go abroad to search out and repress this conspiracy. Forth he marched with five Lieutenants of the camp, and look how many he could meet with in his way all over the fields, villages, and hamlets, he rendered unto them a military oath, and constrained them to arm and follow him. Thus in this hasty manner of levy, he armed well neer 2000, and with them all together (who knew not whither he meant to go, nor to what peece of service he led them) to Setia he came. At his first entrance, he suddainly in great hast apprehended the principal heads of the conspiracy; whereupon the slaves fled out of the Town. Then were sent out certain into the fields, to trace and to find them out by their tracks. In this business there were two bondslaves and one free man that performed singular good service. Unto him the LL. of the Senate gave order, that there should be paid 100000 Asles in brass coin: but unto the slaves 25000 and their freedom. For the redemption of whom, their masters were contented their full price out of the Chamber of the City. Nor long after, it was reported that the remnant of this conspiracy purposed to surprise Preneſte. Thither marched L. Cornelius the Pretor of the City, where he executed about 500 persons who were found guilty. The City was in great fear to see how the hostages and captives of the Carthaginians practised such troubles. Therefore in Rome a standing watch was kept in every street: and the inferior Magistrats were charged to see to it and to walk the round, and the Triumvirs likewise (or three Sheriffs) to have a better eye and look to the Quarry-prison. The Pretor also directed his letters into all quarters of the Latin nation to this effect, That all the hostages should be kept within doors, and not suffered to go abroad into the streets; that all captives and prisoners should have gyves about their heels of ten pound weight at least, and be kept in no other ward but in the common goal.

The same year came Embassadors from King Attalus, who presented in the Capitol a golden Crown of 246 pound weight, with great thanksgiving unto the Senate, that King Antiochus in regard of the authority and countenance of the Roman Embassadors, had withdrawn his forces out of the confines of Attalus. The same summer two hundred men of arms, ten Elephants, and 200000 Modii of wheat sent from King Masaniſſa, arrived at the camp in Greece. Likewise out of Sicily and Sardinia, there was sent great store of victual and liveries for the army. In Sicily M. Marcellus was L. Governour, and in Sardinia M. Porcius Cato, an upright man and living without touch and reproach, save only he was thought somewhat too severe in restraining of luxury.

A usury. He banished out of that Island all usurers: he abridged also and cut off clean, the charges which the allies were wont to defray for the entertainment of the Pretor.

Sext. Atilius the Consul being returned to Rome out of France in regard of the general assembly for election of Magistrats, created Consuls Cn. Cornelius Cethegus and Q. Minutius Rufus. And two daies after, the election was held for Pretors. This year first were chosen six Pretors, by reason that the number of Provinces encreased, and the Roman Empire and Seignory extended farther. And these were they, to wit, L. Manlius Volso, Cn. Sempronius Tuditanus, M. Sergius Silius, M. Helvius, M. Minutius Rufus, and L. Atilius. Of these, Sempronius and Helvius were Ædiles of the Commons; Q. Minutius Thermus and T. Sempronius Longus Ædiles of the chair. The Roman games this year were four times renewed. Cn. Cornelius and Q. Minutius being Consuls, above all things went in hand with the Provinces of Consuls and Pretors: and first they dispatched those that concerned the Pretors (a matter that might be decided by casting lots.) To Sergius fell the jurisdiction of the City, and to Minutius the forein, over strangers. Atilius was appointed to Sardinia, Manlius to Sicily, Sempronius to that part of Spain between Italy and Iberus; and Helvius unto the other beyond the River.

Six Pretors first created,

When the Consuls were upon the point to cast lots likewise for their provinces; namely, Italy and Macedony, L. Oppius, and Q. Fulvius Tribuns of the Commons, interposed themselves and staid them, alledging, "That Macedony was a province lying far off, and there was no one thing that had more impeached and hindred the proceeding of wars to that day than this, That in so remote parts, the Consul ever of the former year was called home before he were settled in his affairs, and when he should be employed most in wars. Now have there four years already gone over our heads, since we decreed and concluded, to follow the Macedonian war; during which time, Sulpitius spent the greater part of his year, in seeking after the King and his army; Villius, when he should encounter the enemy, was called away before he had effected any exploit; as for Quintius, he was kept at Rome till for the most part of the year, in attendance about Church-matters and sacrifices: howbeit the affairs of wars under his conduct were managed so well, that if either he had gone sooner into his province, or the winter had been later, he might have dispatched the wars there: and now, that he is ready to retire into his standing camp and wintring harbors, the report is, that he hath brought the war to that good pass and forwardness, that unless he be not hindred by a new successor, in all likely-hood and apparence, he will make a final end thereof the next summer."

D With these speeches they prevailed so much, that the Consuls for their part promised to be ordered and set down by the Senat in this behalf, upon condition, that the Tribuns would be content to do the like. Now when of both sides, they had referred themselves to a free and absolute consultation, the LL. of the Senat assigned to both the Consuls the government of Italy, and continued the command of the army still with T. Quintius, until there came another to succeed him. Two legions were appointed for the Consul, with commission to war upon the Gauls between Rome and the Alps, who had revolted from the people of Rome. And for Quintius ordained it was, that there should be sent into Macedony unto him, a new supply of 5000 foot, 300 horse, and 3000 sea-servitors and mariners. And likewise, that the same L. Quintius Flaminius should be Admiral of the navy, as before. For the Pretors who were to go into Spain, there was an allowance of 8000 footmen out of the allies of the Latin nation, and 400 horsemen, so that they dismissed the old souldiers out of Spain: and enjoined they were to limit and set out the bounds of their severall provinces, whereas the higher Spain and the lower should part. And for Macedony there were two Lieutenants more for the army appointed, to wit, P. Sulpitius and P. Villius, who had been Consuls both, and in that province.

Before that either Consuls or Pretors went out into their provinces, it was thought good to take order for the prodigious tokens which hapned. For at Rome the Temple of Vulcan and Saturnus, at Fregella, the wall and a gate of the City, were stricken with lightning. At Frusino it appeared light (as it had been clear day) in the night season. At Asculum a Lamb was yeained having two heads and five feet. Also at Formie two wolves entered into the Town, and worried somewhat were in their way. Last of all, at Rome there was a wolf, that not only came into the City, but went forward as far as to the Capitol.

C. Atilius a Tribun of the Commons proposed a law, that there should be five Colonies conducted to the Sea side, and there planted: two at the mouth of the Rivers Vulturnus and Liternus, one at Paucoli, another in the Burrough Town of Salernum, and to make the fift * Buxantum was assigned to the rest. Into every Colony order was taken, that there should be thirty households sent. The three Commissaries, called Triumvirs, for the conducting of these Colonies were created: namely, M. Servilius Geminus, Q. Minutius Thermus, and T. Sempronius Longus. These three had commission to continue in the charge of this office three years. After the manner, and all other matters accomplished, pertaining to God and man, that were by the Consuls to be performed, then they set forward both, into their provinces. Cornelius took his way directly against the Insubrians, who accompanied with the Cenomans, were entred at that time into arms: Q. Minutius in his journey bare on the left hand of Italy toward the nether sea: and conducting his army to Genoa, began with the Ligurians to make war. Clefidium and Litubium, Towns both of the Ligurians, likewise two States of the same nation, the Cesclars and the Cerdiciars surrendered unto him, inasmuch as all the country on this side the Po, were in subjection to the Romans,

Romans, except the Boians among the Gauls, and the Illuats among the Ligurians. By report H there were fifteen Towns containing twenty thousand men, which yielded unto them. From thence he led the legions into the territory of the Boians. The army of the Boians had passed over the Po a little before, and joined with the Insubrians and Cænomans: for hearing that the Consul would war jointly with both their forces, they intended likewise to make themselves more strong, by uniting and bringing their power together. But the bruit being blown abroad, that once of the Consuls invaded and fired the country of the Boians, presently there arose a tumult. For the Boians demanded, that they all in general would help them in their distress. The Insubrians refused and said, That they would not abandon their own confines: by which occasion they distended. The Boians went to the defence of their own country, and the Insubrians with the Cænomans, sat them down upon the banks of the River Minusio. Five miles beneath that place, the Consul Cornelius also encamped himself near the said River: from whence he sent certain messengers all about the villages, and to Brixia, the head City of that nation: and being advertised sufficiently that the youth was up in arms, without the warrant and consent of their ancients; and that the Cænomans joined not with the Insubrians in their rebellion by vertue of public counsel and authority: he sent for the principal persons among them, and began to labour and deal with them, that the Cænomans would forsake the Insubrians, and openly with their ensigns advanced, either to return into their own country, or turn to the Romans. This they could not bring them to: howbeit they assured the Consul, that in the field they would either sit still and do nothing, or else, if any good opportunity was presented unto them, they would aid the Romans. The Insubrians knew nothing of this complot: and yet, some doubt and suspicion they had, that their allies balked, and were not found of all four: and therefore when there was occasion to lead forth to fight a field, they durst not trust them with either of the two wings and points of the battel, for fear if they recreated like false brethren, they should hazard the main chance: but placed them behind the ensigns in the reergard. The Consul in the beginning of the battel vowed a Temple to Juno Sospita, in case he discomfited the enemies that day, and put them to the rout. The soldiers set up a shout, and cried aloud that they would bring it to pass that the Consul should have his desire, and therewith charged the enemy right fiercely. The Insubrians could not abide the first shock. Some write, that in the very conflict the Cænomans also suddenly set upon their back, whereby they were distressed and in danger both before and behind; and that there were slain enclosed in the midst five and thirty thousand of the enemies, and seven hundred taken prisoners, and among them Amilcar the General of the Carthaginians, who was the cause of this war: also that there were a hundred and thirty ensigns carried away, and of chariots above two hundred. All the Towns that followed this revolt, yielded to the Romans.

Manlius the Consul, at the beginning made excursions into the country of the Boians, wasting and spoiling it all over: but afterwards when they had forsaken the Insubrians, and were retired home to defend and save their own, he kept himself within camp, making full account to tie a set battel with the enemy. Neither would the Boians for their part have been behind, but ready to have answered them, had not the rumor of the Insubrians overthrow, daunted and broken their hearts. Whereupon they forsook their leader, quit the camp, and bestowed themselves in the Towns and Villages to guard every man his own, and quite altered the course of their enemy his war, and put him besides his account. For the Consul lost all hope now to determine the quarrel in one ranged battel, began again to forrage the fields, burn all buildings, and force Towns by assault. Much about the same time Clasidium was set on fire. And from thence the legions were conducted against the Illuats among the Ligurians, who only stood out and would not come in, and yield obedience. Which nation likewise hearing that the Insubrians were defeated in a battel, and that the Boians were so scared, that they durst not venture the fortune of a field, submitted themselves. At the same time the letters of the Consuls, containing their happy affairs in France, were brought to Rome. M. Sergius the Pretor of the City first read them in the Senat, and afterwards by the advice of the Senate, rehearsed them in a full audience and assembly of the people. And a procession was decreed for the space of four daies.

Now was winter come, and whiles T. Quimius after the winning of Elania, wintered his armies in divers harbors within Phœcia and Lycia, there arose a mutiny in Oppi. The one faction lent for the Ætolians their near neighbours to side with them: and the other for the Romans. The Ætolians came first, but the mightier faction would not suffer them to enter in: for having dispatched a messenger to the Roman General, they held the Town until his coming. The Kings garrison kept the fortres, neither could they be brought to abandon it either with the menaces of the Opuntians, or the authority and countenance of the Roman commander. The only let and stay why it was not immediately assaulted was this; Because there was come an herald from the King, requesting time and place of a parle, which with much ado was granted to the King: not because Quimius of himself was not desirous and wished that he might be thought to have ended this war, either by force of arms or conditions of peace; for as yet he knew not whether one of the new Consuls should be sent to succeed him, or his government continued still unto him (according as he had given his friends and kinsfolks in charge to bring that about by all the endeavour and means that he could make:) but he supposed verily, that this parling would be to good purpose for him, if it might be in his liberty to drive matters unto war if he stayed still, or draw to a peace if he departed home. So upon the strand and shore of the gulf Mæla, they chose a place near unto Nova.

Thither

A Thither came the King by water from Demetrias with five brigantines or pinnaces, and one ship of war with a brass beak-head. There accompanied him the chief Lysimachus, and Cycliadas a noble personage of great mark among the Achæans, and one that was from thence banished. With the Roman General were King Antiochus, Dionysidorus an Ambassador of King Attalus, and Agathinobrotus Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, Phaneas the chief and principal Magistrat of the Ætolians, and two Achæans Aristobolus and Xenophon. The Roman General in the mids of these, advanced himself forward to the edge of the very shore, even to the bank side, while the King came forward to the foredeck of his ship standing at anchor: and thus he began and said unto the King: "Sir, you may do better to come ashore that we may commune and confer together close, and both speak and hear one another more easily. The King refused so to do: and why so? quoth B "Quintius, who is it that you fear, if a man may know? Then with an haughty spirit and kinglike: I fear none (quoth he) but the immortal Gods; but I trust not the fidelity of all that I see here about you, and namely, the Ætolians least of all other. Why (saith Quintius again) this is the common case of all them that come to parly with enemies; namely, to be in danger one of another. Yea marry, quoth the King, but by your leave Quintius, the price and recompence of treachery and falsehood (if it should come to that) is not all one for killing Philip and Phaneas: for the Ætolians should not find it so hard a matter to substitute another Pretor, as the Macedonians to create another King in my room. This said, there was not a word more to the point: while the Roman General thought it reason that he should begin who sought for a parle; and the King supposed it meet that it was his part to speak first who should give conditions, and not for him that stood at receipt, and was to accept thereof. Then Quintius began and said, that his speech should be plain and simple: for he would say no more, but propose only those points, which if they might not be performed, there would be no peace upon any condition at all. First, that the King must withdraw his garrisons out of all the Cities of Greece. Item, That he is to deliver up all the prisoners and fugitive revolts that he hath, unto the allies of the people of Rome. Item, That he restore again to the Romans all those pieces in Illyricum, which after the peace concluded in Epirus, he had seized upon. Last of all, that he surrender unto Ptolemæus King of Egypt, all those Cities which he possessed himself of, after the death of Ptolemæus Philopator. These (saith he) are the conditions, that I and the people of Rome do demand: but meet it is besides, that you hear the demands also of the allies. Then the Ambassador or agent for King Attalus required, that the ships and captives which had been taken in the Sea-fight before Chios, should be rendered, and that Nicomachia and the Temple of Pennus, which he had pill'd and spoiled, should be restored as good and entire, as they were before. After him, the Rhodians made claim to Peræa (a country in the continent right over-against their Isle, and an ancient appurtenance of their Seignory) and demanded within, that the garrisons should quit Iassus, Baryllæ, and the City of the Euromenians, and about Hellasponus, likewise the Cities of Sestus and Abydos. Item, that Panopolis should be restored unto the Bizantins, with the ancient charter of their franchises and liberties. Finally, that all the Merchant Towns and Ports in Asia might be freed from paying custome. Then came upon him the Achæans, and challenged Corinib and Argi as their own. After them, when as Phaneas (the Pretor of the Ætolians) had demanded in a manner the same that the Romans had before; namely, that the Kings forces should depart out of Greece, adding moreover, that those Cities should be rendered unto the Ætolians which in times past belonged to their dominion and jurisdiction: then one of the heads of the Ætolians named Alexander, an eloquent man among them, as any other, presently inferred and said: "That he had a long time sitten still, and opened not his mouth, not because he thought that in all this conference they would grow to any point or conclusion, but for that he would not interrupt any of his allies in their speech. And as for Philip, quoth he, he dealeth not soundly and bona fide in treaties of peace, no more than ever heretofore he hath managed his wars with vertue and true valour. For in all these parlies and conferences he lieth in trains, and lieth to catch advantages: in war he never striketh a battail in plain field, nor cometh to close fight hand to hand; but in his retreats and flights, burneth and sacketh Cities: and thus being himself vanquished, spoileth and maketh havock of that which by right is the due reward and recompence of conquerors. But the noble Macedonian Kings in old-time, took no such courses. Their manner was to fight it out in open field, and to spare Cities and Towns, all that ever possibly they could; to the end that their dominion might be more wealthy and puissant. For what kind of policy is it, for him to ruinate and destroy utterly that, about the possession whereof he is in question, and reserve nothing for himself but only war? This Philip the year past hath laid desolate in Thessalia more Cities of his allies there, than all the enemies have done that ever Thessalia had: and hath taken more from the Ætolians themselves, while he was a confederate friend with them, than all the time that he was their professed enemy. He hath seized upon Lymnachia, expelled their Pretor, and chased out the garrison of the Ætolians. C Chios also, a City under his own subjection he hath raised, subverted and quite destroyed. By semblable falsehood and deceit he is possessed of Thebes in Phthia, Echinum, Larissa, and Pharsalus. Philip yelled and galled at these words of Alexander, commanded that his ship should approach neerer to the bank, to the end that himself might be better heard. And as he began to frame bitter invectives against the Ætolians principally, Phaneas cut him off, saying, That the quarrel was not to be decided by word, but with the sword: and either he must win it by mere force, or yeeld obedience to the mightier. That is true, quoth Philip, and so evident, that a blind man may see it; jesting jesting merrily at Phœneus, who was troubled with a pair of bad eyes. And given he was by nature H to be pleasantly conceited, and fuller of his frumps, I was than belicemed the Majesty of a King: so as many times even in treaty of serious matters and of great consequence, he could not forbear but make himself merry and laugh a good while. "Afterwards he fell to a fit of choler and "indignation, that the Ætolians should take upon them like Romans to command him out of "Greece, who if they were put to it, were not able upon their knowledge to set down the bounds "of Greece & limit how far it reached. For asmuch as the Agrei, the Apodeotes and Amphilochi, "which take up a great part of Ætolia, are not within Greece. And what just cause (quoth he) of "complaint have they, in that I have not spared some of their allies? Why? even they themselves

 "hold this old custome for a law, namely, to permit their youth to take arms and serve against "their own allies, so they do it without the publick order and warrant from the State: and very I "often a man may see Ætolians in contrary armies, & come to aid as wel the one side as the other.
 "As for Chins, it was not I that forced it: I did no more but aid Prusias my friend and ally, in the "siege and assault thereof. And as touching Lysimachia, I defended it against the Thracians: but "for asmuch as of necessity I was called away from the guard thereof unto this war, the Thraci-
 "ans now hold it. Thus much by way of answer to the Ætolians. Now concerning Attalus and "the Rhodians, by right I owe them nothing: for it was not I but they, that began the war.
 "Howbeit, for the honor that I bear to the Romans, I will make restitution to the Rhodians of "Perea, and restore I will to Attalus the ships and the captives as many as are forth coming and "may be found. As for the restitution and making good again of Nicephorium and the Temple of "Venus, what answer should I return to them that demand it, but this, that I will endeavour and K "be at charge of planting new trees (which is the only way and means whereby groves and "woods that are cut down and fallen, may be recovered again) seeing that ye will needs have it,
 "that Kings (forsooth) must commune and reason to and fro about such matters as these. In "the last place, he framed his speech to answer the Achæans: wherein, first he began with the "benefits and pleasures that Antigonus had done unto that nation; then, of the favours and good
 "turns they had received from his own self; and with all he commanded their decrees and edicts
 "to be read, containing all kind of honors as well divine as human: adding moreover the late
 "and fresh revolt of their army from him: and albeit he inveighed sharply against their disloy"alty and treachery, yet he promised to render Argos unto them. As for Corinth, he would con"fer and consult with the Roman General, and demand of him, whether he thought it reason I
 "that he should depart from those cities which he won by arms, and held by right of conquest, or "dispossess himself of those also, which he received from his progenitors as his lawfull inheri"tance? The Achæans and Ætolians addressed themselves to answer those points; but the sun "was welnear down: whereupon the conference was adjourned until the morrow. Philip retired "to the harbor from whence he came, and the Romans with their allies to their camp. The day fol"lowing, Quintius at the time appointed was ready before the City of Nicea (for that was thought
 "a convenient place.) But Philip appeared not, nor for the space of certain hours came there any
 "at all from him, not so much as a messenger. Now when they were out of all hope of his repair "thither, behold of a suddain his ships were descried. For himself he said by way of excuse, that "considering how hard, how grievous and intolerable indignities were imposed upon him, he had M "employed all that day time until then in consultation, and could not resolve. But it was generally "thought among them all, that he had of purpose prolonged the time, and made it so late even to"ward evening, because the Achæans and Ætolians should have no leisure to answer unto him.
 "And this opinion of theirs himself confirmed, in that he requested that he alone might parly
 "with the Roman General himself, and that all others should go aside and absent themselves: to "the end they two might spend and lose no more time in debate and wrangling, but go briefly to "the point, and make an end one way or other. This petition of his would not at first be accepted "by Quintius, pretending that he would not have it seen that the allies were excluded out of the "conference. But afterwards upon his importunat suit, by the advise of them all, the Roman Ge"neral together with Ap. Claudius a Colonel, when the rest were voided away, advanced forward N
 "to the bank side: the King with the other two whom he had with him the day before came a land.
 "There after they had parled in secret together a certain time, they parted. What Philip related "unto his company is not certainly known: but Quintius made report unto his allies of their con"ference in this wise: namely, that Philip was content to quit the whole coast and tract of Ibri-
 "cum, for the Romans to enter upon. Item, to send back all the traitorous renegats, and as many "captives as were to be found. Item, to redeliver unto Attalus the ships and the mariners taken "prisoners therein. Item, to render unto the Rhodians the countrey of Perea: but in no wise to be "disseised of Iassus and Bargylla. Item, to deliver unto the Ætolians Pharsalus and Larissa, but not "Thebes in any case. Last of all, to part not only with Argos, but with Corinth also, for the behoof of "the Achæans. There was not one of them all well pleased at this limitation and setting out of par"ticular parts, which he would deliver, and which he would not. For in this reckoning & account
 "they should be more losers than winners. For unless (say they) he remove his forces and garrisons "out of all Greece throughout, he will never cease to give or take occasions of quarrel. As they all
 "cried out from the whole assembly to this effect, their high voyce was heard of Philip, albeit he "stood aloof. Whereupon he requested Quintius to refer the whole matter once more unto the next "day; and then certainly without fail, he would either perswade him and his allies and bring them
 "to

A to his mind, or else would come off and suffer himself to be perswaded and over-ruled by them. The place of meeting was appointed upon the strand near Thurinus: and thither they repaired on both parts betimes. There Philip first and foremost, belought both Quintius and all those that were present, not to disturb the hope of peace, but that it might come to some effect: and in conclusion, craved time, wherein he might send his Embassadors unto the Senat of Rome: assuring them, that if he could not obtain peace under those articles above said, he would accept of any other conditions, which it should please the Senat to put upon him. All the rest misliked hereof, supposing, that he sought for nothing else but delays and tract of time, whiles he might gather his forces together. But Quintius inferred again, That well it might so be and a truth indeed that they alledged, if it were summer time and a season fit for war and martial exploits: but now, considering winter was at hand, they could lose nothing by granting him respite to address an embassage. B For neither (qd. he) will any capitulation and composition which we should make with Philip stand good and firm without the approbation of the Senat: and in this one winter (when of necessity we must surcease from war) it may be known what the Senate by their authority will approve. To this advice the chief of the confederats accorded, and therein rested. So there was a cessation of arms for two moneths granted: in which mean time it was thought good, that each of them likewise should dispatch one Embassador to advertise the Senate, to take heed they were not over-raught by the subtilty and fraud of the King. But provided it was in the covenant of the truce aforesaid, That incontinently the Kings garrisons should void the territories of Phocis and Locris. Quintius also, himself sent (together with the Embassadors of the allies) Aminander King of the Atthamans: and to make the embassage more honourable, Q. Fabius (his own wives sisters son) Q. Fulvius and P. Claudius accompanied the King.

C When they were arrived at Rome, the Embassadors of the allies had audience given them before those that were sent from King Philip. Most of their speeches were spent in railing against the King: but in this one point they most of all moved the Senat to give ear unto them, namely, when they described by demonstration (as in a map) the situation of those countries as well by Land as Sea, that all men might plainly see, that if the King might hold in his hands the City Demetrias in Thessalie, Chalcis in Euboea, and Corinth in Achaia, Greece could not possibly be at liberty, considering that Philip himself was wont to term them (no less truly than tauntingly) The shackles and fetters of Greece. After them were the Kings Embassadors permitted to enter into the Senate-house: and having begun to make a long Oration, their speech was cut off with this one brief and short interrogatory. Whether Philip would quit those three Cities aforesaid, or no? Whereunto they made this answer, That they had no exprels warrant in their commission touching that matter by name. So the Kings Embassadors were sent away without conclusion of any peace: and Quintius had full authority to determine of war or peace at his pleasure. Who seeing plainly by this, that the Senat was not weary of war, and being himself more desirous of victory than peace, he would never after grant Philip any more parties, but gave him to understand, that he would admit no other embassage from him, but that which should bring him news of his departure quite out of Greece.

D Philip seeing no other way now but that he must needs fight and trie the issue by a main battle, and that he was to gather his forces together from all parts: being perplexed most of all for the Cities of Achaia (a countrey far remote from him) and yet more careful in regard of Argi than Corinth: he thought it best policy to make it over (as it were upon trust) into the hands of Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, upon condition, That if he obtained the victory, Nabis should deliver it up unto him again: but if ought should come to him but well, then Nabis himself to have and hold it as his own. Unto Philocles, Governor of Corinth and Argi, he dispatcheth his letters, That he should himself in person commune with the tyrant above-named about it. Philocles, besides that he came now with a present, added moreover of his own head (for the better assurance and pawn of amity between the tyrant and the King) That Philip would give his daughters in marriage to Nabis his sons. The tyrant refused at the first to accept of that City, F unless he were sent for, by a decree of the Argives themselves to come for to aid the City. But afterwards when he heard say, That in a frequent assembly there, they not only rejected him, but also detested and abhorred the very name of a tyrant, as an execrable abomination: supposing now that he had a good occasion and quarrel offered to make a spoil of them, he willed Philocles to deliver the City unto him when he would. So the tyrant was received into the Town in the night season, without the privity and knowledge of any person: and by break of day he seized upon all the higher places. The gates were shut, and few of the principal heads in the beginning of the tumult made shift to escape. Those that were absent had their houses ransacked and their goods pilld: as many as were present, had all their gold and silver taken from them: besides, great sums of money were imposed upon them to be paid. They that made speed and G were not long about it, but tendered ready coine, were let go without any outrage or hurt done unto their bodies: but such as were suspected either to hide or keep ought back, were mangled and tortured like bondslaves. After this, he assembled the people together and published two Laws: the one, for crossing all debt-books and cancelling obligations: the other, for division of Lands among the people by the poll: two fire-brands to serve their turn that seek for change and alteration in a State: enough to set on fire the Commons against the Nobles and chief of the City.

When

When the City of Argos was thus brought in subjection under Nabis, the tyrant never remembering at whose hands, nor upon what condition he had received it, sent his ambassadors to Quintus, likewise to Attalus winning them in Argos, certifying them, That Argos was in his hands and at his devotions: and if Quintus would repair thither to parle with him, he should not but they two should agree well enough in every point. Quintus granted to come thither to the end, that by this means he might discomfitt Philip of that garrison: and he sent likewise to Attalus, willing him, that he would depart from Argos, and meet him at Sicyone: himself looked from Amicyra, and with ten Gallies called Quinquetermes; which (as hap was) L. Quintus his brother some dayes before had put to sea out of the wintering harbor of Coryra, crossed over to Sicyone. Now was Attalus there already, who making remonstrance unto Quintus, That it became a tyrant to come unto a Roman General, and not a Roman General to go unto a tyrant, induced Quintus to condescend unto his opinion, and not to enter the City of Argos. Not far from the City is a place called Mycenica, where they agreed to meet and commune together. Quintus came to the place, accompanied with his brother and certain Colonels. Attalus was guarded with his Princely and Royal train. Nicostratus the Pretor of the Achæans repaired thither, attended with some few auxiliary souldiers: and there they found the tyrant expecting their coming with all his forces. And armed as he was, with his guard likewise armed, he advanced himself into the midst (well neer) of the plain that lay between. Quintus unarmed, came forward with his brother and two Colonels. King Attalus likewise between the Pretor of the Achæans of the one hand, and a courtiour of his on the other, both unarmed. The tyrant began the speech with an excuse, That being in arms and attended with a guard of armed men, he presented himself to a parle, seeing the General of the Romans and King Attalus unarmed: and said that he stood not in fear of them, but of certain exiled persons of the Argives. After this, when they came to treat as touching the conditions and covenants for the contract of an amity, Quintus the General demanded two things: the one, That Nabis would make an end of warring with the Achæans: the other, That he would send with him certain aids against Philip. And verily to send succour he granted: and in lieu of peace he was content there should be a truce, until the war with Philip was dispatched. Also about Argos King Attalus began to enter into some question, saying: That having the City treacherously betrayed unto him by Philoctes, he now held it by force of arms: but he answered again, That he was sent for by the Argives themselves, for to protect them. Then the King required that the Argives might be assembled together, that he might know the truth. The tyrant made no denial thereof. The King replied again, that the assembly should be free, and at their liberty to speak, and to that effect the garrisons were to be removed out of the City, and no Lacedæmonians intermingled among them: to the end that the Argives might frankly speak their mind. But the tyrant flatly denied to withdraw from thence the guards. So this arguing came to no conclusion, and the conference braken up, after that the tyrant had given the Roman General 600000 Can-didots, and a truce made for the term of four moneths, between Nicostratus Pretor of the Achæans, and Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedæmonians. From thence Quintus departed to Corinth, and approached the gate, with a Regiment of Cretensians, that it might appear to Philoctes the Kings Captain there that the tyrant was revolted from Philip. Philoctes also entered into a parle with the Roman General and when he was exhorted by him to depart out of hand and yeeld the City, he returned such an answer unto him, that he seemed rather to defer, than to deny the thing. From Corinth Quintus crossed the Sea to Amicyra, from whence he sent his brother to found the nation of the Acarnanians. And Attalus departed directly from Argos to Sicyone. Whete the City not only encreased the ancient honours of the King, with the addition of new: but also the King over and besides that he had purchased for them in time past, the sacred land of Apollo, with a great sum of money: because he would not seem now also to pass by this friend City allied unto him, without some royal bounty and munificence, he gave freely unto them six talents of silver, and 10000 Medimns of corn: and so returned to his ships at Cenchrea. Nabis also having strengthened the garrison in Argos, returned to Lacedæmon: and after himself had robbed the men of their mony and goods, he sent his wife thither to do the like by the women. Who sending for the honourable & worshipful dames of the City, inviring them one by one to her house, and otherwhiles many together at once, such as were of kin one to another, by flattering and by threatening gat from them not only all the gold that they had, but in the end stript off their apparel also, and all the jewels and ornaments that they wore.

The three and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the three and thirtieth Book.

Titus Quintus Flaminius the Pro-consul, ended the war with Philip, after he had vanquished him in a pight field neer Cynoccephala in Thessalie. L. Quintus Flaminius, brother to the said Pro-consul,

A consul, having forced Leucas the head City of Acarnania, received the Acarnanians upon their submission and surrender. C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Pretor was slain, and his army defeated by the Celerians. Attalus being suddenly sick, was removed from Thebes to Pergamus; and there departed his life. Peace was granted to Philip upon his suit, and liberty restored to Greece. L. Furius and C. Claudius Marcellus, the two Consuls, subdued the Boians and Insubrians in Gaul, Marcellus triumphed. Annibal having practised in Affrick to raise war, but to no effect, was thereupon accused unto the Romans, by letters sent from the principal of the adverse faction: but for fear of the Romans, who had dispatched their Embassadors to the Carthaginian Senat about him, he fled unto Antiochus King of Syria, who also prepared then to make war upon the Romans.

adjoyning in those quarters to Acarnania. There was a streight pass or gullet there, half a mile almost in length, but not half a mile in breadth: at the end of this streight standeth the City Leucas planted against an hill that turneth to the East, and looketh toward Acarnania. The base Town is built upon a plain, reaching along the sea that divideth Leucadia from Acarnania. Whereupon the City, as well on the land side, as by sea, is easie to be forced. For the foords of the water relemble a standing lake rather than a Sea, and the whole soil is a light earth, minable and easie to be wrought into, so that in many places at once the walls either undermined or shaken with the ram, came tumbling down. But as the Town it self was assaultable, so the hearts of the Townsmen were invincible. For night and day they gave not over, to repair the cracks of the shaken wal, to fill up the open breaches and ruins, to make head lustily, and skirmish with the enemy, and rather to defend the walls by force of arms, than to save themselves by strength of their walls. And surely a longer siege they would have made of it than the Romans hoped, but that certain banished persons, Italians born, dwelling in Leucas let in and received armed souldiers on the Castle side. Howbeit, the Leucadians embattelling themselves in their market place, encountred them as they ran down from the higher ground with a great cry and noise, and maintained battel with them for a long time. In this mean while, the walls in diverse places were scaled with ladders, and the enemies mounting over the heaps of stones that lay at the breaches, entred the Town. And now by this time the Lieutenant in person, with many companies environed them as they fought: some slain in the midst, others flung away their weapons, and yielded to the conquerour. After few dayes, upon the news of the field fought at Cynocephala, all the States of Acarnania came in, and submitted themselves to the Lieutenant.

At the same time, whiles fortune turned thus about, and bare down a side all at once; the Rhodians also sent out Pausistratus their Pretor, with 800 footmen of Achaes, and about 1900 souldiers well armed, gathered out of all sorts of auxiliaries, to regain and reconquer from Philip the country of Perae, lying in the main and firm land, which had been held sometime, and possessed by their ancestors. And these aids were compounded and mixed of French, Nisquets, Pisuets, Tanians, and Arcans of Affrick, and Laodiceans of Asia. With these forces Pausistratus encamped in the territory of Stratonicea, and there he seized of a commodious place, and very good for his purpose, unware to the Kings company that had holden the same. Thither came also to aid them in very good time, a Regiment of a 1000 foot and a 100 horse of Achaeans, levied for that purpose, and were commanded by Theoxenus. Dinocrates a Captain under the King, willing to recover the said hold again, first pitched his tents, hard against the enemies camp. But afterwards he removed to another fort in the territory likewise of Stratonicea, which they call Astragon: and having rallied together all the garrisons dispersed afunder in divers places, and sent for the auxiliary bands also of Thessalians, even from Stratonicea, he took his way and marched toward Alabanda; where the enemies were. The Rhodians likewise for their part were ready for battel, and after they were encamped of both sides neer together, immediately they entred into the field to fight it out. Dinocrates placed in the right point 500 Macedonians, and the Agrians he put in the left, in the main battel he bestowed all those that he had gathered together out of the garrisons belonging to the forts abovesaid, who for the most part were Carians, the points he flanked round about with his corners of Horse. The Rhodian cohort was marshalled in this manner: The auxiliaries of the Candiot and Thracians kept the right point, the hired souldiers (and they were a power of elect footmen) stood in the left, in the midst were the aids (a mixture of many nations:) the Cavalry and all the light armed souldiers that were, compassed the corners like wings. All that day the two armies stood only upon the bank of a brook which ran between them with a small and shallow water: and after some loose shot discharged, they retired into their tents. The next day they were ranged in like order, and struck a battail exceeding the proportion of their number: for on each side there were not above three thousand foot, and upon a hundred horse: but they were even matched not in number only and armour, but also in equal courage and hope alike. The Achaei first passed over the said brook, and charged upon the Agrians: afterwards the whole army ran as one would say, over the River. The fight continued long doubtful. The Achaei being of themselves in number a thousand, disordered some four hundred of the other, and forced them to retreat, and afterwards the entire right point of the battail began to shrink and give ground. As for the Macedonians, so long as their battaillon called Phalanx, kept their array and stood close together, could not possibly be stirred or removed; but after their left side was laid naked, and they began began to reach out on all hands their long pikes against the enemy, charging them across upon the flank, they were presently troubled: and first they put themselves in disarray, afterwards they turned their backs, and last of all flung their weapons from them, and ran away for life; until they were come to Bargilia. Thither also was Dinocrates fled. The Rhodians having followed the chase as long as they had any day to see, retired into their camp. And for certain it is known, if in this train of victory they had presently made speed to Stratonicea, they might have been masters of the Town, and never drawn sword for it: but whiles they spent time in recovering the burrough Towns and forts of Peraa, they let this opportunity slip out of their hands, and lost it for ever. For in the mean space, they that lay in garrison and held Stratonicea, were encouraged, and took better heart. Dinocrates also anon with those forces of his that remained, put himself within the walls. Then was the Tower besieged and assailed, all in vain, neither could it be forced and won but by Antiochus, a certain time after. Thus went the affairs in Theffalie, in Achaia, and in Asia, much about one and the self-same time.

Philip being advertised that the Dardaniens were entred within the confines of his realm, and wasted the high country of Macedony, albeit he saw that almost in all parts of the world unhappy fortune still followed and coursed both him and his wheresoever they were: yet esteeming it more grievous and heavy than death it self to be disseized of the possession of Macedony also, he made a levy in great hast out of all his cities of six thousand foot, and 500 horse; with which power of Macedonians, he suddainly surpris'd the enemy (unprovided and not aware of his coming) about Stobi in * Pelagonia. Great numbers of men were slain in conflict, but more in the fields, such as were disbanded, and ranged abroad for greediness of booty and pillage. But as many as could make means to flie more readily and easily away, never stood out the tryal of a battail, but returned home into their own countrey. Having thus put life as it were again into his men by this one expedition and exploit (a matter of no consequence to the total adventure of his whole estate) he retired himself to Theffalonica.

The Punick war was not atchieved and brought to an end so happily and in so good a time for the Romans (who otherwise should have warred at once both against the Carthaginians and Philip) but it fell out as well and in as fit a season, that Philip was now vanquished; just against the time that Antiochus in Syria prepared to levy war against them. For besides that the service was much more easily managed against them single and apart, than it would have been if they had banded both at once, and brought their forces together, it chanced also that Spain about the very same instant brake out to a tumultuous insurrection.

* Bora, or Bo-calbalber.

* Turcomania, and Finichia.

Antiochus being returned to Antioch there to winter, after he had the summer before brought under his subjection all the Cities belonging to Prolomanus, within the country of * Cale-Syria, was yet never the more at quiet, and mindfull of peace afterwards. For when he had assembled a puissant power both of Land and also of Sea-forces, and purposed to employ the whole strength of his realm, he sent afore by Land in the beginning of the spring, his two sons Arduus and Mithridates with a mighty army, commanding them to attend him at Sardis: himself in person set forth a Voyage by Sea, with a fleet of a hundred sail of covert ships with decks and hatches, besides two hundred lighter Vessels, as Galions and Brigantins, purposing at one time to assay all the Cities in * Cilicia and Caria, coasting along the Sea side, which were within the Dominion of Prolomanus: and withal to aid Philip as well with shipping as souldiers, for as yet Philip was not utterly subdued, nor the war with him brought to a final end. Many brave and worthy exploits enterprised the Rhodians both by Sea and Land, in their loyalty and faithfulness to the Romans, and for the safeguard and defence of all the Greekish Nation. But no one thing shewed their magnificence more than this, that being nothing terrified at that time with such a World of wars threatned against them, they sent Embassadors to the King, to let him understand, that if he failed forward and stayed not his Armado, they would encounter him at the Bay of Nepheleis (which is a promontory or Cape of Cilicia, renowned for the ancient league of the Athenians.) And this they did, not upon any hatred they bare to his person, but to impeach him only for coming to join with Philip, thereby to hinder the Romans in their good course of setting Greece at liberty. At the same time Antiochus was busied in the siege and assault of Coracesum, against which he had placed all ordnance and engins of battery: for he was already master of the Cities of * Zephyrium, Soli, * Aphrodisias and * Corycus, and having doubled the point of * Anemurium (a Cape or forland also of Cilicia) he had won likewise the City of * Selinus. All these, and many other forts of that coast being yeilded unto him by composition, either for fear or willingly, without any assault, only Coracesum shut their gates against him, and staid his progress beyond his expectation. There the Embassadors of the Rhodians had audience. And albeit that embassie was such as might have set a King into a fit of choler and chafed his blood, yet he tempred his anger, and made answer that he would send his Embassadors to Rhodes, and give them in charge to renew the ancient rights and privileges as well of his own as of his ancestors with that City and State, and to will them not to stand in fear of the Kings coming, for that neither they nor any allies of theirs should sustain harm or damage by him. For it was no part of his meaning to infringe and break the amity which he had with the Romans, as it may appear as well by his late embassie sent unto them, as also by the honorable decrees and answers made by the Senat and sent unto him. For it fortuned that even then the Embassadors of King Antiochus were returned from Rome, having had a friendly audience there, and a gracious dispatch, according as the time required:

As quitted for as yet the issue of the war against Philip was uncertain. While the Kings Ambassadors delivered these points in the assembly of the Rhodians, there arrived a post with news, that the war was ended by means of a victory achieved by the Romans against Philip at Cynoscephale. The Rhodians being once heard, the Rhodians past all fear now of Philip were of advice to meet at sea with their navy. For they had a second care besides which they neglected not, to maintain the liberty of those allied Cities pertaining to King Ptolemy, against which war was menaced from Antiochus. Some they succoured with sending aid unto them, and others by force and giving them warning of the designments and enterprises of their enemies: whereby they were enabled, that the Cnethi, Mandii, they of Halicarnassus and Samos enjoyed still their ancient freedom. But needles it is for me, to prosecute all the occurrences and affairs that passed in these parts, considering how I shall have enough to do, and hardly be able to set down and go through with those that properly concern the Roman war. At the same time also King Antiochus was brought sick from Thobes to Pergamus, and there departed this world in the seven and twentieth year of his age, when he had reigned forty four. This man was beholden to fortune for nothing else but riches, that might commend him to the hope of a kingdom. He employed the same with such wisdom and magnificence, that first in his own conceit, and afterwards in the judgment of others, he was not thought unworthy to be a King. Afterwards when he had vanquished in one battle the Gauls (a nation at that time newly arrived in Asia, and therefore the more dread and terrible) he took upon him to be stiled King, and ever after carried a mind answerable to the grandeur and Majesty of that name. His own subjects he governed with singular justice. To his allies he shewed himself most fast and faithfull. His friends he used with all kindness and bounty. A wife and four children he had living when himself died: and left his kingdom so full and well settled, that the possession thereof continued firm to the third descent and generation after him.

While things stood thus in Asia, Greece, and Macedonia, and the war with Philip scarcely ended, or at leastwise peace not fully concluded, there arose a mighty war in the Province of Spain beyond the river Iberus. M. Helvius at that time was governor there, who by his letters advertised the Senat. That Colcas and Luscinus, two Princes in those parts, were gone out, and had taken arms: that with Colcas there banded seventeen towns, and with Luscinus the strong and puissant Cities Carde and Bardo: that the whole sea coast, which hitherto by open revolt shewed not their rebellious heart, would doubtless upon the commotion of those their neighbours, make likewise an insurrection together with them. After these letters were read by M. Sergius the Prator, who had the jurisdiction between Citizens and aliens, the LL. of the Senat ordained, that after the election of new Prators was past, he to whose lot the government of Spain fell, should propose unto the Senat in all convenient speed as touching the war in Spain.

About that very time the Consuls repaired to Rome, (from their Provinces) who held an assembly of the Senat in the Temple of Bellona: and when they demanded triumph in consideration of their good service, and happy exploits in war achieved: C. Atinius Labeo and C. Ursinius Tribunes of the Commons required, That the Consuls should speak severally by themselves concerning triumph: for suffer them they would not jointly to propound that thing in the house to the end, that equal and semblable honour should not be conferred upon persons of unlike quality, worth, and desert. And when Minutius interred again and said, That the Province of Italy fell unto them both in one commission, and Cornelius seconded him withall, averring, That he and his companion in government had managed all their affairs with one mind by common counsell and advice: that the Boians who passed over the river Po against him for to succour the Istubrians, and Cenomans, were forced to turn back again to defend their own, by reason that the other Consul his Colleague made such waste and pillage in their fields and villages. The Tribunes confessed, that Cornelius indeed had achieved so worthy exploits in war, that there was no more doubt to be made of his triumph, than of sending praise and thanks to the immortal gods: but neither he nor any other Citizen stood ever at any time in such grace, favour, and credit, that having obtained the honour of a triumph for himself, he should impart that glory unto his Colleague and fellow, if he were so shameless as to crave it. As for Q. Minutius (say they) he made some slight skirmishes with the Ligurians not worth the talking of: many in France he lost a good number of his soldiers. And with that they named T. Juventius and Cneus the brother of Labeo, two Colonels of Tribunes of the camp, who were slain in an unfortunate battle, with many a brave and hardy man besides as well Citizens as allies. And to conclude, there were some few towns and villages colourably yielded and rendered up for the time, without any assistance and security. These janglings and debates between the Consuls and the Tribunes continued for two months: but in the end, the Consuls being overcome with the importunity of the Tribunes, were content to propose the matter distinctly by themselves. And with the generall voice and record of all, a triumph was decreed for Cn. Cornelius. The Placentins also and men of Cremona, were a great cause that this Consul found more favour: by reason that they gave thanks, and reported on his behalf, that they were delivered by his good means from the siege, yea, and most of them recovered from servitude out of the hands of their enemies. Q. Minutius having only once proffered and made an assay of proposing his cause to the Senat, seeing them wholly banded and set against him, did aloud, That in maintenance of Consular authority, and by verue of that place, yea, and according to the good examples of divers noble and renowned personages, he would triumph, and take them no leave in the mount Alban. But Q. Quinctius whilst he was still in office, triumphed over the Insubrians and Canonians. He carried in pomp before him a number of military ensignes, he caused great store of French spoil and pillage to pass in a pageant upon chariots taken from the enemies. Many Noblemen of France were led in a shew before his own triumphant chariot: among whom (as some write) was Amilcar General of the Carthaginians. But above all others, the goodliest sight was, a number of Colonies and inhabitants of Cremona and Placentia, who with bonets or caps of liberty on their heads followed his chariot. He bare in triumph 237500 Sesterces, 7900 Bigats of silver coin; He divided among his horsemen seventy Asles apeece, to every horseman he gave double, and to each Centurion treble so much. Q. Metellus likewise triumphed in mount Alban over the Ligurians and the Boians in Gandy. The honour of this triumph as it was less, in regard of the place, and of the name that went of his acts, as also because all men knew full well, that the charges went not out of the common Chest or Chamber of the City: so for number of ensignes, of chariots and spoils gained from the enemies, it was in manner equal and comparable to the other. And of money he brought well near as much as Cornelius: for of brass coin he had in shew 254000 Asles, of silver coin in Bigat peeces 52000. To common souldiers or footmen, to Centurions and horsemen, he gave as much as his Colleague. After this triumph there was a generall assembly held for the election of Magistrates: wherein were created Consuls, L. Furius Purpurio, and M. Claudius Marcellus. The next day after these Prators were chosen, Q. Fabius Buteo, T. Sempronius Longus, Q. Minucius Thermus, M. Atilius Glabrio, L. Apustius Fullo, and C. Lelius.

In the end of that former year, letters came from T. Quintius with this intelligence, That he had fought in battell ranged with King Philip within Theffaly, where the army of the enemies was defeated and put to rout. These letters were first read in the Senat by Sergius the Prator, and then by order from the LL. in the publike assembly of the people. For this happy successe, it was obtained, That there should be solemn processions for five daies. Shortly after, there arrived Embassadors both from T. Quintius, and also from the King. The Macedonian Embassadors were brought without the City to the place or hamlet called Villa publica, where they were appointed their lodging, rich presents were given them, and allowed they were the charges for themselves and their train. In the Temple of Bellona the Senat was assembled, where there passed not many words by reason that the Macedonians promised, That the King should perform whatsoever the L. Senat would see down. So (according to the ancient custome and manner) there were appointed ten Committees or Delegates, by whose advice and counsell T. Quintius the Generall, was to present and tender unto Philip, articles and conditions of peace: provided, that in the said number of Delegates, P. Sulpitius and P. Valerius should be comprised by name; who when they were Consuls governed the Province of Macedony. The same day, the Consuls demanded and made suit, That the number of their Colonies or inhabitants might be augmented: whereupon an order was granted, That there should be a thousand new enrolled to the former: with this proviso, that in this number none of them should be matriculated, who after the Consulship of P. Sulpitius and P. Villius had been enemies to the people of Rome. The Roman games and plaies were that year exhibited as well in the Circus as upon the stage in the Theatre, by the Ediles Curule L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Manlius Vulso: which, as they were set out with more state and magnificence than ever before, so they were beheld with more joy, contentment, and pleasure, in regard that all things fell out so fortunatly in the wars: and they were renewed and represented all thrice over. As for the plaies called Plébeis, they were set forth no less than seven times one after another. Atilius Glabrio and C. Lelius exhibited those pastimes: who also of their silver that arose of fines and forfeitures, caused three cast images of bras to be made, and erected them to the honour of Ceres, Liberty, and Liberty.

* Varr.

Now when L. Furius and M. Claudius Marcellus were entred into their Magistracy, and after question made concerning their Provinces, the Senat passed a decree, That both of them jointly should govern Italy: they requested that they might cast lots for Macedony and Italy together. N. Marcellus more desirous of the twain of the Province of Macedony, alledged, that the peace was not found but counterfeit, pretended, and deceitfull; and that the King would take arms and war again, in case the army were withdrawn from thence: by which words he put the LL. of the Senat into a deep study and suspence, what to do, or to think of it. And haply the Consuls had obtained their request, but that Q. Martius Rex, and C. Atinius Labeo, two Tribunes of the Commons, protested, that they would oppose themselves and cross it by their negative voice, unless they might first propose unto the people to know, Whether their will and pleasure was to entertain peace with King Philip, or no? This bill being preferred and read in the Capiroll before the people, was granted, and all the tribes or wards, even five and thirty, every one gave their affirmative voice, Ut rogastis [i.e. So be it as ye demanded.] And to the end, that all men might have more cause to rejoyce that peace was confirmed with Macedony, there came heavy news out of Spain, and letters were divulged abroad, containing thus much, That C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Vice-Prator in the hither Province of Spain, was vanquished in battell, that his army was discomfited and put to flight, and divers men of name and mark slain. That Tuditanus himself was carried forth of the conflict grievously wounded, and soon after died. The Province of Italy was assigned for both the Consuls with those two legions which the former Consuls had in charge, and order

A order granted, that they should levy and enroll four new legions, whereof two should be sent whither it pleased the Senat to appoint; And T. Quintius Flaminius was commanded to rule his Province still with the same army, and his Commission of longer government was renewed. After this, the Prætors cast lots for the parting of their Provinces. L. Apustius Fullo obtained the jurisdiction of the Citizens of Rome, and M. Acilius Glabrio was L. Chief Justice between Citizens and forrainers. Q. Fabius Buteo had the government of the base or farther Spain, and Q. Minutius Thermus of the higher or hither Spain. To C. Lælius fell Sicily, and Sardinia to T. Sempronius Longus. And ordained it was, that unto Q. Fabius Buteo, and Q. Minutius, to whom the rule of the Provinces in Spain befell, the Consuls should out of those four legions which they had enrolled, deliver one legion apeece, which they thought good and of allies and of the Latine nation, four thousand footmen besides, and three hundred horsemen to either of them. And these Prætors were enjoined to go to their charges with all speed possible.

The war in Spain began afresh, in the fifth after that the former together with the Punick war was ended. But before that these Prætors went forth to this war (which may be counted as it were new, in regard that the Spaniards now first, and never before, warred in their own proper name, without either leader or army of Carthage) and before that the Consuls themselves departed out of the City, order was given, that according to the old custome they should provide for the prodigious tokens that were reported. L. Julius as he rode on horseback into the Sabins country, was both himself and his horse under him stricken dead with lightning. The temple of Feronia in the territory of Capena, was likewise smitten and blasted from heaven. At the Temple of C. Moneta, the Iron heads of two spears were sent to burn on a light fire. A Wolfe happened to enter into the City at the gate Esquilina, and ran through the most populous part thereof as far as unto the market place, and so forward to the Tuscan street, and from thence through the Melium, and passed forth again at the gate Capena untouched, and in manner without taking any harm.

These prodigious signs were purged by the sacrifices of greater beasts. At the same time Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, who had governed the Province of high Spain before Tuditanus, entered the City by order from the Senat in a kind of triumph, and carried before him in pomp 1515 pound weight of gold: of silver likewise in bullion 20000 pound weight; and in coin 34550 deniers. L. Sturtinius from the nether Spain, brought into the treasury 50000 pound weight of silver, and never pretended any hope that he had to obtain a triumph. Moreover, of the prizes and spoiles won from the enemies, he caused two arches to be erected in the beast market, even before the Temple of Fortune, and the goddess Matuta: and one besides in the grand Cirque or shew-place. And upon these arches he set up gilded Statues. These were all the affairs, to speak of, that passed this winter-season.

These wintered at that time in Athens Quintius. And among many other suiters that came unto him with their petitions, the Bæotians exhibited a request, and obtained the same, to wit, that as many of their nation as had served in the wars under Philip, might be restored and sent home again unto them: which was easily granted by Quintius, not so much, for that he thought them worthy of that favour, but because he was to win the love and affections of the States in Greece unto the Roman name, now especially that he had some doubt of King Antiochus. They were not delivered so soon, but seen it was, how little the Bæotians would be beholding to him for it. For they sent presently unto Philip, and gave him thanks for the rendering of those men, as if they had been delivered by him, and not by Quintius and the Romans. And in their next assembly generall for their solemn election, they chose one Barcillus for their Bæotarches, or Lord governor of Bæotia; for no other reason, but because he had been the Colonell of those Bæotians that bare arms for the King: but they passed by Zenippus Pistratus, and others, that had persuaded to make a league with the Romans. This wrought discontentment in these persons for the present, and fear for the time to come. For thus they reasoned with themselves, If they would do thus while the Roman army lay encamped near to their gates, what should become of them when the Romans were departed into Italy, and whiles Philip was so near at hand to assist those that sided with him, and to annoy those of the adverse part and faction? Therefore they consulted and concluded in the end to make away Barcillus, the head of the Kings bend, whiles the Roman forces were at hand. And so chusing a convenient and fit opportunity for their purpose, at what time as he returned homeward drunk from a publike solemn feast, accompanied with certain pleasant and effeminate persons, who to make sport and mirth had been at that great feast; he was tormented and beset with six armed men, whereof three were Italians, and three Ætolians, and so murdered. His train that attended him ran away, and raised hue and cry, and called for help. Much trouble and hurly-burly there was throughout the City, much running to and fro with torch-light. But they that did the deed were escaped out at the next gate. In the morning beimes the people in great number assembled in the Theater, being called together by the voice of the common Beadle, as if the murderers had been detected. Openly it was in every mans mouth, that he was killed by his own retinue, even those filthy wanton persons that he had about him: but secretly in their minds they deemed Zenippus the author of the murder. For the present it was thought good to apprehend them that were in his train, and that they should be examined. While search was made for them, Zenippus came forth into the assembly, with the like intent to overturn all suspicion of crime from himself, saying, that men were much deceived to think that so horrible and strange a murder was committed by such weaklings & persons as they were.

This he argued and discoursed by many likelihoods and probabilities to the same effects by which H means some were verily perswaded, that if himself had been guilty of the fact, he would never have offered and presented himself in the face of the assembly, or broached any words at all of the murder; especially when no man urged him thereto. Others there were again, who made no doubt, but by this impudent face, his drift was to prevent an accusation, and to turn away all suspicion from himself. The innocent and guiltless creatures within a while after being examined upon the rack and tortured, knowing what was the general opinion and conceit of men, made their use of the same for to bolt out and reveal the fact; and so they named Zensippus and Pisistratus for the principals; without any presumption or light given how they should seem to come to the knowledge of any thing. Howbeit Zensippus accompanied with one Stramonidas fled by night to Tanagra, fearing the remorse and prick of his own conscience more than the appeaching and information of those persons who neither were party nor privy to any thing. But Pisistratus making no regard of these accusers, remained still at Thebes. Now had Zensippus one bondslave, (whose hand was in all this action, and had been a courier between) whom Pisistratus feared that he would bewray him, and by that very fear caused him to open and declare the whole matter. He dispatched therefore his letters unto Zensippus, advising him to rid that slave out of the way, who was privy to their dealing; advertising him, that in his conceit he was not so meet to conceal the thing now done, as he was a fit instrument at the time to execute the same. The bearer of these letters he straightly charged to deliver them unto Zensippus immediately with all speed. But he, because he could not spy a convenient time to meet with him himself, gave the letters to the very same slave, whom he supposed to be most fast and trusty to his Master: adding moreover, and saying, That they came from Pisistratus unto Zensippus, and imported matter of great consequence. The bond slave promised to deliver them incontinently, but being touched in conscience, he was so bold as to break them open; and when he had read them through, he fled back in great fear to Thebes (where he bewrayed Pisistratus). Zensippus troubled in spirit for the flight of his bondman, retired himself to Athens, supposing it a place of more security to live in, as a banished man. As for Pisistratus, after he had been divers times examined upon the rack, was put to death in the end. This murder wondrously estranged the Thebans and Boeotians, and set their hearts against the Romans; inasmuch as they hated and detested them to death, taking great indignation that Zensippus (a principall and chief personage of their nation) had committed so foul and hainous a fact. To rebell in open terms, they had neither force sufficient to maintain them, nor a principall head I to direct and lead them. Whereupon they fell to that which is next cousin to plain war, even to thieving and robbing by the high waieside, in such sort, as they surprized as well some soldiers who lodged near unto them, and were their guests, as others that wandered and ranged abroad from the garrisons in winter time, and travelled about their affairs, who otherwhiles were caught up by the way, and came short home. Some passengers were killed in the port-rode-waies, by those that lay in wait for them in notorious thievish corners: others were trained and led deceitfully through by-lanes into desert places, there to take up their innes and lodging, and then were murdered. At length they plaid these pranks, not only of malice unto them, but also for greedy desire of booty and spoil, by reason that commonly these waifaring men went about their trade and merchandise, and therefore had some charge about them, and carried silver in their belts. M Now when as at first there were some out of the way, and every day more than other many men missing, and no man knew what was become of them, all Boetia began to have an ill name, and the soldiers were more affraid to travell there, than in the enemies country. Then Quintius sent certain Embassadors to all the Cities for to make complaint of these robberies and enormities. Many footmen there were found dead about the mear or lake Copais, where their carcases were raked forth of the mud and mire, and drawn out of the standing water, tied and fastned as they were to heavy stones or some great vessels, that by their poise they might be plunged, and sink to the bottom. Many such like outrages were found to have been committed at Acraphea and Coronea. Quintius at the first demanded to have the offenders delivered unto him, and for five hundred soldiers (for so many were caught up by the way and murdered) he enjoined the Boeotians to make payment of five hundred talents of silver. But the Cities would do neither the one nor the other: only they paid with bare words, and excused themselves in that nothing had been done by publike warrant or counsell from the State. Whereupon the Embassadors were sent to Athens, and into Achaia, to make protestation unto their allies, that they would pursue the Boeotians with open war upon good ground and just cause offered. And so after he had given commandment unto P. Claudius to go unto Acraphea with one part of his forces, himself with the other set him down about Coronea, and planted siege unto it. But first the territory was laid waste, all the way as the two armies marched from Elania in divers quarters. The Boeotians plagued with these losses and calamities, seeing nothing but fear and flight in every place, sent their Embassadors unto him; but when they could not be admitted into the camp, the Achæans and the Athenians were O fain to come with them. The Achæans were of greater credit, to entreat in their behalf: for unless they might obtain pardon and peace for the Boeotians, they determined also to enter into the quarrel, and to make war themselves. By whose mediation the Boeotians had access unto the Roman Generall, and audience granted. Who after they were enjoined to deliver up the offenders and malefactors to Justice, and to pay thirty talents for amends and satisfaction, obtained peace: and so the siege was raised.

After

A After some few daies, the ten Delegates or Committees from Rome were arrived, by whose advice and counsell peace was articulated and capitulated with King Philip upon these conditions: Imprimis, That all the Greek Cities, as well in Europe as in Asia, should enjoy their liberty, and live under their own laws. Item, That Philip should withdraw his garrisons out of as many of them as had been in subjection under him. Item, That he do the like by those which were in Asia, to wit, Eurymus, Pedusa, Bargylla, Iassus, Myrinus, Abydus, Thassus, and Perinthus: all which, the Romans required to be free. As concerning the liberty and freedom of the Cyans, it was covenanted, That Quintus should write his letters to Prusias the King of Bithynians, giving him to understand the advice and pleasure of the Senat, and the ten Delegates aforesaid. Item, That Philip render all the prisoners and fugitive traitors to the Romans, and yield up all the covered ships with hatches: and over and besides, one huge royall Gallie or Argosy, which by reason of the exceeding bigness was unweildy and offitile use, and was disarmed with sixteen banks of oars on a side. Item, That he should not have above five hundred men in arms, nor one Elephant at all. Item, That he should not war (but by leave and permission of the Senat) without the marches of Macedony. Item, That he pay unto the people of Rome a thousand talents, the one half in hand, and the other at ten payments, within the term of ten years. Valerius Antias writeth moreover, that there was imposed upon him a tribute of four thousand pound weight of silver yearly, for ten years: and besides, twenty thousand pound weight presently. The same author saith, that expressly it was capitulated, that Philip should not war at all with Eumenes the son of Attalus, who was newly come to the crown. For the assurance of these covenants, there were received hostages, and amongst them Demetrius King Philip his son; Valerius Antias hath written moreover, that the Island Agina, and certain Elephants were given in pure gift to Attalus in his absence: and that upon the Rhodians was bestowed Syracomea, a City in Caria, with other Cities also which Philip had possessed. To conclude, that the Athenians received of free gift these Isles following, to wit, Paros, Imbros, Delos, and Scyros.

When all the States of Greece approved and thought well of this peace, only the Aeolians secretly muttered & found fault with this order set down by ten Delegates aforesaid: giving out, that they were but bare letters and vain words, shadowed with a counterfeit apparance of liberty. For to what end, say they, should some Cities be delivered to the Romans, and those not named? others again be named, and yet order taken, that they without delivery should be free? but only for this purpose, that those Cities which are in Asia should be set free, because they be far off and therefore in more safety; but those that are in Greece, being not precisely named, should be spoiled upon by them, to wit, Corinth, Chalcis, and Oronum, with Eretria, and Demetrias. And to say a truth, this finding fault of theirs was not altogether frivolous, and without occasion given: for some doubt there was of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: because in the order and act of the Senat, by vertue whereof those ten Delegates aforesaid were sent from the City, all other Cities of Asia and of Greece were doubtless in plain terms freed: but as touching these three before named, the Delegates had in commission to take order, as they should see it stand with the good of the Common-wealth, according to their own judgment and discretion, and the trust that was committed unto them. For well they wist that King Antiochus would pass over into Europe, so soon as ever he could bring his affairs about to his mind; and unwilling they were on any hand, that these Cities to commodious for his designs, should lie open and ready to his hand for to seize upon at his pleasure. So Quintus together with the ten Delegates sailed from Elaia to Anticyra, and from thence to Corinth, where they held their Council and consulted of their affairs. Quintus would very often say unto them, That all Greece might be delivered and set at liberty, if they could refrain the tongues of the Aeolians: if they were willing that their good affection should be deemed sincere, and the majesty of the Roman name maintained among all: finally, if they would pretend and make it known abroad, that they were passed the seas to set Greece free, and not after they had shaken off the seignory of Philip, to translate it unto themselves. The other again contradicted nothing as touching the liberty of those Cities: howbeit, they made remon-
F rance, that it was the safer course for them, to remain awhile under the protection and safeguard of the Romans, than that instead of Philip they should receive Antiochus for their Lord. In conclusion decreed it was, That Corinth should be rendered to the Achzans, but yet so, that there should be a Roman garrison in the highest quarter of the City called Acrocorinthus. Item, That Chalcis and Demetrias should be retained still, untill such time as they were no more in fear and doubt of Antiochus.

Now approached the ordinary solemnity of the Isthmian games, unto which at all times usually there was great recourse of people, as well in regard of the naturall disposition of that nation (desirous to see such sports and pastimes, wherein was represented the trial of masteries in all kind of arts, in all feats either of mere strength, or of agility and nimbleness of the body) as also in respect of the commodious feat of the place: wherunto from all parts of Greece they repaired G thither by two divers and sundry seas. But being amused in expectation to know what the estate of Greece, and what their own particular condition would be hereafter, divers men not only deviled secretly with themselves, but also gave out and whispered in their speech and talk. Well, the Romans were set to behold this solemnity: and the publike Crier with a trumpetter went forth into the midst of the Cirque or show-place, from whence the manner was to proclaim the sports and games aforesaid in a solemn set form of words: and after he had by sound of trumpet

made silence, he pronounced with a loud voice in this manner, "Be it known unto all men, that the H "Senat of Rome, and T. Quintius the General of their army, having vanquished King Philip and "the Macedonians, do ordain, that the Corinthians, the Phocensians, and the Locrenians, be all
 "free, and delivered from all taxes whatsoever, and to live according to their own laws, Item, That "the Isle Eubœa, the Magnesians, Thessalians, Perrhebiens, Achæans, and Phthiotians do enjoy the "like freedom and immunity. And consequently here rehearsed all the nations which had been in "subjection to Philip. Upon this proclamation of the beadle there was such joy, that men were not able to conceive and comprehend it. Every man could hardly believe that he had heard the thing which he so wished and desired afore to hear: one looked upon another wondering at the matter, as if it had been a vain vision or illusion of some dream: and well they trusted not their own ears in hearing that which particularly concerned every one, but enquired of them that stood next unto them. The Crier was called back again: such a desire had each one not only to hear the glad tidings, but also to behold the happy messenger of this their liberty: and no remedy there was, but once again he must publish and pronounce the same. Now when their joy was once confirmed, they set up such a shout, and followed it so with clapping of hands, redoubling the same so often, as evidently it appeared, how there is no earthly good in the world more pleasing and welcome unto a multitude than is liberty. After this, the games were performed in such haste, that neither the mind of any man was bent to intend, nor the eye busied to behold the sight thereof, so wholly had that one joy possessed them and forestalled the sense of all other pleasures and delights. But when the pastimes were once ended, they all in manner ran apace to the Roman General, in such sort, that his person was in some danger of the multitude, crowding so hard upon him alone, for desire they had to come unto him, to touch his right hand, and to cast garlands of flowers and labels of sundry colours upon him: but being a man fast upon three and thirty years of age, both the vigour of youth, and also the joy that he took for the accomplishment of so glorious an act, afforded him strength enough to abide the press of the people. This gladness of all men shewed it self not only for the present, but continued also for many daies space, entertained not only in thankful minds, but expressed also in joyful discourses: namely, "That there was one nation yet in "the world, which at their proper cost and charges, with their own pain and perill made war for "the freedom of others: who afforded this favour and pleasure not to the neighbours and bor"derers only, or to those that were joyned near to them in the continent and firm land, but pas"sed over the seas to the end, that throughout the whole world there should be no unjust and "tyrannical government, but in all places, right, reason, and law, might prevail most and carry "the greatest sway. Lo, how by the only voice of one Beadle all the Cities of Greece and Asia are set "free. To conceive and enterprise so great a thing proceedeth from a brave mind and noble heart:
 "but to effect the same is a singular vertue and rare felicity."

This done, Quintius and the ten Delegates gave audience to the embassages of divers Kings and Princes, Nations and States. And first of all others were the Embassadors of King Antiochus called in: who used the same speech in manner that they had at Rome, vinting great words without any ground and substance of credit. But answer was returned unto them, not covertly by way of circumstance as aforetime (when Philip was on foot, and things stood doubtfull) but openly in plain terms, Inprimis, That Antiochus must quit and abandon all the Cities of Asia, which belonged at any time either to King Philip or King Ptolemæus; Item, That he meddle not with any free City or State, and especially with those of Greece: but above all, warned he was and forbidden, either to pass over himself, or to send any forces into Europe. After the Kings Embassadors were licensed to depart, all the nations and states had a generall session and meeting together, which was the sooner dispatched, for that in the decrees of the ten Delegates all the Cities and States were pronounced by name. Unto the Orestians (a people in Macedonia) for that they revoked first from the King, their own lands and priviledges were restored. The Magnesians, the Perrhebians and Dolopians were likewise declared free. Unto the people of Thessaly over and above the grant of their liberty, the Phthiotian Achæans were annexed, excepting the City of Thebes in Phthia and Pharsalus. As for the Etolians who required, that according to covenant Pharsalus and Leucas should be rendred unto them, they were put over unto the Senat. But they awarded them the Phocensians and Locrenses, with other appertenances adjoyned before by vertue of the decree. Corinth, Triphylia, and Heræa (which also is a City of Peloponnesus) were rendred unto the Achæans. Moreover these ten Delegates gave Orestum and Eretria unto Eumenes the son of Atta-lus, but by reason that Quintius would not agree thereto, the matter was referred over to the Se-nat for to be decided: and the Senat granted freedom unto these Cities, together with Carissus.
 Unto Pleurani were freely given Lingus and Parthenium, which were two nations in Thracum, and had been both subject to Philip. It was ordained also, that Aminander should hold those Castles still, which during the wars he had won from Philip. When the assembly was dissolved, the ten Delegates having divided between themselves their severall charges, departed every man to set free the Cities of their particular regions and quarters. P. Lentulus to Bargylla; L. Sertinius to Hephestria, Thassus, and other Cities of Thracia; P. Villius and L. Terentius toward King Antiochus; and Cn. Cornelius toward Philip. Unto whom, after Cornelius had declared his Commission concerning some smaller matters, and withall demanded of him, Whether he could with patience abide to hear himself not only profitable unto himself, but also necessary? The King made answer again and said, That he would not only give him the hearing, but also yield him thanks besides.

A in case he would deliver ought unto him for his good. Whereupon he perswaded him earnestly, that forasmuch as he had obtained peace already, he should send his Embassadors to Rome, to crave league also and amity: to the end, that if Antiochus began to stir, he might not be thought to have attended and waited for some occasions and opportunities to make war. [This conference and communication with Philip was at Tempe in Thessaly.] And when he answered, That he would immediately dispatch his Embassadors: Cornelius came to Thermopyla, where a solemn Diet and assembly of all Greece is wont to be held upon certain set daies, and thither resort great numbers of people. Which meeting is called Pylaeum: where he advised the Aetolians especially to persevere constant and faithfull in the amity of the people of Rome. Some of the principall Aetolians seemed to complain between whiles, that the Romans were not so well affected to their nation after victory, as they were in time of the war: but others, more sharply blamed and reproached them, yea, and upbraided them with this, That Philip could not have been vanquished no, nor the Romans ever able so much as to pass over into Greece, without the help of the Aetolians. Cornelius forbore to make answer again to those points, for fear of farther wrangling and altercation; and promised, that if they sent to Rome they should obtain any thing that was reason. Whereupon by his advice and approbation there were deputed Embassadors. This was the issue and end of the war with Philip.

While these affairs thus passed in Greece, Macedony, and Asia, all Tuscan in manner was gone out and risen up in arms, by occasion of a conspiracy of bondslaves. For to enquire into these troubles and to repress the same, there was sent M. Acilius a Praetor (who had the civill jurisdiction between Citizens and aliens) with one of the two legions of Roman Citizens. Some of them, who were already assembled together and grown to an head, he overcame in fight: of whom many were slain, and many taken prisoners. Others he scourged and round trussed up, hanging them on gibbets, even as many as were the principall and chief of the conspiracy: and others there were whom he sent home again to their Masters.

Now the Consuls were gone into their Provinces. Marcellus so soon as he was entred into the marches of the Boii, and had over-wearied his souldiers with marching all day long, laid him down upon a certain rising of a hill, and there as he was encamping himself and his men, Corolamus a Prince or great Lord of the Boii, with a mighty power assailed and charged him, and slew upon three thousand of his men. In which sudden and tumultuary skirmish, certain brave men D of mark were slain; among whom were T. Sempronius Gracchus, and M. Junius Syllanus two Colonels of the allies: also A. Ogulnius and P. Claudius two Knight Marshals or Tribunes of the second legion. Howbeit the Romans strongly fortified their tents and defended them valiantly, which the enemies upon their fortunat victory had long assailed to no effect. And in the same standing camp he continued certain daies, whiles he cured his souldiers of their wounds, and recovered their hearts after so great a fright. The Boii (as they are a nation that of all things cannot endure any tedious delay of time) dispersed themselves into their towns and forts. Then Marcellus presently crossed the Po, and led his army into the territory of Comum, where the Insubrians lay encamped after they had solicited and caused those of * Comum to take arms. The legions E charged them so hotly, that they forced the forefront of the battell to give ground. Which when Marcellus perceived, fearing lest being once discovered they should be repulsed and discomfited, he made a cohort of Mansians to make head: and at once set forth all the troops of the Latine Cavalry against them. Their first and second charge both, mightily impeached and quailed the enemy, advancing forward lustily and pressing upon them in great fury: whereby the rest of the Roman army taking heart again and being encouraged, at the first received them manfully and made resistance only, but afterwards followed fiercely upon them: insomuch as the Gauls were able no longer to abide their violence, but turned their backs, took them to their heels, and ran away by heaps. Valerius Antius writeth, that in this battell there were forty thousand men slain and above five hundred and seven military ensignes taken, with 432 chariots: besides many chains F of gold, whereof Claudius presented one (very massie above the rest and of great weight) unto Jupiter, which was hung up within the Temple in the Capitoll, as he writeth. The same day was the Camp of the Gauls forced and ransackt, and the town of Comum also within few daies taken by assault. Upon this there were eight and twenty boroughs or forts that fell away and revolted to the Consul. But the Historiographers agree not upon this, Whether the Consul led his forces against the Insabrians first, or the Boians; and whether he raised out the dishonour of a former foil and defeat by a fortunate victory in this battell: or contrariwise, after a prosperous fight achieved before Comum, he blotted and defaced the same with a shamefull overthrow received at the Boians hand.

During this variable and alternative fortune, L. Purpurio the other Consul, marched into G the Boians Country through the tribe Sappinia. And when he was approached near to a Castle called * Mutilum, he feared lest he should be enclosed and intercepted by the Boians and Ligurians; whereupon he retired with his forces the same way that he came, and fetching a great compass about through the open country in safety and security, he came at length to his Collegue. Who having joyned both their powers together, first ranged over the Boians territories, wasting and spoiling untill they came as far as * Felsina. This Town with other strong burroughs and forts, and in a manner all the Boians yielded themselves, save only their youth, who were up up in arms to pill and spoil, and were at that time retired unto the forests and glins out of the way. After this the army marched toward the Ligurians. The Boians making full account to assail the Roman army at unawares, which marched without good regard of themselves, and none close together (for that their enemies seemed to be far off) followed after through the blind and covert forests. But when they saw that they could not overtake them, they suddenly all at once passed over the Po in small bothoms and punts, and after they had spoiled and pilld the Levians and Libuans, as they returned from thence with a booty raised out of the country, they chanced in the utmost frontiers of Liguria, to light upon the army of the Romans in their march. Sooner and with more eagerness fell they to fight, than if they had appointed both time and place, and been prepared aforehand to strike a battell. There it well appeared, of what force anger is to prick on and sharpen mens spirits to conflict. For the Romans more greedy of murder and bloodshed, than of victory, fought so, as they scarce left the enemies one messenger to carry the news of their unhappy overthrow. In regard of these exploits, upon the Consuls letters brought to Rome, ordained it was, that there should be a solemn procession and thanksgiving to the gods for three daies. Shortly after Marcellus came to Rome, unto whom was granted a triumph with great content of the LL. of the Senat; and whiles he was in his Magistracy he triumphed over the Insubrians and Comians, leaving for his Colleague good hope likewise of a triumph, because himself (to say a truth) in that nation fought but unfortunately, whereas his Colleague sped well enough, and had a lucky hand. Much spoil of the enemies was carried in a pomp, upon the Chariots that were taken and won from them. Many ensigns and banners were born in a shew, besides in money, to the value of 320000 asses of brasse coin; and 234000 bigate peeces of silver. The footmen had 800000 given them apiece, every horseman and centurion had thrice as much.

The same year King Antiochus, whiles he kept his winter at Ephesus, assaied to reduce all the Cities and States of Asia unto the ancient form of government and subjection, assuring himself, that the rest would not be hard to be subdued and brought under, because the towns were either situate upon plains, or nothing well fortified with walls, and not furnished with men and munition. As for Smyrna and Lampsacus, they stood upon their freedom, and challenged it. Doubted it was, and great danger, that if he should let them go clear away so, some Cities in Hellespontus and Ionis would take after Smyrna, and others in Hellespontus follow the example of Lampsacus. Therefore both himself sent from Ephesus to lay siege unto Smyrna, and gave commandment, That the forces which were at Abydus (leaving only a small garrison behind) should be lead to the siege and assault of Lampsacus. And yet he threatned and terrified them not so much with forces and violence, but assaied them rather by fair means, sending to them his Embassadors, so as, partly by flattering and gentle words wherewith he entertained them, and partly by mild reproof for their rashness and obstinacy, he endeavoured to put them in some hope, that shortly they should have whatsoever they desired: and then, both they themselves, and all others should evidently see, that they had obtained their liberty by the especial grace and favour of the King, and not usurped and gained it by occasion of some advantage and opportunity. To this they answered again, That Antiochus ought neither to marvel, nor be offended and displeased at them, if they could not well endure the hope which they had of freedom, thus to be deferred from time to time. Then he departing from Ephesus in the beginning of the spring sailed unto Hellspontus with his fleet. His land forces he transported over to Madytus a City in Chersonesus, and joyaed them to his strength by sea. And because they shut the gates upon him, he environed the town with armed men, and when he was at the point to give the assault, and to bend his engines of battery against the walls, it was surrendered into his hands. Upon the like fear the Inhabitants also of other Cities in Chersonesus yielded themselves. After this he came to Lyfimachia with his whole power, as well of land-souldiers as sea-servitors. And finding it abandoned, ruinat, and lying (as it were) along, (for but few years before the Thracians had forced, sacked, and burnt it) he had a great desire to rear and set upright again that noble and famous City, seated in so good and commodious a place. And therefore he took great care, and employed all his endeavour to re-edifie the walls, to re-build the edifices, to redeem and ransom the Lyfimachians that were in slavery, to seek out all those that were dispersed over Hellespontus and Chersonesus; and gather them together, yea, and to enroll new inhabitants upon hope of gain and profit, and by all means possible to store and people the City again. And withall, because he would ease them of the fear they had of the Thracians, he went in person with the one half of his land-forces to waste and spoil the confines of Thrace; the other part with all the sea-souldiers and mariners he left hard at work about the repairing of the City.

About this time as L. Cornelius (being sent by the Senat to compose the controversies and variance between the two Kings, Antiochus and Ptolomeus) abode at Selymbria; so of the ten Commissioners above said, P. Lentulus departed from Burgylla, P. Villius and L. Terentius from Thasus, and arrived all three at Lyfimachia: where L. Cornelius likewise met them from Selymbria; and a few daies after King Antiochus, being newly returned out of Thracia, The first meeting and salutation between him and the Commissioners was friendly and courteous, yea, and there passed to and fro afterwards divers amiable kindneses and loving entertainments mutually. But when they entered once to parl of their Commission that they had in charge, and of the present State of Asia, then there was fretting and fuming and their blood up. The Roman Agenes stuck not to tell him to his face, that all that he had done, since he took the sea, and departed with his fleet out of Syria

* Ismyr, Leunclavio.
* Lepseke, Leunclavio.
* Epheso.

* Maicos.

* Hexamili, Sorpbiano Policastro, Nardo.

A was displeased unto the Senat, saying, "That they thought it meet, that all the Cities should be restored unto King Ptolomeus, which had been under his dominion. For as touching those towns, which sometime Philip had been possessed of, and which Antiochus had surprized and seized upon, taking his time and vantage, when Philip was employed another way in the Roman wars, it was no reason, nor a thing tolerable, that the Romans should for so many years space, by land and sea endure so great toil, and hazard such perils, and suffer Antiochus in the end to go away with the fruit and reward of all the service. But set the case, that the Romans would take no knowledge of his coming into Asia, as a matter impertinent unto them; can they dissemble also, that now he is come over into Europe with all his forces both for land and sea, and little wanteth of making open war upon the Romans? Mary, as for him, he will not let to deny

B that he levieth any war, although he were arrived and landed in Italy. To these challenges the King made answer, and said, That he law well enough and knew before, that the Romans were inquisitive and curious enough to search what King Antiochus ought to do, but they never once thought of their own selves, how far forth they should by right proceed, as well by land as by sea. As for Asia, it appertained not at all to the people of Rome, neither had they more reason to enquire what Antiochus did in Asia, than Antiochus to search into the actions of the people of Rome in Italy. As concerning Ptolomeus, from whom they complain, that he had taken certain Cities; he did them to understand, that there was amity between him and Ptolomeus, and they were now in terms of knitting themselves shortly in nearer bonds of alliance and affinity. Neither sought he the spoil of Philip, and to enrich himself by his adversity and misfortune: or passed o-

C ver into Europe against the Romans * * * But when he was vanquished once, all that ever he had, by right and law of war, became the possessions of Seleucus, and so consequently (as he took it) appertained unto him. And during the time, that his progenitors and predecessors, were busied and troubled with other affairs, first Ptolomeus caught at some things, and Philip after at other, and so between them they usurped and seized upon other mens possessions, and namely, of certain places near and hard by in Thacia, which without all controversie belonged unto Lyfimachus. Forto reduce which into their ancient State, he was thither come, and now was in hand to re-edifie Lyfimachia anew, lately destroyed by the violence of the Thracians, to the end, that Seleucus his son might hold it as the royall seat of his kingdom. Thus as they continued arguing and debating for certain daies, there ran a rumor, but without any certain author,

D that King Ptolomeus was dead: whereupon they could grow to no conclusion of all their piffles: yet they made semblance on both sides, that they heard nothing thereof. And as well L. Cornelius, who was sent in Embassage to both the Kings, Antiochus and Ptolomeus, requested respice of some small time to confer with Ptolomeus, to the end that himself might be arrived in Egypt: before any alteration were made in the new possession of that kingdom: as also Antiochus made reckoning, that Egypt would be his, if this good occasion then were presented unto him. Therefore having dismissed the Romans, and left his son Seleucus behind him with all the land-forces, for to finish the building again of Lyfimachia which he had begun, himself with all his fleet sailed to Ephesus: and having sent his Embassadors to Quintius to treat soberly about a league and amity, he coasted along Asia and so arrived in * Lycia. And when he heard for certain at * Paraya that Ptolomeus was

E yet living, he gave over his purpose of sailing into Egypt: yet nevertheless he shaped his course & set sail for Cyprus: and when he had doubled the point of Chelidonium, he staid awhile in * Pamphylia about the river * Eurymedon, by occasion of a mutiny among the mariners & oar-men. From thence he weighed anchor, and when he was sailed as far as a place called [The heads of the river * Sarus] there arose a gulf and fearful tempest, wherein he had like to have been cast away and drowned with all his fleet. Many of his ships were run aground, & many of them swallowed up of the sea, so as there escaped not one of them by swimming to land. A number of men there perished, not of base mariners only, and unknown common souldiers, but also of his near and special friends. Having rallied the disperied reliques of this shipwrack, seeing he had no means and was not able to reach and gain Cyprus, he returned again to Seleucia, with an army nothing so puissant nor so

F well furnished, as when he set out in his voyage. There he commanded his ships to be haled a-land, and laid up in their docks (for winter now approached) & himself took his journey to * Antiochia, there to lye all that winter time. And in these terms stood the affairs of the Kings.

At Rome, there were first instituted in this year three Triumvirs called Epulones, to wit, C. Licinius Lucullus, T. Romuleius (who was the man that put up the bill for their creation) and P. Porcius Lecca. And by a law in that behalf ordained, these Triumvirs were allowed as well as a Bishop, the long embrodered robe of purple. But in this year great debate & variance there was between the Questors or Treasurers of the City Q. Fabius Labeo & L. Aurelius of the one side, and all the Priests on the other side. These treasurers were at some fault for mony, because they were minded and appointed to make the last payment unto certain privat persons, for the loan-silver which

G they had disbursed for the wars: these monies the Treasurers demanded of the Augurs and Bishops, to furnish out the said payment: for that during the wars, they only had not been contributors in any levy. The Priests appealed to the Tribunes, and called for their lawfull favour: but all was in vain, and so they were forced to satisfie all the arterages for the years past, wherein they had paid nothing. This year there died two Bishops, and new were installed in their rooms, M. Marcellus the Consul entered in place of T. Sempronius Tudicanus, who deceased Prxtor in Spain; and L. Pulvius instead of M. Cornelius Cotheus. Q. Fabius Maximus also an Augur died a very young young man, before he had born any office of State: But for that year there was not substituted a new Augur in his room.

After this, M. Marcellus the Consul held the solemn assembly for the election of Consuls. And Consuls were created L. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Porcius Cato. Then were the Prætors chosen, namely, C. Fabricius Luscinus, Cn. Atinius Labeo, C. Manlius Volsus, Ap. Claudius Nero, P. Manlius, and P. Porcius Lecca. The Ediles of the chair M. Fulvius Nobilior, and C. Flaminius divided among the people 1000000 Modii of wheat, at two asses a Modius. This store of corn had the Sicilians brought to Rome for the honour of C. Flaminius and his father. And Flaminius was content that his companion in office should reap a full part of the thanks for this gratuity. The games called Roman were exhibited in most sumptuous manner, and thrice represented all over again. The Ediles of the Commons Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus, and C. Sempronius, who also was the high Patriarch-Priest, and Superintendent, called Curio Max. called in question many of the City Bailiffs that gathered their rents for pastures, judicially to answer upon their accounts before the people. Three of them were condemned, and of their silver raised upon their fines, they built the Temple of Faunus in the Island. The Plebeian plaies were renewed for two daies, and a solemn public feast was celebrated in regard of them.

The same day that L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius Cato entred their office, they proposed unto the Senat concerning the government of the Provinces. And order was given by the LL. of the Councill, that so far as the war increased so in Spain, as required not only a Consular army, but a Consul also for the Leader; the Consuls should either agree between themselves for the government of the two Provinces, to wit, the hither Spain, and Italy, or else to cast lots therefore: That he whose hap it was to rule Spain, should have with him two legions, five thousand Latine allies, and five hundred horse; and likewise to have the conduct of a fleet of twenty galleies of war: that the other Consul should levy and enroll two legions; which were thought sufficient to defend and keep France in obedience, considering the courages of the Insularians and Boii, were well cooled and abated the last year. Cato by lot had the charge of Spain, and Valerius of Italy. Then the Prætors cast lots for their Provinces. To C. Fabricius Luscinus fell the jurisdiction over the Citizens of Rome: to C. Atinius Labeo over the strangers. C. Manlius Volsus governed Sicily, and Ap. Claudius Nero the farther Spain. M. Porcius Lecca was assigned to rule Pisa, to the end he might be upon the back of the Ligurians, and P. Manlius was appointed as an assistant and coadjutor to the Consul in the higher Spain. As for T. Quintius, his Commission was renewed for one year longer, in regard that not only Antiochus and the Etolians, but also Nabis the Lacedæmonian Tyrant, were doubted and suspected not to stand found to the Romans; and for him were set out two legions: and if need were of any supply to make up the companies thereof, the Consuls were enjoined to enroll new souldiers, and to send them over into Macedonia. Also Appius Claudius had a warrant to take up 2000 foot, and two hundred horse, over and above that legion which Q. Fabius had. The like number of fresh horse and foot was appointed for P. Manlius to be sent into the higher Spain: and the same legion was granted unto him, which was commanded by Minutius the Prætor. Moreover, P. Porcius Lecca was to have the leading of two hundred footmen and fifty horse, drawn out of the Gauls army, for to lie in Hetruria about Pisa. Last of all, in Sardinia P. Sempronius Longus continued still in place of command. Thus the Provinces being distributed, the Consuls before they departed out of the City, by advice and counsell of the Bishops performed the solemnity of the sacred Spring which was vowed before by the Prætor C. Cornelius Mammula, according to the mind of the Senat and the good liking of the people, in the year when Cn. Servilius and Cn. Flaminius were Consuls: and so it was celebrated one and twenty years after it was first vowed. Much about this time was C. Claudius Pulcher, the son of Appius, elected Augur, and invested in that Sacerdotal dignity, in the place of Q. Fabius Maximus, who died the year before.

When as men began now to marvel that there was so little account made of the war begun already in Spain, there were letters brought from Q. Minutius with news, That he had fought a fortunate field before the town of Turba, with Budares and Besafides, two Spanish Generals and great commanders: that he had slain twelve thousand enemies, taken Budares the General himself prisoner, and that the rest were discomfited and put to flight. Upon the reading of these letters, less fear there was of Spain, from whence they looked for great wars.

After the return of the ten Delegates or Commissioners abovesaid, all the care was, and no talk else but about Antiochus and his affairs. These men, after they had declared first how their proceeding went with King Philip, and upon what conditions they had granted peace, informed and gave them to understand, "That there was as great a war behind from Antiochus: that he had passed over the seas into Europe with a mighty Armado, and as puissant an army for land service; and had not been averted another way by a vain hope to invade and seize upon Egypt, which he conceived of a vainer bruit and rumor of Ptolemy his death: all Greece would have been anon on a light fire, and up in arms. For the very Etolians themselves, a nation naturally of an unquiet spirit, and incensed besides against the Romans, would not have sit still and been in rest. Moreover, there was another malady and mischief as dangerous, seated as it were within the ribs & in the very heart of Greece: to wit, Nabis, the tyrant at this present of the Lacedæmonians only, but shortly, if he may be let alone, of all Greece: who for avarice and cruelty is equal to all the famous and noted tyrants that ever were: and if he be suffered to posses

HA "possess himself of Argos, and to hold it as a fortress to command all Peloponnesus, when the Roman armies shall be once transported home again into Italy, in faith, Greece may make small boast of being delivered from Philip: for this they shall be sure of at least, if of nothing else, to have a near-neighbour tyrant, instead of a King far off, for to be their Lord and imperiously to command them. The ancient Senators, hearing these intelligences from grave persons of good quality, and who made report of all things not by hearsay, but upon their own knowledge, were of advice and resolved to have a good eye and regard with all speed unto Antiochus, considering the King was passed already into Syria, whatsoever the occasion was. But as touching the Tyrant, after they had disputed and debated the matter long time, Whether they had sufficient cause already to determine upon some final conclusion, or should refer unto the wisdom and judgement of T. Quintus the managing of those affairs, therein to proceed and do according as he should deem it good and expedient for the Common-wealth: in fine, they permitted him to use his own discretion concerning the Lacedaemonian Tyrant: supposing that the matter was not of such weight and consequence as to concern the main state of the weal-publike so materially, whether it were hastened or protracted; but rather it behoved them to be advised and consider well, what Annibal and the Carthaginians would do, if haply the war with Antiochus were begun and once aloof. They [at Carthage] that sided with the adverse faction of Annibal, had sent divers and sundry letters unto the principall LL. at Rome, every one privately to his friends to this effect. That there passed messengers and letters from Annibal to Antiochus, and that there were Embassadors again that secretly came from the King to him. And like as there be some beasts so wild and savage as never can be tamed; so the courage and spirit of that man was such, as might not possibly be dulced or appeased. For he daily complained that the City languished and grew feeble with idleness, and by sitting still and doing nothing, was overgrown as it were with moss, and impossible it was to raise and stir it up but with sound of armour and weapons. These advertisements carried likelihood of truth and good credit with them, in regard of the late war, so fresh in memory, which he alone began first, and managed to the last. Over and besides, he had provoked by a late act of his, many great and mighty personages, who set their hearts against him. The order and degree of Judges at that time bore chief sway and sovereign authority in Carthage: in this respect principally, for that the same Judges were perpetual. The goods, the honour and reputation, yea, and the life of every man lay in their hands. He that displeased one of that bench, was sure to have all the rest his enemies and to be upon him: and there never wanted one promoter or other to carry tales and give information to these judges against a man, if they saw them ill affected once and bent against one. During the time of this imperious and tyrannical rule of theirs, (for as their power was exceeding all measure, so they bare themselves therein as outrageously beyond the limits of civility) it was Annibal his hap to be Prator; and by virtue of his place he sent for one of the treasurers to come before him: but he made no reckoning of his authority, and refused to obey: for the said treasure was one of the contrary side: and because from the degrees of those treasurers they mounted presently into the highest order of the Judges, therefore he carried with him an haughty mind already, in regard of the high room that he was shortly to step into. Annibal you may be sure took this as a great disgrace and indignity to his person, and therefore he sent a purfivant or serjeant to attach the body of the Treasurer aforesaid: and presently calling the people to a generall assembly, he commanded him there to be presented: where he accused and blamed the party himself, no more than the whole order and degree of the Judges: through whose insolent pride and excessive power, both laws and Magistrats were nothing regarded but trodden under foot. And perceiving that these words of his tickled the itching ears of the people, considering also that their proud demeanor prejudiced the liberty of the meanest persons: immediately he published a law, and got it enacted, That those Judges should be chosen every year, and that thenceforth one and the same man might not be a Judge two years together. But look how much thank he had at the Commons hands for this act, so much he offended many of the great men and principals of the City. Another thing besides he did, whereby he purchased to himself the ill will of some private persons, in tending the common good of the weal-publike. The finances and revenues of the State, partly, through negligence went to decay, and partly, were shared out in dividends between some certain of the head Citizens and Magistrats: and more than that, the money which by way of tribute was to be paid yearly unto the Romans, was too short and not to be found: and it appeared, that a sore levy would be imposed upon private persons shortly to make those payments out of their own purses. Annibal, after he had cast up the books, and made an estimate and just abstract how much the rents and revenues of the City amounted unto, as well from customs by sea as land, and to what uses they were employed; and perceiving thereby what was defrayed in the ordinary charges of the State, and what went a wrong way, and was diverted by these cheeves to their own selves, he pronounced aloud in open audience of the whole assembly, That the arrearsages should be gathered up and brought into the common Chest: and so privat persons might be discharged and eased of their impositions of tribute, and the Common-wealth would be rich enough and able to perform and furnish out the monies due to the people of Rome. And as he thus said, so he was as good as his word, and executed it accordingly. Then these caterpillers, who for certain years lived by robbery of the common treasure, turned upon the fruits of the City, rared spitefully against Annibal, as if he had done them them great wrong in taking their own goods from them, and not proceeded in justice to wrest out of their hands their flon substance: and in great malice and bitterness ceased not to provoke against Annibal the Romans, who were ready enough of themselves to pick some quarrell to him, to seek occasion of hatred, and to find an hole in his coat. Scipio Africanus for a long time gave the deaf ear unto them, and misliked the course: for he supposed it was not for the honour and majesty of the people of Rome to subscribe unto those imputations charged upon Annibal, to entertain the spite and hatred of men, and to interests and insert publike authority within the privat factions of the Carthaginians; and not to be content to have vanquished Annibal in war, unless they also took upon them the persons of accusers, and preferred a slanderous libell & bill of indictment, and ware thereto Billa vera. But at length they wrought and brought about, that Embassadors should be sent to Carthage, who in the Senat there might charge Annibal categorically, with plotting and practising with Antiochus for to wage war against them. And these three were addressed to this Embassie, C. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Culles; who being arrived there, caused it to be given out to as many as should demand the cause of their coming, (and all by instruction from the adversaries of Annibal) that their errand was to compose and end the debates between Masaniissa King of the Numidians, and the Carthaginians. This was commonly divulged and beleaved for truth. But Annibal found them straight and smelt this juggling, and was not ignorant that he was the only man that the Romans shot at, and howsoever peace was granted to the Carthaginians, yet they continued an endless and inexorable war with him alone still. Whereupon he resolved to frame himself to give place to the time and yield unto fortune. And being furnished aforehand with all things requisite to take his flight, when he had of purpose all the day long shewed himself in the publike place of assembly very formally, to turn by all suspicion of his intended resolution, so soon as it began to be dark night, in his Citizens gown as he went a day, and attended in the Hall, he gat him forth straight to the City gate, accompanied only with two persons, and those not privy at all to his purpose and designment. And having found his hories ready in the place appointed, he mounted and rode apace that night untill he was come to a certain quarter of the territory of Voca: and by the next morning, he passed between Acylla and Thapsus, and recovered a tower of fort of his own: where he was embarked in a ship ready rigged and appointed with sail and oar to take sea and away. Thus departed Annibal out of Affrick, lamenting more often the hard hap and calamity of his country, than of his own friends and kinsfolk. And the same day he fell with the Island Circina: where the Carthaginians found in the rode certain barks charged with merchandise: and when at his coming ashore out of his ship, there came many running toward him for to salute and welcome him thither, he charged his own company, that if any asked concerning him, they should make answer, That he went upon an Embassage to Tyrus: but fearing lest any of their barks should disanchor that night, and make report at Thapsus or Acylla that he was seen in Circina: he caused a beast to be killed for sacrifice, and invited the Masters of the ships and all the Merchants to supper; and therewith commanded all the sails and cross sail-yards to be had out of the vessels, to make thereof a large pavillion, that they might sit in the shade at their supper: for that, as it fell out, it was then midsummer. And as the time and such provision as they had, would give leave, he set out a feast and banquet: he spared for no wine, and continued the merriment far within night. Then Annibal, so soon as he could espy his time for to deceive those that were in the harbor, weighed anchor. The rest were fast asleep: and when the next day they awoke and roused themselves, with their drunken and drouzy nols (and far forth day it was, and late ere they arose) they were faine to spend some hours in fitting their oars again in their right places, and the tackling of the ships in good order.

In this while, at Carthage the ordinary multitude that used to frequent the house of Annibal, repaired as their manner was to his gate-house: and when it was voiced abroad, that he was not to be found, all the company gathered together in the market place, seeking and enquiring for the principall and chief personage of their City. Some gave out (as the truth was) that he was fled: other said plainly, that he was murdered and made away through the falshood and villany of the Romans; and this they yicked not to avouch. There might a man have seen sundry and divers countenances (as it is rarely commonly in Cities where there is siding and parts-taking) as each one is affected to his own party and faction. At last, news came that he was seen at Circina. The Roman Embassadors having upon audience given, declared in the Senat of Carthage, that the LL. of their Senat had certain intelligence, that both aforetime, King Philip was by Annibal especially solicited and set on to make war with the people of Rome; and also now there hath been letters and messengers with credence sent from him to King Antiochus; and that he would never rest untill he had set all the world together in arms: and therefore if the Carthaginians were desirous to content and satisfie the Romans, they should not suffer these parts of his to escape unpunished: then the Carthaginians made answer, and said, That nothing of all this passed by publike councill or consent or allowance of the State, howbeit they would be willing to do whatsoever the Romans thought to be reason.

Annibal this while had a boon voyage, and with a merry gale of wind arrived at Tyrus, where he was received of the Tyrians, the first founders of Carthage, as if he had been in another country of his own: received he was, I say, and entertained with all kind of honour, becoming a man so famous and renowned. After he had so journeyed there some few daies, he sailed to Antioch: where

A Where understanding that the King himself was already departed from thence, he repaired to his Inn, and conferred with him, as he was setting out an yearly solemnity of games and plaies near Daphne, and being courteously also by him intreated, he made no stay, but to ship-board and Sea again. And at Ephesus overtook the King, whom he found floating and wavering still in his mind, and unresolved what to do as touching the Roman war. But this coming of Annibal, was no small point to turn the balance, and to move him to enter into the enterprise thereof. The Etolians likewise at the same time were estranged and alienated in affection from the Roman league and society, whose Embassadors demanding to have Pharalum and Lencas again, with other Cities, according to the tenor and form of the first league, the Senat turned over and referred to Quintius.

C The law Oppia proposed and enacted by C. Oppius a Tribune of the Common, in the time of the Punic war, for the abridging and restraint of the excess in womens apparel, was after much variance and debate repealed, notwithstanding that Porcius Cato laboured to the contrary, that it might not be abolished. This Cato made a voyage into Spain, and by force of arms (beginning first to war as Emporix) brought the hisher province of Spain on this side Iberus to quietness. T. Quintius Flamininus levied war against the Lacedemonians and Nabis their tyrant, in which he sped fortunately, and so prevailed, that he made an end thereof, granted them peace to his own good liking and pleasure, delivered Argos, and set it free, which was before in subjection to the tyrant. The Senat then, and never before, beheld the publick games and pastimes by themselves, apart from the rest of the people. Which to bring about Sex. Albius Pictus and L. Corneilius Cethegus the Censors, set in foot and intermeddled themselves, to the great indignation and discontentment of the Commons. More colonies were planted with Roman citizens. M. Potitius Cato triumphed over Spain. The wars also which fortunately were achieved against the Boii and the French Insabres are here recorded. T. Quintius Flamininus, who had vanquished Philip King of the Macedonians and Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, yea, and freed all Greece from their oppression, for these many and noble exploits, rode in triumph three daies together. The Carthaginian Embassadors brought word, that Annibal who was fled unto Antiochus, banded with him and combined to make war. Annibal had besides assured by means of one Aristo a Tyrian (sent as a courier with credence only and no letters, to Carthage) for to move and sollicite the Carthaginians to rebellion.

B Etwen the troublesome cares of great wars, which either were not fully ended, or at hand ready to begin, there hapned an occurrence, which in it self being but a small matter to speak of, and of little regard; considering the sides and part-taking about it, grew to a mighty head and contention in the end. M. Fundanius and L. Valerius Tribunes of the Commons, preferred a bill unto the people touching the abrogation of the Law Oppia. For C. Oppian sometime, even when the Punic war was at the hottest, and whiles Q. Fabius and T. Sempronius were Consuls, had promulged a Statute, by virtue whereof, No woman of what degree soever might neither have in Ornaments and Jewels above half an ounce weight of gold, nor wear any habiments wrought of sundry colours, nor yet ride in Coach within the City of Rome, or any other Town, nor nearer than a mile from thence, unless it were upon occasion of some solemn feast or publick sacrifice. Now M. Junius Brutus and P. Junius Brutus, both Tribunes likewise of the Commons, stood in defence and maintenance of the said law Oppia, and affirmed plainly they would not suffer it to be annulled. Many a nobleman was seen in this quarrel: some spake for the Law, and others gain-said it. The Capitol was full of people, either taking part and favouring the cause, or else opposing themselves, and urging the contrary. The very dames of the City themselves could neither by perswasion and advice, nor by any reverent and womanly regard, nor yet by the express and absolute commandment of their husbands be kept within doores: but do what they could, they bespread all the streets of the City, beset and kept all the waies into the common place, besetting and entreating their husbands as they passed by, and went down thither, to permit and give their consent. That seeing the good estate of the Common-wealth now flourished, and the private wealth of every man increased daily, their wives also and matrons might be allowed to have their ancient ornaments and gay attire again. The number of these women grew every day more then other, for now they flocked also out of the Towns, Villages, and other places of resort in the country, and shewed themselves at Rome. In so much, as they took heart at length, and were so bold as to encounter the Consuls, the Pretors, and other Magistrates, requesting and be-beseeching their favour, to stand with them, and forward the cause. But as for one of the Consuls, Marcus Porcius Cato by name, they could not with all their prayers entreat him to incline unto their suit: who in the maintenance of the said law, and that it might not be revoked, take in the frequent assembly of the people to this effect. "My Masters and citizens of Rome, If every one of us had fully resolved and purposed with himself to hold his own, and keep the rightful authority and preheminance that he hath over his own wife, less ado and trouble we should have had with them all together at this day. Now having given them the head at home so much, that the curtness and shrewdness of women hath conquered our liberty and freehold there; behold, here also in publick place it is trodden down and trampled underfoot: and because we were not able every man to rule his own in severall, now we stand in fear and dread them all in general. Certainly, I my self thought ever until now, that it was but a feined fable and devised tale that went of a certain * Island, wherein by a conspiracy of women, all the men were murdered every one, and that sex utterly made away and footed out. But well I see now, be they creatures never so weak, so silly and feeble, let them once have their meetings, their conventicles and secret conferences, they will work mischief in the highest degree, and be as dangerous as any other. And surely for mine own part, I cannot resolve in mine own conscience and determine, whether of the twain be worse; the thing I mean in it self, or the precedent example and consequence thereof, considering the manner how it is handled. Of which two, the one toucheth us that are Consuls and the rest of the magistrats, the other concerneth you rather my masters and citizens of Rome. As for the matter in question, and proposed unto you, whether it be good and expedient for the weal-publick or no, that resteth in you to determine and judge, who are to give your voices and suffrages. But this seditious insurrection here, of women, be it of themselves, or procured by your motion and instigation, M. Fundanius & L. Valeri- us, no doubt it argueth and implieth a great default in the Magistrats, and I wot not whether it will be a fouler blot and dishonour to you that are Tribuns, than to us Consuls. Yours will the blame be if ye have brought women now to raise and stir up tribunitious seditions; and ours the shame, if we needs must admit and accept of laws, whether we will or no, for fear of a commotion and separation of our women, as sometimes we were forced to do by the departure and insurrection of our Commons. I assure you for mine own self, when I passed erewhile into this common-place through the press and throng of these women, I was abashed & could not chuse but blush. And had I not been more respective of the reputation, the honour and reverence of some in particular than of them all together, because it should not be thought & said, that they had been checked and taken up by the Consul; I would have said unto them, What new fashion is this good wives, to run gadding abroad into the open streets, to beset the passages, and to as-front, yea, and hang upon other womens husbands as ye do? What? could ye not every one at home have dealt with your own good-men in the cause, and craved their help? or can ye speak fair and flatter better, can ye be more pleasant and affable abroad in the Town, than within your houses? or make love to other men, rather then to your own husbands? And yet to speak up-rightly, if wives were of that modesty and womanly carriage, as to keep themselves within the compass and bounds of their own liberty, and pass no farther; it were not besitting you I wot, so much as at home to trouble your selves about our laws here, nor to busy your brains, to know either what new Statuts passed, or what old were cased. Our ancestors in old time would not, that women in any wise should dispose so much as of their own privat matters without the advice and direction of a Governor and Overseer: and therefore in great wisdom they ordained, that they should be ordred and ruled, by their parents, by their brethren, by their husbands. But we (and God will) can abide them to intermeddle in state-matters, to govern the weal-publick, to converse with us in the common place, in publick assemblies and courts of parliament. For what else do they now in the streets, in the cross waies & at all avenues, but, some of them give their voyces that the bills of the Tribuns may pass and others advise and be of opinion, that the law Oppia may be repealed? Let this outrageous & unreasonable nature of theirs have the head; let these unruly creatures and untamed animals have their wil; and bridle them not; see then how of themselves they will keep a mean and measure in their licentiousnes, unless you curb them & hold them in. Tush, this is the least matter of all that displeaseth these women: there are a 1000 things besides that they think hardly of, and are discontented to be held unto by old customes and positive laws. Liberty in all things; nay, to speak more truly, a loose and dissolute licentiousnes is the very thing they long after and desire. For go they away cleer with this once, what is it that they will not attempt and give the venture for? Do but run through and count the laws provided in this behalf for women, whereby our fore-fathers and predecessors have kept down and restrained their disorderly appetites, and with which they have sought to subject them to their husbands: yet, hardly can ye with the help of them all, keep them in awe and tied fast, but break out they will, and have their own waies. What then? how and if ye suffer them to catch this and that, and t'other thing to it: if I say, ye let them wrest from you one thing after another, until at length they be check-mates with their husbands, think ye that ever you shall be able to support and endure them? Begin they once to be equals, they will soon be superiours: make them your fellows, and streight-ways they will be your masters. But alas, we lay too hardly to their charge! The thing that they stand upon is no more but this, That no new Act and statute pass against them: for no equal and reasonable thing do they refuse: their desire and prayer is only that

- A "that they might not be wronged. No, no, it is cleane contrary: That law which ye have received "and admitted, that which by your suffrages you first granted, that which by the practise and ex"perience of so many years you have allowed and approved, they would have you to revoke and "abolish: which is as much to say, as by annulling that one, to infringe, impair, and diminish the "authority and vertue of the rest. No law is there so well devised, that is good, commodious and "agreeable unto all. This only is intended principally to be considered, that it may be profitable "to the most part, and serve in general. For if as each person shall find an act prejudicial, hurtful, "and offensive to himself, he may be allowed by and by to undo and demolish the same: to what
 "end should all the people assemble together to the making of those statutes, which they anon a"gainst whom they were enacted, may abolish & overthrow? But gladly would I know the great B "occasion and cause, for which our dames in such trouble and uprore run out into the streets, and "have much ado to forbear the common place, and to mount up into the Rostra to make an ora"tion to this audience? Is it for this, to redeem out of the hands of Annibal, their fathers, their "husbands, their children and brethren, whom he keepeth prisoners? Nay, that calamity is far e"nough off at this day, and far may it ever be I pray God from our City and Common-weale. And "yet when the time was of that hard fortune and calamity, yon would not hearken to their pite"ous and kind prayers in that behalf. But it may well be, that it is neither natural love and kind "affection, nor careful regard of their dear friends, but meer touch of conscience and sense of reli"gion that hath brought them thus together in a congregation. And ready they are, it may be, to "receive and intertain dame Cybele or Ida, coming from Pescinus out of Phrygia. What honest C "colour and shew, so much as in word only can be pretended to bear out and cover this muti"nous sedition of women? May this (say they) that we may glitter in our golden jewels, and "shine in purple robes to be seen a far off: that as well on work daies as holy-daies, we may be "set up and ride in our coaches and chariots through the City, as it were in triumph, for the con"quest and victory of a law by us repealed and disannulled: for winning from you, and wringing out "of your hands, manure your beards, the liberty of your voices and suffrages: to the end that we "might not be stinted and gaged in our excessive expenses, in our dissolute profusion, in costly va"nities and superfluities. Many a time ye have heard me complain of the wasteful and sumptuous "bravery of women: and as often have you known me to inveigh against the lavish spending of "men, not privat persons only, but magistrats also in higher place: and how this City of ours is sick D "as it were at one time of two contrary diseases and maladies, to wit pinching avarice, and super"fluous prodigality, two plagues I say, that have been the bane and overthrow of all great Mo"narchies and flourishing empires. These pestilent mischiefs I dread so much the more, as our "state and common-weal encreaseth to the better; groweth wealthy every day more than others;
 "and as our dominion extendeth still farther and farther. And now that we are gotten over into "Greece and Asia, provinces full of all enticing pleasures and alluring delights of the world, now "that we are come to finger and handle the rich treasures of mighty Monarchs, I fear me that even "these things have rather captivated us, than we them. The goodly images, statues and pictures "that came from Syracusa, are (trust me truly) dangerous to this City, and threaten no less than so "many ensignes of the field displayed against it. And I hear say already, that there are many, and E "too too many, that praise and have in admiration the beautiful ornaments of Corinth & Athens,
 "and begin to make a scorn and game of the images of the Roman Gods made of potters earth
 "only, laughing much at them, where they see them standing forth of the walls. Well, for my part
 "I had rather have these gods so propice and favorable to us as they be than such as those: and so "I hope they will ever be, if we can suffer them to abide still in their usual shrines and places ac"customed. No longer ago than in our fathers daies, King Pyrhus sent his Embassador Cyneas of "purpose, and assayed by rich and goodly gifts, to tempt the minds not only of our men, but also of "our women. There was no law Oppia as then in force to bridle and keep down the costly pomp "and bravery of women: and yet not one of them all received ought at his hands. And what think
 "ye was the cause? even the same and no other, for which our ancestors in times past, never so F "much as thought upon the providing of any such law. There was no pride then, nor riotous su"perfluity to restrain. And like as the skill and knowledge of diseases, must precede and go afore "their cures and remedies: even so evil desires and enormous lusts had need to bud forth & spring "before the laws, which should repress and cut them down. What caused the law Licinia to be "made, concerning 500 acres of ground, forbidding that no man should possess above, but the "exceeding covetousnes of men, encroaching still and laying land to land? What brought in the "law Cincia, as touching gifts and presents, but this, that the Commons began already to be vassals
 "as it were and tributaries to the Senat. No marvail therefore it is, nor strange may it seem, that "neither the law Oppia, nor any other providing for the cutting off the unmeasurable expences of "women, was required and thought needful in those daies; when gold, when purple freely tendred G "and offered unto them was refused. If now at this day Cyneas were come, and went with such "gifts round about in the City, he should find receivers enough of women, standing in every street "ready for him. And verily, with all the wit I have, I can not devise what the cause and reason "should be of many lustful desires and appetites that reign in this age. For say, that if one of you "were kept short and debarred of that, which another might lawfully have: peradventure there "might rise in your hearts (through infirmity) some shame and abashtment in nature, or else dis"pleasure and discontentment in reason: so being all as ye are brought within one compass of fur"niture

of L. Valerius against the law Oppia.

“mixture and apparel, and no odds at all between you, what need any one of you to fear, lest she “should be looked into, marked or observed, more than another. I must needs say, the shame that “followeth & attendeth either upon niggardie or poverty, is worst of all others: but the law quit“teth and freeth you of both, when you want but that only which by law ye may not have, and “no man wil reproach you therefore. Yes mary, quoth some rich and wealthy dame, this same e“quality and no distinction at all among us, of all things I cannot abide: Why may not I according “to my calling, be seen arrayed in purple, and adorned with gold? And why is not the poor estate “of others known, but lieth hidden under this pretext & cloak of a law: so as they may be thought “yet (were it not for the law) that such and such things they would have; where as indeed they “are not able to maintain and bear it out? Would ye (in faith) my masters and citizens of Rome, “have your wives to strive thus, that the richer sort might deserve to have that, which no other I “can reach unto: and the poor again, because by that means they would not be despised, over“strein themselves to go above their calling and ability? Certainly I dare avow, if they begin once “to shame at that which is not shame-worthy, they will not abash at any thing; be it never so “shameful. Have it she will out of her own, so long as it lasteth: and when all is gone, to her hus“bands purse she will go. Alas poor man and wo begunn is that husband, as wel he that is intrea-“ted by his wife, to stretch his purse strings, as he that is not, when he shal see another man to give “her that, which he would not allow himself. And even now ye see how openly in the street (un-“shame-faced as they be) they are in hand with other womens husbands, yea, & that which more “is, they keep an intreating for to cal the law, & for the favour of their voices only. For of some “they have got the good will no doubt already, whiles themselves wil not be intreated, but draw “misery upon thee, upon thy state, and upon thy children. Wel, let the law once cease to set down “a gage and proportion of thy wives expences, and never think to have remedy, and to stay the “same of thy self with all thou canst do. Be not deceived firs, to think that the world will be ever “again at the same paise, as it was before this law took place. And as it is a safer course and lesse “dangerous to let a naughty and obstinat perion alone, that he be not called into question at all; “than after he is once accused to suffer him to be quit and go away unpunished: even so this ex“cessive superfluity, would have been more tolerable, if it had not been medled & tempered with“al, than it wil be now upon the very binding and curbing thereof: much like a wild and savage “beast let loose after it hath been tyed up a time, and so made more fell and angry. To conclude “therefore of this opinion am I, that of no hand the law Oppia be repealed: and so I pray all the “Gods to vouchsafe for to bleis and turn to good, whatsoever you do or go about. When he had “thus said, those Tribuns also of the Commons, who openly promised and protested to oppose “themselves, and to crosse the repealing of the law, made some brief speeches to the same effect.
“Then L. Valerius rose up to maintain the bill by him proposed for the revoking of that law, and “spake as followeth. If privat men had stepped forth and advanced forward either to approve “and perswade, or to reject & disswade that which by us is proposed, I my self also without open“ing my mouth would have attended your wil & expected the delivery of your suffrages, as think“ing it had been sufficiently debated and discoursed already, whatsoever might be said for both “parties. But now sith that the Consul M. Porcius Cato, a man of great reputation & gravity, not “only by his countenance and authority, (which alone without any word at all spoken had been “important enough & effectual) but also in a long premeditate Oration framed with much study “and forethinking, hath impugned and inveighed against our proposed ordinance, I must of ne“cessity answer him again as briefly as I can. Who nevertheless hath spent more words in repro“ving and chastising the matrons & dames of the City, than he hath bestowed reason to the pur“pose in disswading our new law: & all verily for this intent, that he might leave it doubtful, whe“ther the women had done that which he blamed them for as indued by their own motives, or “seduced by us and our suggestions. As for me the protection directly of the cause I will take in “hand, and not busy and trouble my head in defence of our persons, against whom the Consul “hath rather glanced and girded at, by way of big words, than charged indeed by sound reasons.
“It hath pleased him to cal this, An assembly and mutinous meeting: yea, and otherwhiles he ter-“meth it, An insurrection and secession of women: because the wives in open place intreated you “to repeal that law, now in time of peace, in the flourishing and blessed state of the Common“weal, which during those troublesome daies of war, had been enacted against them. I wot full “well, that both these words and other besides are very significant, sought out, and picked for the “purpose, to enforce and aggravate the matter. And we all know, that M. Cato is an Orator not “only grave and earnest, but otherwhiles also fell, sharp and bitter: how ever otherwise by natural “disposition he be of a mild spirit and courteous enough. But to the point. What new & strange “thing is this that our wives have done, in coming abroad and assembling themselves in compa“nies, about a matter that so much concerneth and importeth themselves? What were they ne“ver seen before now, abroad in open street? I will take the pains, O Cato to turn over your own “book of Originals against your self. Listen and mark how often they have done the semblable, “and alwaies truly for the common good and benefit of the State. And first and foremost, in the “very beginning and infancy of this City, even in the reign of K. Romulus, when the Capitol was “taken and held by the Sabins: when in the midst of the Common place, they were ranged in bar“rel array and ready to fight a bloody field, was not the quarrel ended and the conflict stayed by “the dames and wives that ran in, & put themselves between the two armies? After the KK. were

- A "driven out and expelled, What hapned tho? When as the legions of the Volscians under the conduct of C. Martius incamped within 3 miles of Rome, were they not the matrons of the City that turned back this army, which doubtless would have forced our City & put it to ranck? And is not this likewise true, that when the Gauls were possessed of Rome and masters thereof, the dames of the City and none but they, even by the consent of all men, came forth into the open streets, made a contribution, and laid down that gold which paid for the ransom and redemption of the City? No longer since than in the last Punick war (because I will not stand so much upon antiquities) was it not thus, that not only when the City was at a fault for money, the widows stocks supplied the want of the common treasure? but also at what time as we were driven to seek for new Gods, and to send for them afar off to succour us in our extremities; all the wives & matrons of the City went to the Sea side for to receive the goddess Mother Idea?
- B "The occasions (qd. he) are different, and the case is not alike. Neither is it my purpose or any part of my meaning to compare causes, and to prove they are all one. This only I stand upon, and take it sufficient to excuse and cleer the women, for bringing up no strange novelty, in that they shewed themselves in open place. To proceed therefore: seeing that no man made any wonder then, of that which women did in undertaking the affairs that concerned all alike as well men as women: marvail we now that they do the lemmable, in a cause that properly and peculiarly pertaineth to themselves? And what great thing was it they did? Now in good faith we are too coy and squeamish of our hearing, and our ears over nice and delicate, if when masters disdain not to hear the prayers of their servants and slaves, we scorn to give ear to the requests of ladies and dames of honor. But now I come to the matter in question, in regard whereof the Consul his Oration consisted in two points. For first, he took it very ill, that any law at all once enacted should be revoked: and secondly, he stood upon this, that above all others the law devised and made for repressing the superfluous ornaments and attire of women should remain in force for ever. So it should seem, that the first part (a common defence as it were, of all the laws) was a speech besitting the place and person of a Consul: but the other against the exceeding pomp of women, more properly became a man (as himself) of most severe life and precise carriage. And therefore it is great doubt and to be feared, lest we should seduce you into some error, if we lay not down and shew plainly the vanity and defect both in the one and in the other. For as I confess, that of those laws which are devised and established not for a time and by occasion of some particular occurrence, but for ever and to the perpetual good of a City, none ought to be abolished; unless it be so that by use and experience the same be checked and found hurtful, or by some change of the State become needles and superfluous: so I see evidently, that those statutes and ordinances which are brought in to fit and serve some seasons, are mortal (if I may so say) and mutable with the times. And oftentimes we see, that war disclaimeth those laws which peace proclaimeth; and peace pulleth down that which war set up: like as in the government and rule of a ship, one thing is requisite in fair weather and calm Sea, another in foul and troublesome tempests. These things thus being in nature divers and distinct, let us consider I pray you, of whether sort is this law that now we are in hand to revoke. What? is it one of the ancient and royal laws made by the Kings, and equal in time with the foundation of our City? or (that which is the next in time and authority) was it set down and written in the twelve Tables by the Decemvirs, created of purpose to devise and make laws? Is it of that nature without the which as our ancestors were of opinion, that the honesty and honour of matrons could not be preserved: so we are to fear likewise, lest by the repealing thereof, we overthrow the modesty, chastity, and integrity of married women? Why? who knoweth not that this is a new law of 20 years standing and continuance and no more, made whiles Q. Fabius and T. Sempronius were Consuls? And seeing that without it, wives lived so many years before in good name and fame, and in passing good order: tell me what danger can ensue, and why we need to fear lest if it be annulled, they should break out to all loosenes and disorder. Mary, if this law had been made at first, to cage the wantonness of women, believe me then it were greatly to be doubted, that the putting down thereof would stir them up again to their former outrage. But to what end it was devised, the time it self is able to shew and testify. Annibal being in Italy, had won a victory at Cannae; he was now master of Tarentum, Lord of Arpi, and possessed of Capua: every hour men looked when he would march forward and advance his ensigns against Rome: our allies were revoked and gone: souldiers we had no more of our own to supply and make up the decayed bands; no mariners and Sea servitors could we find for the maintenance of our Armado: all our treasure in the City Chamber was spent and consumed. Driven we were to this exigent, as to rake up bondslaves for to serve in wars, and to buy them of their masters for day, yes, and to make payment of their price after the war was ended. For want of money also the Publicans and Farmers of our demain and publick profits, undertook to serve the army with corn, and to furnish us with all things needful for war at a certain price, and gave us the like day and time of payment. The Gally slaves that served at the oar we found and maintained with our own proper and private charges; and a rate and proportion was set down according to our revenues and worth in the subsidy book, what number every one should be charged with. All the gold and silver that we had in private we brought forth in common, and the Senators themselves led the way first, and gave good ensample. The widdows and orphan Children brought in their stocks or money to the City Chamber. Streight order was given, that "we should not have in our houses either of gold or silver, wrought in plate or otherwise above

 "so much, nor of silver and brasse in coin and currant money beyond a certain proportion limit-
 "ted. At such a time, our dames (belike) were set all upon their braveries, pruning, trimming, and "tricking themselves, in such sort, as the law Oppia must needs be devised, there was no other "remedy to keep down their excessive pride and superfluous expence in their attire and orna"ments: even then, I say, when by occasion that the solemn feast and sacrifice of Ceres was dis"continued, by reason of the general mourning and heavy cheer of all the wives of the City, the "Senat was fain to take order, that they should finish and end their sorrowful mourning within "thirty dayes. Who is so blind that seeth not, how in regard only of the poverty and extream
 "calamity of the City, and because all the monies of private persons should be converted into a "common stock, and for a publick use, this law was first framed, drawn, and set down, so long
 "only to stand in strength and vertue, as the cause of penning and writing it should endure and "continue? For otherwise, if those acts and decrees of the Senat, if those orders and ordinances
 "of the Commons, respective unto that present time, should be in force, and observed for ever;
 "Why make we payment of the loan money unto private men? Why do we set and to sell let "our commodities, our customes and revenues of the City, unto farmers for ready rent? Why put
 "we forth our publick works for present money paid down upon the nail? Wherefore buy we "not slaves to serve in our wars? Lastly, why are we not put to find mariners and oarmen, at our "own proper charges, as then we did? All other estates and degrees, all men else, of what calling
 "soever, feel a great change in the state of the City, from wo to weal, from adversity to prosperi"ty; and shall our wives only miss the good thereof, and not once tast nor enjoy the fruits of "peace, and publick repose and tranquillity? Shall we that are men, be in purple and scarlet? shall "we wear our embrodered gowns and robes when we are Magistrats? shall we put on our rich
 "amyces and copes, when we exercise the function and ministry of the high Priests? shall our "children go in their sode garments, purfled afore with purple? shall we permit and priviledge the "head Officers and Magistrats in our Colonies and Burrough Towns? nay, shall we suffer here at "Rome the Masters and Constables of every parish, the meanest and basest officers of all other to "wear embrodered gowns, & studded with purple? and not only so, sort to grace and credit them"selves, with these goodly ornaments and badges of worship and honour during their life, but al"so after their death, the same to be burned and buried with them? And shall we debar and for"bid our women only to use purple and scarlet in their apparel? And when you the husband may "have purple and scarlet, carpets, counter-points, and foot-cloths, what reason is there to deny "your wife, the mistress of the house, a gown or mantle of the same? And shall your horse be trap"ped and barbed more richly, and better set out with his caparison, than your wife arrayed in her "apparel? But in truth, for purple and scarlet, which are the worse for the wearing, and waxeth
 "bare, me thinks I see some reason, such as it is (although it be very hard) of sparing and restraint:
 "many for gold, wherein little or nothing is lost but the fashion and workmanship, what niggard-
 "ise, what misery is this, to make spare of it, and to deny it them? Nay, I dare avow and abide by
 "it, there is great benefit and use thereof in time of extremity; and it may help at a pinch both in "publick affairs, and in private occasions, as ye have found by good experience. But Cato said
 "moreover, There would be no emulation and envy between this good wife and that, if neither "one nor other were allowed that liberty of apparel and ornaments. True it is, but instead there-
 "of they all are mightily discontented and grieved at the heart in the mean while, disdaining to "see the wives of our allies of the Latine name and Nation, permitted to wear those ornaments
 "which they are forbidden to have, to see them, I say, all gorgeously set out with spangles and "jewels of gold, clad in their purple and scarlet cloths, riding in their coaches all over their cities, "whiles they at Rome take pains to go afoot on their ten toes, as if the State of the Empire were "seated in their Towns, and not in this their own City of Rome. This indignity were enough to "wound the hearts of men, and make them bleed: what hurt doth it then, think you, to silly wo"men, whom small matters, God wot, are wont to trouble? Alas poor souls: no magistracy and "place of government in State, no sacerdotal dignities in the Church, no triumphs, no ornaments
 "and titles of honour, are they capable of, no gifts, no spoils and prizes gotten in wars, can fall to "their shares. Neatness and fineness, gay garments, trim attire, and gorgeous habiliments, are the "honour and ornaments of women: in it they take delight, on it they set their hearts, of it they "make their joy. And therefore well have our ancestors called all furniture for the decking of "women [Mundus Muliebris]. What lay they off in time of sorrow and mourning, but their gold "and purple? what put they on and resume again, when their mourning is past, but their gold and "purple? what hang they on them besides in time of publick joy and solemn processions but their "better apparel, their richest attire & most costly ornaments? But peradventure, after ye have once "repealed the law Oppia, it will not be in your power to over-rule them, if haply you should for"bid them to wear any thing that now the law restraineth them of. And perhaps some shall have "more ado with their daughters, their wives, and sisters, and find them less tractable and pliable
 "unto their minds, than now they are. Never fear that: women cannot shake off their obedience,
 "so long as their Governors (be they fathers, husbands, or brethren) are alive; nay, of all other "things they abhor and cannot brook to be at their own liberty, when it cometh by the death ei"ther of husbands or parents: Widows state and Orphans life, they may not abide. Be sure there"fore, they had rather have their ornaments and attire to be at the disposition of your selves, than
 "of

A "of the law. And therefore, to speak a truth, you must in equity and reason protect and defend them in kindness, and not oppress them with hardness and bondage: delight ye must to be called their fathers and husbands, rather than their Lords and Masters. It pleased the Consul erewhile to give them hard words and odious terms, calling this their meeting, A mutiny of women, and a very insurrection and departure of theirs: and danger there is, no doubt, lest being up once, they will seize upon the mount Sacer, as sometimes the Commons did in their furious anger, or else possess themselves of the Aventine, and there encamp and keep an hold. Well, this weak and feeble sex, born to bear, must suffer and endure whatsoever ye shall ordain and set down against them. But take this withal at the loose for a final conclusion, that the greater power and authority ye have over them, the more discretion and moderation ye ought to use in that sovereignty of yours. After debate of words passed in this wise, in favor and disfavor of the law, the day following the women flocked in greater multitudes into the open streets, and banding themselves together, as it were, in one troop, they beset the dores and houses of the Bruni, who by interposing themselves, had hindered and crossed the bill preferred by their fellow Tribuns: and never gave they over to keep this stir, until those Tribuns flaked in their opposition, for to inhibit the same. Which done, there was no doubt then, but all the tribes with one voice would abrogate and abolish that law. Thus twenty year after the enacting thereof, it was repealed and annulled. The law Oppia repealed.

M. Porcius Cato after the abrogation of the law Oppia, presently departed with a fleet of five and twenty Gallies, whereof five were set out by Allies, and arrived in the Port of Luna, to which place he commanded his forces to assemble: and after by vertue of an edict sent out along the Sea coast, he had gathered together vessels of all sorts as he loosed from Luna: and proclaimed that they should all follow after him to the Port of Pyrenum, from whence he purposed to set forth against the enemy, with an Armado of many sail, and well appointed. Who having passed beyond the mountains of Liguria and the gulf of Gaul, arrived and met all together, at the day and place appointed. From thence they came against Rhoda, where they expelled the Spanish garrison that held the fortrels. From Rhoda with a good gale of wind, they sailed to Emporia. Where, all the whole army, excepting the mariners, were set a land. At the same time Emporia were two Towns, separate one from the other by a wall. The one of them was inhabited by Greeks, who came from Phocaea; from whence the Massilians also are descended: the other was possessed by Spaniards. But the Greek Town lieth out into the Sea, so as the whole compass of the wall is not half a mile about: but the Spanish Town seated farther into the Land, and divided from the Sea, is defended with a wall three miles in circuit. A third sort of Roman inhabitants were joynd unto them by Cesar the Emperor of famous memory, after he had vanquished Pompey's children. And at this day, they are confused and mingled one with another, and become one entire body, by reason that first the Spaniards, and afterward the Greeks, were made free denizens of the City of Rome. A man might well marvel, seeing how open they lie of the one side to the main Sea, how exposed they are on the other side to the danger of the Spaniards, a Nation so fierce and warlike, what thing it was that guarded and protected them? Discipline it was, and good government, and nothing else, which maintained and preserved them in that weakenes of theirs: discipline I say, which is ever best intertaind of them, who live in fear of the mightier that are round about them. One quarter of the wall looking to the fields, is passing strong and exceeding well fortified, having but one gate in all that side: which ordinarily is alwayes warded by one of the Magistrates. In the night, one third part usually of the citizens kept watch upon the walls. And this watch they maintained not for custome and fashion, nor by vertue of any law: but they performed it with as great care, yea, and went the round and saw to the sentinels with as much diligence, as if the enemies were hard at gates. A Spaniard came not within the City: neither went they forth themselves, unless it were upon just occasion. But on the Sea side the issue was open for any man at his pleasure. By that gate which turneth toward the Spanish Town they never used to go forth but in great number, even a third part welneer of the Townsmen; and those who the night before had watched upon the walls. And this cause induced them to go abroad, for that the Spaniards being no men at Sea, gladly would traffick and trade with them: willingly buying of them their strange merchandise from forein parts brought in by ships: and venting unto them again their Land commodities and fruits arising of the main. The desire of this mutual commerce and necessary intercourse was the cause, that the Spanish Town was open to the Greeks. And in greater safety and security they were also, by reason that they were shadowed under the wing of the Roman amity, which they intertaind with as great loyalty as the Massilians, although they were nothing so mighty and puissant. And even at this time they received the Consul and his army with great courtesie and liberality: Cato sojourned there some few dayes, while he was advertised by his spies where his enemies abode, and what their forces were: and because he would not be idle while he stayed there, he bestowed all that time in training and exercising his soldiers. It hapned to be that season of the year, when the Spaniards had their corn within their granges ready for the thrashing floor, whereupon he forbade the cornpurveiors to provide grain, and sent them home to Rome. War, saith he, shall feed and maintain it self. Being departed from Emporia, he wasted and burnt the territory of the enemies, forced them to run away in every place where he came, and put them in exceeding fright. At the same time, as M. Helvius departed out of the farther Province of Spain with 6000 garrison soldiers delivered unto him by the Pretory, he was encountered by a great army of the Celti-

Celtiberians, before the Town Illiturgum. Valerius wiseth, that they were 20000 strong: that 12000 of them were slain, the Town Illiturgum won again, and all above 14 years of age sent to the sword. From thence Helvius marched to the camp of Cato: and because the country was clear from enemies, he sent back the garrison into the nether Spain, and took his journey to Rome, where he entered the City Ovunt in petty triumph, for the happy success achieved in his affairs. He brought into the treasury, of silver in bullion or Ingots, 14732 pound weight: of silver coin 17023 bigate peeces: and of Oscane silver 120338 pound weight. The cause why the Senat denied him full triumph, was this, for that he warred under the conduct and name of another, and not in his own province. But it was two years before he returned, by reason that the year between he was layed there, lying sick of a long and grievous disease, and put over his government to Q. Minutius his successor. Whereupon Helvius likewise entered the City of Rome in that manner of triumph, two months only before his successor Q. Minutius triumphed. He likewise brought into the Chamber of the City 34800 pound weight of silver in mass: of bigats in coin 78000: of Oscane silver 278000 pound.

All this while the Consul lay encamped in Spain not far from Emporia. Thither repaired unto him from Bilfages a Prince of the Ilergets, three Embassadors, whereof his son was one: complaining that their forts were assailed by force of arms, and they had no other hope to make resistance, unless they might have a guard of Roman souldiers to defend them, 5000 say they will be sufficient: for never would the enemies abide by it if such a power came against them. The Consul answered them and said, that he had a feeling and compassion of the peril or fear (whether it was) wherein they stood: howbeit, he was not at that time furnished with such forces, that he might safely spare so many out of his main army, thereby to dismember the same and to impair his strength, considering a mighty host of his enemies was not far off, with whom he looked every day, and he knew not how soon, to joyn battail in open field with banner displayed. The Embassadors hearing this, fell down prostrate at the Consuls feet, and shed tears, humbly beseeching him not to forsake them in this piteous plight. "For whither (say they) shall we go, if we be repulsed from the Romans? No allies we have besides, nor other hope in all the world. This danger we might have avoided well enough, if we would have been false and disloyal: if we would have banded and rebelled with other Spaniards: but no menaces, no terrors presented unto us, could drive us to renounce our fealty, hoping alwayes that we should have help and succour enough from the Romans: but now if no help, if no relief come from thence: if we be denied at the Consuls hand; heaven and earth we call to witnes, that we must be forced, full against our wills and upon mere necessity, to revolt from the Romans, for fear we drink of the same cup that the Saguntins have done afore us: and chosse we will to die with the rest of the Spaniards for company, rather than perish alone by ourselves. So for that day they were dismissed without other answer. But all the night following, the Consul was much distracted in mind, and careful in both respects. Unwilling he was to cast off his allies and see them destitute: and as unwilling again to break his army: considering that in so doing, he might either delay the opportunity of giving battail, or endanger himself in the very instant of conflict. But at length he resolved in no wise to diminish his own forces: doubting lest in the mean while he should receive some dishonor at the enemies hand. As for his associates, he thought it best to intertain them with good hopes, for want of better helps: considering that oftentimes and especially in war, outward semblances and vain shews, are held and taken for truth and substance, and serve the turn well enough: and when a man is thoroughly perswaded that he hath aid and succour, the very trust and confidence thereof hath ministered heart to give the venture of some exploit and preserved him as well as the thing itself. The next morrow he delivered this answer unto the Embassadors, That albeit he feared to abate his own strength, in serving other mens turn with any part of his forces, yet he had at this present more regard of their occasions and dangerous estate than of his own. Whereupon he gave commandment, that a third part of all his bands and companies should have warning to bake and dresse viands with all speed, for to bestow and lay in the ships: and straightly he charged, that they should be rigged and ready appointed against the third day: and willed withal, two of the Embassadors to report so much to Bilfages and the Ilergets. As for the young Prince his son, he detained still with him, used him graciously, and bestowed favours and rich gifts upon him bounteously. The Embassadors took not their leave nor departed, before they saw the souldiers embarked: and thus by making relation hereof, as a thing assured and past all peradventure, they filled the heads not of their own friends only; but also of the enemies, with the bruit of Roman aids coming neer at hand. The Consul now, when he had set this countenance of the matter, and made sufficient semblance to serve his purpose, gave order that the souldiers should be disbarked again & set a land: and himself seeing now that the time of the year approached commodious for action and execution of martial affairs, dislodged and removed his standing winter camp within a mile of Emporia. From whence (as any occasions and opportunities were presented) he led forth his souldiers a foraging and plundering into the enemies land, sometime one way and sometime another, leaving alwayes a competent guard to defend the camp. Ordinarily their manner was to steal out by night, to the intent, that both they might go on still farther from their leaguer, & also surprise the enemies at unawares and unprovided: by which means not only his new & raw souldiers were exercised, but also many of his enemies were caught up and came short home: whereupon they durst no more peep out of their forts & holds of defence. Now after he had made sufficient

A proof of the hearts as well of his own men as of his enemies; he commanded all the Marshals, Colonels, Horsemen, and Centurions, to assemble before him: and unto them he made this speech.

The Oration
of Cato to his Captains and gallants.

"The time (quoth he) is now come, that you so often have wished for: in which you may shew
"at full your verue and valour. Your service hitherto hath been more like the manner of for"ragers than warriors: but now shall ye come to a main battail, and as enemies, fight hand to "hand with professed enemies. From henceforth you may if you will, not wait their fields only "and spoil their territory, but ransack the pillage of rich and wealthy cities. Our fathers before "us and ancetours in times past, when as in Spain there were both Generals and armies of Car"thaginians, having themselves no leaders and commanders, no souldiers and tores there, yet
"would they needs have this article among others capitulated in the accord and composition B "with the Spaniards, That the River of Iberus should limit their Seignory and dominion. Now "at this day, when two Pretors and a Consul, when three entire Roman armies have the go"vernment and charge of Spain: now, I say, after ten years space almost, wherein no Carthagi"nians have set foot and been seen in all these quarters of both provinces, we have lost our seig-"nory on this side Iberus. This must ye recover and win again by force of arms, by manhood and "valour: yemust I say, compel this nation, more rash and inconsiderate in rebelling, than con"stant and resolute in maintaining war, for to receive once more the yoke or subjection, which "they have shaken from off their necks. Having exhorted and encouraged them in this manner, he gave them to understand, that he would set forward in the night and lead against the enemies camp. And so he let them depart to refresh their bodies. At midnight, after he had devoutly C taken with him the signs and approbations of the birds for his better speed, he put himself in his journey: and because he might be seized of some place to his liking before the enemies should descrie him, he set a compass in his march, and led his souldiers clean beyond their camp. And having by day light set his companies in battel array, he sent out three cohorts, even cloie to the rampier and trench of the enemy. The barbarous people wondering to see the Romans shew themselves behind at their back, ran to and fro to take arms. Mean while, the Consul held his men with these and such like speeches: "My souldiers (quoth he) there is no other hope now "left, but in mere strength and valour, and I of very purpose have wrought it so. Between us "and our camp the enemies are encamped all: behind at our back we have our enemies Land.
"The bravest courses are ever safest, namely, to build and ground our hope surely upon vertue.
D And herewithal he gave order, that the cohorts aforesaid should retire of purpose to train forth the barbarous people, by making semblance of retreat and flight. And so fell it out in very deed as he thought and supposed: for they imagining that the Romans for very fear were retired, issued forth by heaps out of the gate, and bespred with armed men all the ground, that lay between their own camp and the enemies battel. And whiles they made great hast to embattel themselves, the Consul who was already arranged in battel array, and in all respects well appointed, charged upon them before they were marshalled and set in order. First he put forth the corners and wings of horsemen from both points and flanks of the battail: but they of the right side were straightwayes repulged, and by their hasty and fearful retreating, caused the footmen also to be mightily affraid. Which the Consul perceiving, he commanded two elect cohorts of footmen to wheel E about the right flank of the enemies, and to shew themselves at their backs before the other companies of foot encountred and charged one another. This suddain terror affrighted the enemies, but set all upright again and recovered the battail of the Romans, which through the fear of the Cavalry began to shrink and go down. Howbeit the horsemen and footmen both of the right point, were so troubled and so far out of order, that the Consul was forced to pluck some of them back with his own hand, and turn them with their faces affront the enemy. Thus all the while that the shot lasted, the skirmish was doubtful: so as now the Romans in the skirmish, had much ado to make head and stand to it in the right side, whereas the fright and flight first began.
But on the left and all affront, the barbarous had the worst, and with great horror they looked behind and saw their enemies how they played upon their backs and relied not. After they had F done with flinging their iron darts and lancing their fiery javelins, they drew their swords; and herewith began the conflict afresh. They were not wounded now from a far off by blind chance and hap-hazard, they knew not from whence; but foot to foot they stood, and hand to hand they coped and let drive one at another: no hope at all was now but to trust in pure strength and main force. The Consul seeing his men wearied, encouraged and refreshed them by sending for to relieve and maintain the fight, certain cohorts out of the rereward. This new battailon well in heart, and with fresh weapons, charged the enemies toiled and tired: and being ranged in pointed wise like a quoin or wedge, at the first hot onset brake their arraies: and being once dis-ordered, they put them to flight, and in scattering wise they ran as fast as their legs would carry them, to their camp. Cato seeing them flie on all hands, mounted on horseback and rode him-G self to the second legion which was in the rereward for supply, and commanded to advance the standards and ensigns before him, to march apace, and to approach the camp of the enemies for to give an assault. If he espied any one to step out of his rank, he would ride before and rap him with his light javelin that he had in his hand; commanding the Marshals and Captains to chastise him for it. Now was the enemies camp at the point to be assaulted, and the Romans were with stones, pikes, perches, and all kind of weapons set back and driven from the trench. But when this fresh legion approached neer, then both the assailants were more encouraged, and also

the enemies fought more lustily in defence of their rampier. The Consul cast his eye all about him, to see how to break in at some place or other where least resistance might be made: and seeing the guard thin about the left gate, thither he conducted the Principals and the Hastati of the second legion: but the corps de guard which warded that gate, was not able to endure their violent charge. The rest on the other side, seeing the enemies within the rampier, abandoned the camp, and flung away their ensigns and weapons. The souldiers of the second legion followed the chase and killed them as they ran away, while the other ransacked and rifled their tents. Valerius Antias writeth, that there were 60000 fell that day upon the edge of the sword. Cato himself (that never loved to make the least of his own praise-worthy acts) saith, there were many slain; but setteth not down what number. He is thought to have performed that day three peeces of service worthy of great praise and commendation: first, in that he set a compass with his army far from his ships, far from his camp, and gave battail in the midst of the enemies, where his men could repose no hope at all but in their own vertue and valour: secondly, for sending those cohorts behind the enemies to charge upon their backs: and thirdly, for that he caused the second legion to march a great pace under their colours displaid, ranged as they were and ordered in battail array, for to approach and assail the gates of the enemies camp, while all the rest were disbanded and spread all abroad to pursue the enemy in chase.

After this victory atchieved, he sat not still in rest and repose, but having founded the retreat and brought his own souldiers laden with pillage into the camp, he allowed them some few hours for their night sleep, and led them forth into the territory of the enemy to forrage and spoil: which was as effectual to enforce the Spanish Emperitans, and all their neighbour borders to yeeld subjection, as the unhappy battel fought the day before. Many also of other Cities, which were retired to Emporia for refuge, rendered themselves to his devotion: whom he entertained all with gracious words, and when he had made them good cheer, bestowing wine and cates plentifully upon them, he sent them home to their own houses. Then immediately he dislodged and removed his camp. And all the way as he marched with his army there resorted Embassadors from divers States that yeilded themselves unto him. By that time that he was come as far as Taracón, all Spain on this side Iberus, was wholly subdued: and the barbarous people brought in as presents unto the Consul, all the captives and prisoners, as well Romans as Allies, and namely, Latins, who by many and sundry chances had been taken in Spain. The bruit went commonly abroad, that the Consul would lead his power into Turdania. There was a false alarm likewise given, and spoken it was, That he would visit the mountaineers that lay out of the way. Upon this vain and headless rumour, there were seven forts belonging to the State of the Bergistans that revolted from him: but the Consul led his army against them, and without any memorable battel reduced them under obedience. And the Consul his back was no sooner turned, and he gone to Taracón, but they rebelled again, even before he was departed from thence in any other expedition. Subdued they were the second time, but they found not the like favour as before, to have pardon: for they were all sold like slaves in open market, under the garland, because they should not thus every while trouble the peace.

In this meantime P. Manlius the Pretor, after he had received the old army at the hands of Q. Mutius whom he succeeded, and joined thereto the other army of old souldiers belonging to Appius Claudius, and which were come out of the farther Spain, he made an expedition into Turdania. Now these Turdetans of all other Spaniards are counted to be the worst souldiers, howbeit, in confidence of their great numbers and multitudes they came forward and encountered the Roman forces. But the men of arms had no sooner charged them, but presently, they were disarraied. As for the footmen, they fought in manner not at all. The old approved souldiers, who knew the enemies very well, and were experienced in feats of arms, made a quick dispatch of this skirmish, and soon put all past peradventure. Howbeit, the war was not so ended, nor determined in one battel. The Turdetans levied and waged 1000 Celtiberians, and so maintained war afresh with forrain mercenary forces.

The Consul being stung already with the Rebellion of the Turdetans, and supposing that other Cities would do the like, upon any good occasion and opportunity, disurnished all the Spaniards on this side Iberus of their armor and munition. Which they took for such an indignity, that many of them for very melancholly killed themselves: a martial and warlike nation, that thought they were as good be out of the world, as turned out of their arms; and reckoned no life, without their weapons. The Consul having intelligence hereof, commanded the Senators of all those Cities to repair unto him: and when they were assembled together, he used this speech unto them. "It concerneth you (qd. he) no less than us, to give over this rebelling and warring. For never yet to this day have ye entered into the action, but with more loss and damage of Spaniards, than toil and travel of the Roman army. To prevent this mischief that it should not happen, I suppose one good way it is, to contrive and work so, that ye might not possibly be able to rebel. Effect this I would fain, by the easiest mean and course of all other. Assist me I pray you herein with your good counsel: I assure you I will not be directed by any advise more willingly, than by that which you yourselves shall give me. When they held their tongues, and would not speak a word, he said unto them again, that he was content they should pause upon the matter, and consult thereof a few daies. When they were called again, & kept silence in this second meeting and conference as well as in the former, he made no more ado, but in one day rased the wals of all their Cities: which

A which done, he went forward against those that hitherto were not come in, not yielded obedience: and into what quarters soever he came, he received all the States one after another, there bordering and adjoining, into his protection: save only Segisica, a wealthy City and of importance, the which he forced with mantelets and rolling pavories, and such like fabricks. More difficulty in subduing these enemies he found, than others afore him who first came into Spain; in this regard, for that in times past the Spaniards at the beginning revolted unto them, as being weary of the tedious yoke of subjection under the lordly government and tyranny of the Carthaginians. But Cato had more ado with them now, in that out of liberty and freedom, which they had usurped and been used to, he was to ingage them (as it were) bond, and to bring them again to servitude. Besides, he found all out of frame and order, while some of them were up in arms, others B were forced by siege to revolt, as not able to have held out long, unless they had been rescued and succoured in time. But of this nature and courageous mind was the Consul, that he would himself in person be present and manage all affairs, as well those of smallest moment, as also those of greatest weight and consequence: and not only devise and give direction what was best to be done, but would himself set to his hand, and execute most of the exploits and effect them fully. There was not one amongst them all, that he commanded with more severity and rigour, than his own self. In living nearly in spare feeding, in much watching, in painful travel he strived to surpass and outgo the meanest common soldiers. And no privilege challenged he, no advantage sought he to himself in his whole army above others, but only honour and sovereign command.

The Pretor P. Manlius had the more trouble in his war-service, by reason of the Celtiberians, C whom (as it hath been said before) the enemies had levied and hired with their money. And therefore the Consul being sent unto by the Pretor his letters, led his legions also thither. Being there arrived, (now the Celtiberians and Turdians were severally encamped apart one from the other) the Romans fell presently to maintain light skirmishes with the Turdians, and ever and anon charged their corps de guards: and how rashly and inconsiderately soever they began the game, yet they ever went away winners. As for the Celtiberians, the Consul sent certain Tribuns or Knight Marshalls unto them to compare, giving them in charge to make them an offer and tender unto them the choice of three conditions. First, if they could be content to arrange themselves to serve under the Romans, and to receive at their hands double wages to that they bargained for with the Turdians. Secondly, whether they would be willing to go their waies home under safe conduct and publick security, besides that their siding with the Roman enemies should not be laid to their charge, nor bring them within the compass of any danger. Thirdly, if they had more mind to war, than, that they should set down some time and place, when and where they might come to an issue, and trie it out in a set battail. The Celtiberians required to take a day for to consider better upon these points. So they assembled together in council, with great trouble and confusion, by reason that some Turdians were thrust in amongst them; upon which occasion, they might worse grow to any conclusion. Now albeit uncertain it was, whether there would be any war or peace with the Celtiberians, yet the Romans gathered their provision out of the territory and boroughs of their enemies, like as in time of peace: yea, and more than that, they entered oftentimes within their fortifications and defences, as if there had been some common traffick E and commerce agreed between them, by way of private truce. The Consul seeing he could not draw the enemy to a battail, first led certain companies lightly appointed with banners displayed, to raze booties in one quarter of the country, which as yet was free, and not tasted of the wars: but afterwards hearing that all the bag and baggage and other cariage of the Celtiberians was left at  Saguntia*, he set forward thither to give an assault to the Town. But seeing that nothing would move and stir them, he paid not only his own soldiers their wages, but also the Pretors Army their due, and leaving the main host in the Pretor his camp, himself returned to the River Ebro, accompanied only with seven cohorts. With these forces, as small as they were, he won certain Towns, and there revolted unto him the Sederans, Ansetans, and Suessetans. The Lacetans (a Nation living out of the way after a savage manner within the wilds and woods) kept F still in arms, not only upon a natural and inbred wildness, but also upon a guilty conscience, in that whiles the Consul and his army was employed in the Turdulois war, they had made suddain rodes and incursions into the Lands of their Allies, and pitifully wasted the same. And therefore the Consul advanced forward to assault their Town, and led against it not only his own cohorts and bands, but also the youth of his Allies, who had good cause to be angry, and to oppose themselves unto them. The Town which they inhabited, lay out in length, but was nothing so wide and large in breadth: and within one half mile or less, he pitched down his ensigns, and planted himself. There he left behind a guard of choise companies, and straightly charged them not to stir out of that place, before he came unto them himself. The rest of his forces he led about unto the farther side beyond the Town. Of all the aid-soldiers that he had about him, the greatest number were the youth of the Suessetans, and those he commanded to approach the wall for to give assault. The Lacetans, when they took knowledge of their armor and colours calling to mind how often they had overrun them at their pleasure, and wasted their lands without the least emperehment, how many and sundry times they had in ranged battel discomfited and put them to flight, all at once set open the gate, and sallied out upon them. The Suessetans were so little able to sustain the forcible charge of their onset, that they hardly could abide the first cry. The Consul seeing now, that come to pass indeed which he suspected would be he so, rode a gallop upon the spur to those said cohorts of his own that were left on the other side under the Town, and taking them with him in great haste, whilst all the Townsmen were spread abroad in following the chase after the Suesetans, he led them into the Town at a place where there was no noise, no stirring, and not a man to be seen; and made himself master of all, before the Lacetans were returned back: but within a while he received them to mercy upon their submission: who, poor men, had nothing to yeeld and lole but their bare armor and weapons. Immediately he followed the train of this victory, and led his forces against the hold or strong Town of Vergium. This was a receptacle and place of sure receipt for certain Rovers and Theeves, who from thence used to make many rodes into the peaceable parts of that Province. The principal and chief person of Vergium quit the place, and betook himself unto the Consul, and began to excuse as well himself as the Townsmen; saying, that the government of the Town and the state thereof lay not in their hands. For why? these robbers after they were once received in among them, seized themselves wholly of that strength, and had all at their command. The Consul willed him to go home again, and to devise and forge some likely and probable cause why he had been absent and out of the way; with this charge and direction, that, when he saw him approach under the walls, and the robbers aforesaid wholly amused and occupied in defence thereof, then he should remember to join with the rest of his part and faction, and be possessed of the fortresse and hold of the Town. This put he in practise and execution accordingly. So whilst the Romans of one side scaled the walls, and they on the other side had taken the fortresse, these barbarians were suddenly at once surpris'd with a two-fold fear before and behind. The Consul when he had gotten the place into his own hands, gave order, that all those who were gotten into the Castle and held it, should remain free, themselves and all their kindred, and likewise enjoy their goods. The rest of the Vergetans he commanded the Treasurer to sell and make money of them. As for the Rovers, they suffred according to their deserts. After he had set the Province in quiet, he laid great tributes and imposts upon the mines of iron and silver: which being once ordained and established, the whole province grew in wealth and riches, every day more than other. For these his exploits achieved in Spain, the LL. of the Senat decreed, that there should be a solemn procession at Rome, to endure for three dayes.

The same winter, L. Valerius Flaccus the other Consul, fought in France a set field with the power of the Boians, neer the forest of Lutania, and wan the victory. And by report, there were eight thousand Gauls there slain: the rest abandoned the war, and slip't every one into their own Hamlets and Villages. The rest of the winter the Cos. kept his army at Placentia and Cremona about the Po, and repaired in these Cities whatsoever had been decayed and demolished during the wars.

The affairs in Italy and Spain standing in these terms: when T. Quintius had so passed the winter in Greece, the setting aside the Aetolians (who neither had been recompenced according to the hope that they conceived of the victory, nor yet could long time like of repose) all Greece throughout in general enjoying the blessing of peace and liberty, flourished and maintained their state exceeding well, admiring no less the temperance, justice, and moderation of the Roman General after victory, than his valour and prowess in war: there was an Act of the Senat of Rome brought and presented unto him, importing thus much, That war was determined against Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. Which when Quintius had read, he published and proclaimed a general Diet or Council at Corinth against a certain day, when and where all the States associates should assemble by their delegats and Embassadors. Now when there was met together from all parts a frequent number of Princes and great personages, in such sort, that the very Aetolians also were not absent, Quintius used unto them this or the like speech. "The Romans & Greeks have warred against King Philip as ye well know; and as with one mind and common counsel they have so done, so either of them had several quarrels unto him, and privar causes and occasions by themselves to take arms. For Philip had broken the league and amity with us Romans, one while by sending aid and maintenance to the Carthaginians our enemies: otherwhiles by assailing our allies in these parts: and to you wards he hath so demeaned himself, that albeit we could not forget and put up all the wrongs that he hath done unto us, the very injuries that ye have received at his hands, minister sufficient cause unto us to war against him for your sake. As for this dayes consultation, it resteth wholly in your selves. For, this I propound unto you, Whether your will is to suffer Argos (which as ye know your selves Nabis the tyrant holdeth) to remain still under him in obedience: or whether you think it meet and reason, that a most noble and ancient City as it is, seated in the very heart of Greece, should be reduced unto liberty, to enjoy the same condition and state wherein other Cities of Peloponnesus and Greece do stand. This consultation I say, as you well see, entirely toucheth you and your good, and concerneth us Romans no farther than thus, that by the servitude of that one only City, we can not have the full and entire glory of setting Greece wholly in liberty. But if you regard not the state of that City, and are not moved with the example thereof and the danger, for fear the contagion of this mischief spread farther: we for our parts are content, and take all in good worth, and will not set you down and teach you what to do. Only I require your advice in this point, minding to resolve upon that, which the Major part of you shall carry by voices. After the Roman General had ended his speech, all the rest began to deliver their opinions. And when the deputed delegate or agent for the Athenians had magnified and extolled as highly as possibly he could, the good

A good demerits of the Romans towards Greece, yielding them great thanks, that upon their request they had granted them aid against Philip, and without any petition at all, offered their help and succour against Nabis the tyrant; and seemed therewith to be offended and displeased at some, who nevertheless in their talk and speeches found fault and carped at these so great favours and deserts; yea, and spake badly of future events, whereas it behoved them rather to acknowledge and confess how much they were bound and beholden already to the Romans for good turns past: it well appeared that he pointed out directly the Ætolians, and girded at them, "Whereupon Alexander, a principall and chief man of their nation, inveighed first against the Athenians, who having been in times past the head Captains and maintainers of freedom, betrayed now the common cause, for love of their own privat flatteries. Moreover, he complained that the Acheans, who first served Philip in his wars, and at the last (when they saw him down the wind and fortune to frown upon him) fell away like disloyal traitors & possessed themselves of Corinth to their own behoof, praesiding also to compass and gain unto them the City of Argos. As for the Ætolians, the first and principall enemies of Philip, and alwaies allies and friends to the Romans, howsoever they had expressly and precisely covenanted in the league, to enjoy their towns and territories, after Philip was vanquished, were notwithstanding put besides Echinum and Pharsalus. He charged the Romans with fraud and deceit, who pretending an outward shew, a vain title and colour of liberty, held the Cities of Chalcis and Demetrias with strong garrisons: and yet when Philip made some stay and halting to withdraw and void from thence his armed guards, they were ever wont to object and say, that Greece would never be in freedom, so long as Chalcis, Demetrias and Corinth were in his hand: and finally he alledged against them, that under pretence of Argos and Nabis, they sought occasion to remain still in Greece and keep their armies there. Let them (quoth he) transport their legions once into Italy, the Ætolians would then undertake and promise, that Nabis should remove his garrison out of Argos, upon composition and with good will, or else they would compell him by force and arms, to be over-ruled by the puissance of all Greece united together in one generall consent. By this vain babble of his, he roused Aristennus first, the Prator of the Achaens, who spake in this wise. Never will Jupiter Opt. Max. quoth he, and Queen Juno the Patroness of Argos, suffer that City to be the recompence or prize between the Lacedæmonian Tyrant, and these pilling and thieving Ætolians: to be brought to this hard point and these terms of extremity, as to sustain more misery and calamity when it is recovered by us, than when it was won and taken by him. O Quintius, it is not the sea lying between us and them that can defend us from these robbers. What will then become of us, in case they should make themselves a fort and Castle of strength in the midst of Peloponnesus? Nought have they of the Greeks but their language, like as they carry nothing of men but their shape and visage. For look into their manners, their fashions and behaviour, they are more rude and cruell than any barbarians, nay, they are more savage than the most wild and ravenous beasts that be. We beseech you therefore O Romans, both to recover Argos out of the hands of Nabis, and also to establish the State of Greece in such sort, that ye leave these parts also safe and secure enough from the robberies and theiving hostility of these Ætolians. The Roman Generall Quintius, seeing them of all sides to blame and rebuke the Ætolians, said, that he would have answered them himself, but that he perceived them all so hatefully bent against them, that more needfull it was that they were to be appeased, than farther provoked. And therefore holding himself satisfied and contented with that opinion which was conceived of the Romans and Ætolians, he said, that he would demand what their pleasure was to advise, concerning the war against Nabis, unless he rendered Argos to the Achaens? And when they all were of one mind to make war, he exhorted them to send aids proportionably to the power and strength of each State and City. To the Ætolians he sent an Ambassador, more to discover and lay open their intention (as it fell out accordingly) than upon any hope he had to obtain ought at their hands. Unto the Provost Marshals of the camp, he gave commandment to send for the army from Elatia.

About this time, when the Ambassadors of King Antiochus came unto him to treat about alliance and a league, he answered, That he could say nothing to them nor determine of that point in the absence of those Delegates above said; and therefore they were to repair unto the Senat of Rome. Then, himself in person prepared to make an expedition and voyage against Argos, with those forces which were brought from Elatia. And when he was about Cleona, Aristennus the Prator, with 10000 foot of Achaens, and 1000 horse met him in the way: and not far from thence they joyned both their forces and encamped together. The next day after they came down into the Plain of Argos, and chose a place to fortifie and lye in leaguer about four miles from Argos. Now was Pythagoras the Captain of the Lacedæmonian garrison, who had both married the tyrant his daughter, and was his wives brother besides. This Pythagoras against the coming of the Romans, had fortified with strong guards both the Castles (for two there are within Argos) and other places, which either had easie access, or were suspected, but as he was employed in these provisions and preparations, he could not dissemble and hide the fear which this arrivall and approach of the Romans strake into him: and beside this forrainterrour from without, there happened also an intestine murther within. There was one Damocles an Argive, (a young Gentleman of more spirit and courage than wisdom and discretion) who at the first by interposing a mutuall and reciprocal oath, had conspired with certain persons of good sufficiency, about expelling the garrison; but, while he studied to strengthen the conspiracy and his own side, he was not well assured of their fidelity, and could not judge which of them were true and which not. At he raised upon a time with his complices, the Captain of the garrison sent for him by one of his guards: whereupon he perceived that his complot was revealed: he exhorted therefore the conspirators that were in the way to take arms with him, rather than to die by torture upon the rack: and so with some few about him he marched forward into the market-place, crying often aloud, That as many as loved the safety of the Common-weal should follow him as their head and maintainer of their liberty: but no man moved he with his speech to go after him and take his part: for no hope saw they of any succour at all near at hand: so far off were they from making good account of a sure guard of defence. And as he spake those words, the Lacedæmonians were come round about him, and killed both him and his fellows. After this were others also apprehended: the most part of them were slain, and some few cast into prison. A great number the night following slid down the wall by ropes, and fled to the Romans. These assured the Romans, that if their army had been near the gates, the commotion and conspiracy aforesaid would have taken effect: and in case their camp approached nearer, the Argives would not be in quiet, but make some insurrection: whereupon Quintius sent out the footmen lightly appointed, together with the horsemen; who skirmished with the Lacedæmonians about Cylarabis (a publike school and place of exercise about a quarter of a mile out of the City) who were sallied out at the gate, and without any great difficulty chaled them within the town: and in that very place where the conflict was, the Roman Generall encamped. One day he spent in escouting an espial, whether any new trouble and uproars arose among them within the City. But when he perceived once that they were all amored for fear, he assembled a Councill to take advice, Whether he were best to give the assault upon Argos, or no? All the heads of Greece, (except Aristonius) agreed with one accord, that since there was no other cause of war elsewhere, it should begin there especially. Quintius in no case would like of that course, but willingly he gave ear with evident approbation unto Aristonius, as he discoursed and reasoned against the generall opinion and consent of them all: and over and besides added this of himself, That considering the war was enterprised and taken in hand in the behalf of the Argives against the tyrant, there was nothing less befitting and more without sense, than to leave the enemy himself, and to assail and batter the poor City of Argos. For his part he would fight at the head, even against the Lacedæmonians and their tyrant, the principall cause of this war. Then having dissolved the Councill, he sent certain cohorts lightly appointed to purvey store of grain. As much as could be found ripe in those parts was cut, mowed, and reaped down immediately and laid up: all that was green they trampled under foot and spoiled, that the enemies soon after might have no good thereof. So he dislodged and removed from thence, and having passed over the mountain Parthenius, at three daies end he encamped in the territory of Carya near to Tegen. In which place he expected the aids of his allies before he would invade the territory of the enemies. From Philip there came a thousand and five hundred Macedonians, and of Thessalians forty horse. The Roman Generall staid not now for succours of men (whereof he had sufficient and plenty) but for his provision of victuals, which he had commanded the towns bordering near hand to furnish him withall. Besides there came great forces by sea, and met him there: for by this time was Lucius Quintius arrived with forty sail from Leucas: also eighteen covered ships of Rhodes. And now also was Euменes the King, about the Islands Cyclades, with ten close hatched and decked ships, thirty gallions, with other smaller vessels among of sundry sorts. Likewise of Lacedæmonians that were exiled and banished persons, there were very many: who, chased and driven out by the oppression and wrongfull dealing of their tyrants, repaired now into the Roman Camp, in hope to recover their native country again. Now a great many had been expelled in divers and sundry ages, since time that the tyrant first usurped rule, and were possessed of Lacedæmon. The chief of these exiled persons was one Agepsolis, a man to whom by right of descent and lineage the inheritance of the kingdom of Lacedæmon appertained. He whiles he was but an Infant hapned to be expelled by Lycurgus after the death of Cleomenes, who was the first tyrant at Lacedæmon.

The tyrant beset thus round about with wars threatening both from sea and land, and destitute in manner of all hope, (considering the proportion of his forces to the power of his enemies:) yet nevertheless neglected not to wage war, but levied out of Greece one thousand more (even the chosen flower of all their youth) to the other thousand that he had from thence already. He had besides of mercenary souldiers three thousand in arms: also ten thousand of his own subjects and Citizens of Lacedæmon, together with those that he had taken out of the burroughs and villages in the country. Moreover, he fortified the City with trench and mure. And that there might arise no trouble and stir within the town, he held the spirits of men in awe with fear of sharp and rigorous punishments. And forasmuch as he could not hope nor imagine that they desired and wished his good and safety, for that he held some Citizens in suspicion and jealousy: after he had brought forth all his forces into the plain, which they call Dremos, he commanded the Lacedæmonians to assemble together without any armour and weapons to an audience: and when they were assembled he environed them with his armed guard. And after some few remonstrances by way of a short preamble, Why they ought to hold him excused at such a time, if he feared every thing, and made all sure as well as he could: considering withall, it was expedient even for them also (as many as the present state of the world might bring in suspicion) to be kept short for being able to execute any attempt, rather than be surprized in the midst of their practices and complots, and

A and so be punished accordingly: even for this cause (saith he) I will have certain persons in safe custody andurance, until such time as the worst of the rebellion which now it is, be ended: And when the rebels be once vanquished, from whom it is thought there will be in case of domesticall rebellions may be prevented: then incontinently will I enlarge them, and for them at liberty. This said, he commanded the names to be called of such persons as themselves of the principall of the youths and as every one of them answered to his name, he clopeth him up fast in prisons: and thence night following, was deved then every one. After this, certain illes (these were they who ever of old time were the Burghers and Villagers, a kind of soldiers and country herds) were accused so have intended to lie unto the enemy and to band with him, who likewise were whipped & sent forth throughout all the isles, and then put to death. By the second example of this cruelty, the rage of the commoners were well cooled and abated, & repaid so thoroughly, that they durst not once quench nor give attempt of any new designes tending to change and alteration. His forces he kept within his strength and places of defence, for neither thought he himselfe strong enough to enter the field and fight a set battell, nor durst abandon the City, seeing the minds of men so wavering, and their affections so unconstant.

Quintus having made his provision and set all things in good order, departed from his standing camp, and the second day came to Salaria upon the river Quana: in which very place Antigonus sometime King of the Macedonians struck a battell (men say) with Glorius the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. And there, having intelligence, that from thence he was to mount up in hard ascent and narrow passage, he set a short compass through the mountains, having sent before certain men to level the ground and make the way even, and so got into a large and broad portage, until he came to the river Eurasus, which runneth in manner hard under the walls of the City of Sparta: where, as the Romans were pitching their tents, even as Quintus himselfe with the horsemen and light van-couriers gone before, the Auxiliaries of the tyrant charged upon them who looking for nothing less, because no man had encountered them all the way as they marched, but passed on in their journey as in a peaceable country, were much troubled and affrighted herewith. This fear of theirs continued a good time, while the horsemen called upon the footmen, and they again unto the horsemen; and both the one sort and the other trusted in themselves but little or nothing at all. At length the standards of the legions with their ensignes came forward: and were within sight, and so soon as the companies of the vanguard advanced forth to fight, D they who erewhile terrified others, were driven in fearful haste themselves into the City. The Romans being retired so far from the wall, as that they were without dart-shot, stood a while ranged in battell array. But after that they saw none of the enemies come abroad against them, returned to their leaguer. The next day after Quintus took his way and marched with his army in order of battell along the town side, near unto the river hard at the foot of the hill Maurus. The companies of the legionary footmen led the march in the vanguard, the light footmen and the horsemen followed in the rearward, and flanked the rest. Nabis kept within the walls his mercenary soldiers (in whom he reposed greatest confidence) arranged under their ensignes, and in readines to fight, purposing to charge the back of his enemies. And the rearward of the Romans was not so soon passed by, but they sallied out of the town at sundry places at once, with as tumultuous a noise as they made the day before. Appius Claudius had the leading of the rearward, who having prepared beforehand the hearts of his soldiers, and aduertized them to be prest and ready for what occurrent soever might happen, presently turned the ensignes, and set a compass with the whole army to make head against the enemies. Whereupon there ensued a hot fight which endured a good time, as if two armies had directly encountered one another. In the end, the soldiers of Nabis began to give ground and flie: in which flight of theirs they had made less hast, and better ordered themselves, but that the Achaeans who were acquainted well with the ground, and knew the coasts of the country, hotly followed the chase: these made a foul slaughter and butchery among them; and the most part, such as were disperfed here and there in their flight, they disarmed.

E Then Quintus encamped near unto Amphela, and having harried and wasted all the territory round about the City (which places were very well peopled and very pleasant) when he saw no enemies issue out at the City gates, he removed his camp hard to the river Eurasus. From whence he made excursions, wasted all the vale lying under the hill Targitus, and the lands bounding and adjoining close to the sea.

Much about the same time Quintus made himselfe Master of the towns, situate on the sea side: some yielded willingly, others for fear or perforce. And being afterwards advertized, that the town Gynethum served for a place of safe retreat and refuge unto the Lacedemonians in all their exploits and service at sea, and that the Romans lay encamped not far from the sea side, he resolved to assaile it with all forcible means. This town at that time was very strong, well peopled with Citizens and other inhabitants, and sufficiently furnished with all warlike provision and munition. G And in very good time it fell out, that as Quintus was entered into this difficult enterprise, King Eumenes and the Rhodian fleet arrived. A mighty number of mariners and sea-servitors, gathered out of other Armadoes, within few daies made and furnished all engines and munitions, which were to assault a City so well fortified both by sea and land. Now was the town-wall broken down with the undermining of the fortiers, now was the wall shaken by the push of the ram, and with all there was one rumor that by continuall battery was overthrowen, and with the fall thereof all the wall that stood of each side was tumbling down and lay along. And the Romans endeavourredet and there to reach the town, both from the sides where the passage was more than in the the end, that the enemies might abandon the defence of the more open place, and might the breach made in the wall, and they might but very hard a combat there where they were did, but the hope they received of yielding the City, which reason was closed upon and there cleaving, said their opinion and their desire. Demophilus and Quintus governed the town sign in equal authority. Demophilus had dispatched a courier to the Roman Generall, to him that he would betray the town, and when this time and place of execution of this generall was agreed upon between them, the water was killed by Demophilus by occasion whereof the City was the better defended with more careful heed by him alone, yet and the assault there of had been more difficult, but that Quintus came to succour and help with four thousand and five hundred. He was no sooner discovered with an army ranged in battell array from the brow and top of the hill that is now far distant from the town, while Demophilus within from another side followed the assault with his ordnance and artillery both by sea and land, but Demophilus then began himself to despair in desperado, and was driven perforce to take the very chance which in another he had punished by death: and upon composition that he might depart and have away with him those soldiers which he had in garrison, he delivered up the City to Quintus.

Before that Quintus was rendered, Pythagoras left his Capitaine Argos, leaving the guard and defence of the City into the charge of Timochares of Phoenia, came with a thousand waged soldiers, and two thousand Argives unto Nabis at Ugentium. And Nabis like as at the first arrival of the Roman fleet, and the tumults within of the town standing by the sea side, was much affrighted, so he had recovered again some little hope and was well cheered in mind, to long as Opidius held out still in his garrison within the town kept their own. But after he heard once that it also was yielded unto the Romans, and lost, being no hope left by land side, which was wholly possessed by the enemies, and that he was altogether shut up from the sea, he thought it best to yield unto fortune. And first he sent an herald into the camp, to know whether the enemies would permit and suffer him to send his Ambassadors unto them. Which being granted, Pythagoras received unto the General with no other charge and commission, but only to request that they might part with the Roman Generall. Hereupon the Council was assembled, and generally opined it was, that there should be granted unto him a conference, inasmuch, as both time and place was agreed upon and appointed. Now when they were come to the hills standing in the midst of that quarter, with some small companies of soldiers attending on either side upon them, they left their colours behind them, standing in guard, within the open view and sight of both parts: and then Nabis came down with a certain chosen guard for his body, and Quintus accompanied with his brother, Ennius the King, Sabinus the Rhodian, and Aristhenus the Prætor of the Achæans, with some few knight Marthals and Colonels. And then the tyrant being put to his choice, whether he would speak first, or hear another, began his speech in this wise.

 of Nabis.

If I could have bethought my self, O Quintus, and you all that are here present, & imagined what the cause should be, that you either proclaimed or made war first against me, I would have attended the issue of my fortune with silence. But now I could not have that Mastery and command of my self to forbear, but that before I perish, I would needs know the reason and cause of my ruin and overthrow. Surely, if ye were such men as the Carthaginians are reported to be, persons whom there is no regard of truth, no trust and security in covenants of society and alli-cence, I would not then marvel at all if you made small reckoning, & cared but little what measure ye offered unto me. But now, when I behold and advise you well, I see you are Romans, whose manner is to entertain most duly and precisely the observation of holy fires & divine Religion, and the faithful keeping of human league and alliance. When I consider and look into my self, I hope and think verily that I am one, with whom in generall, as well as with the rest of the Lacedæmonians ye are linked by virtue of a most ancient league, and in particular regard of my self, a private amity and society hath been lately renewed by the war with Philip. But peradventure some man will say, That I have broken and overthrown the same first, in that I hold the City of the Argives. And how shall I be able to answer this, and excuse my self? Shall I plead to the substance of the matter, or to the circumstance of the time? The thing it self presenteth unto me a twofold plea for my defence. For being called by the inhabitants themselves of the City, who offered the town unto me, I received it at their hands, and in no wise seized upon it by force: I received it, I say, when it sided and took part with Philip, before it was comprised within your league. As for the time it justifieth and cleareth me also and my doings. For even then when as I was possessed of Argos, I was allied and associated with you in good accord, and in our covenants, we articulated and capitulated to send aids unto you for your wars, and not to withdraw the garrison from Argos. And verily, in this difference and question about Argos, I have the vantage as well in regard of the equity of the fact, in that I received a City not of yours but of your enemies received it I say, nor surprised by force, but offered and delivered willingly. It also by your own confession, for that in the conditions of the association agreed between us, ye left Argos free unto me. But it may be that the name of tyrant hurteth me, and some of mine actions condemn me much, and namely, that I set slaves free, and divide lands to the poor commons. As for the name, thus much I am able to answer, that, such as I am, better or worse, still I am the very same man, and no other than I was when you, even you O Quintus, entered alliance with me: then, I remember well, I was called King among you, and now I am termed a Tyrant. And therefore

A "therefore if I my self had changed the staid stile of my dignity and government, I must have yielded a reason and account of my levity and inconstancy: but seeing you have altered it, ye ought to answer for your levity. Now as concerning the multitude so augmented by the enfranchising of slaves, as touching the land, also, parted and distributed among the poor and needy, I can maintain and justify my doings herein, & protect me under the defence and privilege of the very time. For all these things, as they as they be may, I had done already, when ye made a league and covenant with me, and received aide at my hand in the war against Philip. But in case I had done so at this very present, I stand not now upon this, whether I either had offended you or broken your amity, but thus much I aver, that done I had according to the custom and fashion of our ancestors. And ye must not think to square and try the practice of Lacedaemon according to the rule and square of your laws and ordinances. For to let pass many other things (and needless it is to compare particulars: ye chuse your gentlemen or men of arms according to their revenue: according to revenue, ye chuse likewise the footmen. Your will is that some few should excell in wealth and power, & the commons be subject and vassals unto them. Our Law-giver thought not good, that the common-wealth should be ruled by a few, whom you call a Senate: nor that one or two States should excel & have preeminence in the City; but he thought that in the equality of wealth & worship, there would be many more to bear arms for their country. I have made it longer discover, I confess, than the ordinary and natural brevity of our speech in these parts will bear. And I might have knit all up in one word and said, that I had done nothing after I was entered into amity with you, where with you needed to have taken any offence & been duplicated. Then the Roman General made answer to these points in this manner. No friendship nor association at all have we made with you but with Peloponnetus & lawful R. of the Lacedaemonians; whereof I must needs say that the tyrants also who afterwards held the signory & sovereignty of Lacedaemon, have usurped the right, and enjoyed the benefit during the time that we were otherwise employed, and wholly busied one while in the Punick wars, another while in the Gauls, and evermore in one or other: like as you also have done in this last Macedonian war. For what was less unfitting and more absurd, than for us who waged war against Philip for the liberty of Greece, to conclude amity with a tyrant and such a tyrant, as of all others that ever have been is most cruel, most violent and outrageous with his own subjects? And considering that we were entered into the couple and train of letting all Greece at liberty, albeit you had not possessed your self of Argos by covin, nor held the same by force, yet it behoved us to restore Lacedaemon also to her ancient liberty, and to settle her in her own laws, whereof ere while you would seem to make mention, as if you had followed the steps of Lycurgus. Shall we make care and take the pains to void the garrisons of Philip out of Iassus & Bargilla; and when we have so done, leave to be trodden under your feet, Argos & Lacedaemon, two most noble Cities, the two lights as it were in times past of all Greece; which remaining still in servitude and slavery, might deface the rest of our glory, & mar the title that we aim at, of Saviours and Deliverers of Greece? But you say, that the Argives friended Philip and took his part. We are content well enough, that you should not trouble your self, and be angry for our sake. For we know for certain, that this was the fault of two or three persons at most, and not of the whole City: and we know as well, that it was not agreed in any publike councill, that you and your garrison were sent for and received into the Castle. As for the Thebans, the Phocians, & Locrians, they sided with Philip, we won right well, by a general consent of all; and yet when we enfranchised all Greece besides, we also set them at liberty. What think you then should we do in regard of the Argives, who are innocent for any publike counsel intended against us? You said that you were blamed & charged sore for setting bondslaves free. No small objections these are. I assure you, nor of little importance. But what are they in comparison of other bad parts and heinous facts, committed by you and your followers day by day, one in the head of another? Grant but liberty of an Assembly general either at Argos or Lacedaemon, wherein the people may speak their minds freely, and what they know by you without impeachment: if you would learn the truth indeed, and hear the particular of a most proud and unsupportable dominion and tyranny. And to let all old matters go by. What a bloody massacre committed this son in law of yours Pythagoras, even almost within my very sight in Argos; what a slaughter and butchery made you your self, when when I was well-near within the manches of Lacedaemon. But come on those persons whom in a general assembly you caused to be stretched, and promised in the presence of all the Citizens to keep them safe and sure in ward: some on, I say, command them to be brought forth, and bound as they be, that their poor fathers & mothers may understand they are alive, whom they have mourned for so much without cause, as if they had been dead. But you will say for ease of the heart, what is that to you Romans? Dare you indeed break out and say so much to those that deliver Greece and their free? To those I say, that for the freedom thereof have passed the seas, have warred both by land and sea? And yet all this while (say you) I have not directly & strictly charged you, nor properly intimated & broken your friendship and amity. No have you not? How often would you have made complaint of the contrary? But I will not use many words & much circumstance, but come to the very crutch and point of the matter. What be the things I say, your friendship is commonly broken? I take it they at these two especially, namely if you take my friends for your foes, and joyn your self to my enemies. You have done both these and the other, for you have taken by force and arms Messana, a City received

* Hereupon it is, that they who use few words and pithy, are said to speak Laconice: and that manner of speech is called Laconismus. The answer of Quintus.

"into our society and alliance by the very same conditions and covenants that Lacedæmon was:
 "you I say our allies, have forced a City allied unto us. Again, with Philip our enemy, you have not "only concluded amity, but (God save all) contracted alliance and affinity by means of Philetes
 "a Colonell and Commander of his: and making war against us, you have kept the seas all about
 "Malen with your men of war and rovers: and I think I may safely say, you have taken prisoners, "and killed more Roman Citizens than Philip himself. And the whole sea-coast of Academy hath "less infested our ships that use to bring provision unto our armies, and been more safe for passage "than the promontory & cape of Malen. Do you forbear therefore to make such vaunt of such "fury: spare you, of all other, to speak of the rights of alliance: and laying off the mask of popular "language and civil speech, talk as a tyrant and enemy as you are. Upon this, Ariftnus dealt with
 "Nabis, one while admonishing and advertising him, another while requesting and entreating him, "now that the opportunity was offered, to provide for himself and his whole estate: he began to "discourse unto him of the Tyrants of all the states confining thereabout one after another by "name, who when they had resigned up and laid down their absolute sovereignty of command,
 "and restored liberty to their subjects, passed their old age among their Citizens, not only in re"pose and security, but also in great honour and reputation. These words uttered & heard between "them to and fro, the night drew on apace & parted the conference. The morrow after, Nabis pro"mised, seeing the Romans would have it so, to quit the City Argos, to withdraw his garrison from "thence, and to deliver again all the captives and fugitive traitors that were under his hands: and "if they demanded any more of him, he requested that they would set it down in writing, that he "might consult thereof with his friends. So, both the Tyrant had respite and time granted to take ad"vice, and also Quintus sat in Council with the principall heads of his allies what to do. The "most part were of opinion to maintain the war still, and to kill the tyrant out of the way: for "never would the liberty of Greece be otherwise firm and sure: and better far had it been, never to "have entred into arms with him, than being once begun, to give it over. And he will, say they, be "greater and more strong hereafter, as if his tyrannicall government were approved, and no doubt
 "he would vouch the people of Rome for author of his unjust rule and dominion, and will induce "and incite by his example many in other free States and Cities, to lie in wait to work means to o"verthrow the liberty of Citizens, and to bring them into thralldom and bondage. The Generall,
 "of himself was more affected and inclined to peace: for he saw, "that if the enemy were once di-
 "ven within the walls, there was no way but to lie in siege against the City, and that would re"quire long tract of time: forasmuch as it was not Gythion (and yet that was betrayed and ren-"dred and not forced by assault) but Lacedæmon, a most strong town both for men and munition,
 "that they were to lay siege unto and assault. And whereas the only hope was, that when they "approached with the army, there might some dissention and sedition have risen among them"selves within: now when as they saw the ensignes in manner advanced hard to the City gates,
 "there was not one that mutined or stirred at all. He added moreover and said, That Vilius the "Embassador newly returned from Antiochus, reported, how all was not found there, nor the "peace like to continue: and that he had passed over into Europe with far greater forces both for "land and at sea, than at any time heretofore: and if (quoth he) the army should be wholly em"ployed in the siege of Lacedæmon, what other power have we to maintain war withall against "so puissant and mighty a Prince as is Antiochus? These were the remonstrances that openly he "gave out: but secretly he was troubled in mind for fear lest a new Consul should come in his place,
 "and have the government of the Province of Greece: and so he should leave unto his successor,
 "the honour of the victory of a war commenced by him, and in good forwardness. But when he "perceived that his allies were nothing inclined to his waies, notwithstanding all his contradic"tion and bending to the contrary, by making semblant that he now drew with them and was of "their mind, he won them all to approve his designment and intention. "Well, God speed our "hand (quoth he): let us besiege Lacedæmon since ye will needs have it so: but considering that "the laying siege unto Cities, is a thing as ye well know, that goeth so slowly forward, and of"tentimes maketh the assailants sooner weary than the defendants: you ought even now to call
 "this account presently with your selves, that we must lie all winter long about the walls of "Lacedæmon. And were there nothing but travel and perill, that during so long time we were "to endure, I would exhort and encourage you to suffer and abide the same, with stout bodies "and resolute minds. But besides all that, we must be at great cost and expences about fabrics, "engins, and instruments of artillery, requisite to the assault of so great a City: we must I say be "provided of victuals good store against winter, as well to serve us as you. Be well advised
 "therefore to the end that you should not suddenly in haste huddle up these matters, or after ye
 "are once entred into the action, give over and abandon it with shame) that ye dispatch
 "your letters aforesaid every one to the State wherein he liveth, and sound them to the depth,
 "how their hearts serve them and what strength and forces they have. Of aids & succours I have o-
 "enough and to spare: but the more in number we are, the more maintenance shall we need. At "this time the territory of our enemies hath nothing but bare soile and naked ground: and "withall, the winter is coming on apace, all which season, carriage (especially far off) is cum"bersome and hard. This Oration at the first caused them every one to regard and look homeward
 "to domestick difficulties and inconveniences, namely, the idleness, the envy and backbiting
 "of those which tarry at home, against them that are employed in warfare: the common liberty

A (which causeth men of one society and commonalty hardly to accord and sort together) the publicke want of treasure, and the niggardice of private persons, when they are to part with any thing out of their own purses. And therefore suddenly changing their minds, they put to the discretion of the Roman Generall, to do and determine what he thought expedient for the good of the people of Rome and their allies. Whereupon Quintus taking the advice only of his own Lieutenants and Provost-Marshalles, engrossed these Articles and conditions following, according to which peace should be concluded with the Tyrant. Imprimis, That there be a truce made for the term of six months between Nabis and the Romans, King Eumenes and the Rhocians, Item, That both T. Quintus and Nabis should immediately send Embassadors to Rome, that the peace might be raised and confirmed by the authority of the Senat. Item, That from that day forward, where-
B in the conditions put down in writing should be presented unto Nabis, the truce aforesaid should begin. Item, That within ten daies next after ensuing, all the garrisons quit Argos and the rest of the towns within the territory of the Argives: and then those peeces to be delivered void and free unto the Romans. Item, That no slave taken captive in wars, belonging either to the King, or to any publicke state, or private person, be had away from those towns: and if any before time had been carried forth, they should be restored again duly to their right Masters. Item, That Nabis should deliver again those ships that he had gotten from the maritime Cities, and that himself have no vessel at all but only two gallions, and those to have no more than six and twenty oars apiece to direct and rule them. Item, That he render all the runagate Traitors and captives unto all the Cities confederate with the people of Rome, as also make restitution to C the Messenians of all their goods again, that either could be found, or the owners know certainly to be theirs. Item, That he restore to all the banished Lacedæmonians their wives and children: but of the wives, so many only as would be content to follow their husbands: and that none of them should be compelled against their wills to go with any exiled person. Item, That to as many mercenary souldiers of Nabis, as were either gone from him into their own Cities, or to the Romans, all their own goods should be justly and truly delivered again. Item, That in the Island of Creta he should not be possessed of any one City: and look what Cities he then held, he yield them to the Romans. Item, That he enter into alliance with no Candior, nor with any other whatsoever, nor yet make war with them. Item, That he remove all the garrisons out of all the Cities that himself had delivered up, and which had surrendered themselves and all they had, under D the protection and obedience of the people of Rome, and not molest them neither by himself nor any of his. Item, That he build no town nor Castle, either in his own land or in any other. Item, That for the more assurance of performing these covenants, he give five hostages, such as it should please the Roman Generall to choose: and namely, his own son for one of them. Last of all, That he make present payment of one hundred talents of silver, and fifty more yearly untill the term of eight years be run out. These Articles engrossed, were sent to Lacedæmon, after the Camp was removed nearer to the City. But nothing well pleased was the tyrant with any of them. Only he was well apaid, that beyond his hope and expectation, there was no mention at all therein of reducing the exiled persons home into the City. But that which offended and displeased him most was this, that both shipping was taken from him, and also the maritime E port towns: for great commodity he gat by the sea, in scouring the coast from the cape of Malea with his pyrats and men of war: and besides, the youth and able men of those Cities, served his turn very well to furnish and man his ships with the very best souldiers and men of service that were. And albeit he scanned and considered upon these articles in great secrecy with his friends, yet were they all of them divulged abroad and current in every mans mouth: so vain are these counsels commonly and hardly to be trusted, as in all things else so especially in keeping of secret counsell. These conditions were controlled and found fault with, not so much by all men in generall, as by each one in particular, as they took exceptions against those points that touched and concerned themselves. They that had married the wives of the banished, or were possessed of any part of their substance, chafed, and stormed thereat, as if they were to lose and forgo their F own, and not to render and restore the goods of others. The slaves who had been freed by the tyrant, were now not only to lose the benefit of that freedom, but also to endure harder servitude and bondage than aforesaid: setting before their eyes how they should return again into the houses and hands of their old Masters, angry and incensed now against them. The hired souldiers were malecontent, for that they saw they should lose their pay after peace concluded: and saw full well, that there was no being for them in those States and Cities, who hated the tyrant themselves no more than their followers and attendants. At first they muttered and murmured, whispering these things among themselves in their secret meetings and conventicles: afterwards they mutined, and on a sudden ran and took arms. The Tyrant seeing the multitude disquieted enough of themselves with this tumult, assembled the people together. Where, after he had declared the conditions imposed upon him by the Romans, and in every article had unjustly put to somewhat of his own devising, to aggravate all matters and make them seem more grievous and intollerable, at the rehearsing of every particular the whole assembly one while cried out, and another while the sundry parts thereof, set up a note of interdislike. Then he asked their opinion what answer they would have him to return unto those Articles, and what to do? They all in manner with one voice accorded and said, that there was no answering of the matter, but that he should plainly go to war, and make no more

add. And that every man for his own part (as the usual manner is of a multitude, when they are together) should take a good heart, and hope the best, saying that Fortuna favoured Fortitude. The tyrant incited with these their words, seconded them himself, & assured them that the Achaean and the Aetolian would take their parts and assist them, and if they did not, yet were they strong enough of themselves, and had sufficient means to endure the siege. No more talking now, nor thinking of peace, but every man was ready to run in hand to his several quarters, and stand upon their own guard, without any rest or repose from thenceforth. The Romans (so soon as they saw some few of them to sally out of the City, and to discharge their darts among them, were soon put out of all doubt, that no other remedy there was, but they must to war again. After this, there passed certain light skirmishes four daies together, at first without any assured issue of good speed, either of the one part or the other: but the fife day after one conflict fought in manner almost of a set battell, certain Roman souldiers following the chase upon their enemies, and killing them in their flight, entered the City at certain void places, where the wall was not united; for in that order were the walls built of that town in those daies. Quintus then verily, having well bridled and tamed by this terror his enemies for making any more excursions, and supposing that there remained no more, but lustily to go to an assault, sent out certain of purpose for to call the mariners & sea-servitors from Gythium, whiles himself in person, accompanied with the Provost Marshalls, rode about the walls to view the situation of the City. This Sparta in times past stood without murage. And the tyrants of late daies had built walls against the open flats and plain fields. The high ground and of harder access, they fortified with strong corps de guards of armed souldiers, instead of bulwarks of defence. When Quintus had sufficiently considered every corner, he supposed there was no other way but to invest it round about, and thereupon with all his forces united (which being all together Roman Citizens and Latine allies foot and horse, and souldiers and sea-servitors one with another, amounted to 50000 fighting men) he compassed and environed the City. Some brought scaling ladders, some fire, every man one thing or other, not only to give an assault, but also to terrifie and amaze them: with direction and expresse commandment, with a loud cry and shout at once in all places to approach the walls, & give the venture upon them: to the end, that the Lacedaemonians affrighted at one instant on every side, might not know which way to turn them, and be to seek, where first to make head against the enemies, and in what place to come with succours. Having therefore divided the whole power of his army into three parts, he gave the one of them in charge to assault that quarter which was called Phaedrum; a second likewise to set upon that which is named Daphneum, and the third to force the canon Hephyronia; places all lying open and without a wall. The City being thus seized on all sides, with so great fear, the tyrant moved and troubled to hear those sudden outcries & fearful news brought unto him by hasty messengers: according as any place stood most in danger, at the first, either presented himself in proper person, or else sent some to help; but afterwards, seeing the fear so general, and no one place void of danger, he was so astonished, that unable he was either himself to give good direction to others, or to hear theirs. So void was he, and disurnished of advice and counsel, and bereft of his right wits and senses. The Lacedaemonians at first had sustained the furious violence of the Romans in the narrow streights and passages, & at one time in diverse places, three armies fought on either side; but afterwards, as the heat of the fight increased, the service was nothing equal of both parties: for the Lacedaemonians discharged shot from which the Roman souldiers easily saved themselves, by means of their large targets, and with all much thereof either fell short, and besides, or else so feebly slied from them, that little or no harm they could do. For by reason of the streightness of the place, and the multitude so thronged and thrust together, they had not only no space to take their run, when they should lance their darts, the best means of all other to enforce them, but not so much as fore footing, and at ease to drive and level them with all their strength. In so much as of all the darts and javelins which were directly shot at them, none at all pierced to their bodies, & very few so much as stuck in their bucklers. Many some happened to be wounded from the higher places, by those that stood near unto them, and about their sides. And anon as they advanced forward they chanced to be hurt, not only with arrows & darts from off the houses, but also with tiles and slates ere they were aware. But afterwards, they covered their heads with their targets, which they set so close united together one under the other, featherwise, that not only there was no place of entrance for the darts thrown and cast at random, no, nor so much as any room for a weapon to get between, levelled though it were, and aimed near at hand: so as under this target-fence they approached nearer and nearer in safety. At the first the narrow and straight passages filled with the throng both of themselves and also of the enemies so thrust and crowded together, staid them for a while; but afterwards, when they had by little and little gathered upon the enemies, and put them back, and were come into a larger and more spacious street of the City, then their force and violence could not possibly be endured any longer. Now when the Lacedaemonians turned their backs, and fled apace to gain the higher places for their vantage, Nabis verily for his part trembling and quaking as if the City had been quite lost, looked about him on every side, which way himself might escape and save himself. But Pythagoras as in all things else he performed the devoir and part of a courageous Captain, so he was the only cause that the town was not lost: for he commanded to set fire on the houses standing next to the wall, which in the minute of an hour burned out on a light flame, as being set forward by the help of those who otherwise were wont to quench the like carefires: whereupon

A which upon the Roman side swelling and bubbling down upon the Roman heads, and not only the soldiers but also the master pieces that were left upon the slain soldiers, the flame spread still far and near, and the smothering smok put them in fear of more danger than was. And therefore, as well these Romans who were without the City in the hottest of their assault, retreated from the walls as also those that were within already, for fear by the fire behind them they should be separated from their fellows, retired themselves. Quintus also seeing how the case stood, caused to sound the second ward so being recalled they returned out of the City which they had as good as again into the camp. And Quintus conceiving more hope by the fear of the enemies than of the thing itself and the service done, but as gave over for three daies to terrifie them partly by skirmishing, and partly by intrenching and Ropping up certain quarters, that they might have no passage to fly and look for themselves. The tyrant continued at length with these dangers menaced, sent Pythagoras again in to Onoratus Quintus. But he at first rejected him and commanded him to want out of the camp. Yet in the end after he had made most humble supplications, and set himself prostrate at his knees he gave him audience. The beginning of his speech was this, that he yielded altho the discretion and former award of the Romans. But seeing that he gained nothing thereby, and that his words took no effect, they grew at length to this point, that upon the same capitulations which few daies before were exhibited up in writing, a truce should be made, and henceforth was both the money and also the hostages received.

B While the tyrant was besegged and assailed, there came post upon post to Argos, that Lacedaemon was at the point of being lost: whereupon the Argives took such heart and courage into them (by reason that Pythagoras with the best part of the garrison soldiers was departed before out of their town) that concerning the small number which remained in their fortres, under the leading of one Archippus, they expelled the rest of the garrison. As for Antocrates of Pellene their Captain, because he had behaved himself in his charge and government gently and mildly, they sent him away alive with safe conduct. At the very instant of this joyfull occurrent, T. Quintus arrived after he had granted peace to the tyrant and sent away from Ephedamon, Eumenes and the Rhodians together with L. Quintus his brother to the fleet. The City of Argos in great joy proclaimed the celebration of their most solemn feast, and those so famous and renowned games and pastimes called Nemean, against the coming of the Roman army and their Generall, which they had forelet upon the ordinary time and day by occasion of the troubles of war. And for the D honour of Quintus, they ordained him to be the overseer of these solemnities. Many things there were so redouble and increase this their joy and solace to the full. The Citizens were redeemed from Lacedaemon whom Pythagoras of late and Nabis aforesaid had carried away. They also were returned home again who had fled and escaped, after the conspiracy of Pythagoras was detected, and the massacre begun. Now they saw their liberty again, whereof they had lost the light a long time: now they beheld the Romans the authors thereof, and who for their sakes were induced to take arms and enterprise the war with the tyrant. Also upon the very day of the Nemean games, the liberty of the Argives was published and proclaimed by the voice of the publicke beadle and crier of the City. But look how much joy and hearts content the Achaeans conceived in their common and generall Council of all Achaia, for the restoring of Argos into their ancient freedom, so much troubled they were again, in regard that Lacedaemon was left still

E in servitude, and the tyrant so near unto them ready ever to prick their sides, whereby their joy was not so sound and entire. But the Etolians in all their Diets inveighed mightily against this, saying, That the Romans never gave over the war with Philip before he had abandoned all the Cities of Greece: as for Lacedaemon, it was left still under a tyrant and in the mean while the lawfull and naturall King who had been in the Roman camp, and all the rest of the noblest Citizens should live in exile. For now the people of Rome was become a pensioner to guard the body of tyrannizing Nabis. Then Quintus brought back his army from Argos to Elatia, from whence he departed to the Spartan war. Some write, that the tyrant when he fought with the Romans, came not immediately out of the City: but that he was lodged without by himself full opposite to the Roman camp: and that after he had made good a long time, expecting the aid of the Etolians, he was driven in the end to a battell by occasion that the Romans charged upon the forragers and purveyors of his camp: in which battell he was vanquished and beaten out of the field, and craved peace, after that fiftie thousand of his men were slain, and four thousand taken prisoners, and above

G At one and the same time in a manner were letters brought both from T. Quintus touching the affairs achieved at Lacedaemon, and also from M. Porcius the Consul out of Spain. And by order from the State, there was granted in the name of either of them a solemn procession to come to the Comitia. M. Porcius the Consul, after he had governed his Province in quietness upon the defeat of the Boians about the forest of Enna, returned to Rome against the generall assembly for election of Magistrates, and created Consuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus the second time, and T. Sempronius Longus, whose fathers had been Consuls in the first year of the second Punic war. Then the Assembly was holden for the election of Praetors, wherein were chosen Publius Scipio Africanus the second time, Cornelius, the one Merenda, and the other Blasio: Cn. Domitius Calpurnius Severus Dignatus, and T. Junius Tullus. When these elections were finished, the Consul went again into his Province. That year the Ferentinians assailed to obtain a new privilege, requiring that as many Latines as were enrolled in any Roman Colony, should be be Citizens of Rome. But they of Patris Sclavonia and Buxentum, who were Colonies, had their names entered there, and by that means claiming themselves as Roman Citizens, were adjudged by the Senat to be no Citizens of Rome.

In the beginning of this year, wherein P. Scipio Africanus was Consul the second time, with Sempronius Longus, two Embassadors of Nabis the tyrant arrived at Rome. For to give satisfaction, the Senat assembled together without the City in the Temple of Asclepius. There getting word that the peace agreed upon with Quintus might be ratified, and their aim was gained. When it was moved, as touching the government of the Provinces; the Senat (assembled in great frequency) were all of this opinion. That forasmuch as in Spain and Macedony the war was ended, both Consuls should have the government of Italy. Scipio was of advice, That one Consul was sufficient for Italy, and that the other should be employed in Macedony. And why? there was great fear, lest he might be taken from King Antiochus: himself already was passed over into Europe. And when they think yet, quoth he, will he then do, when the Atolians (who doubtless are enemies) shall beside shall solicit and call upon him for to war, and Antiochus a warlike and commander to be renowned for the defeats and overthrowes of the Romans, shall pitch him forward to the action. While they debated thus about the Province of the Consuls, the Prætors cast lots for their severall governments. The City jurisdiction fell to Q. Domitius, the forraine to T. Junius. To P. Cornelius the former Spain was allotted, and the latter to Sax. Digitius. Ca. Cornilius had Sicily assigned unto him, and Marcus was charged with Sardinia. It was not thought good that a new army should be transported over into Macedony. But concluded it was, that the army there should be brought back by Quintus into Italy, and discharged. Item, That that the army likewise should be called, which had served under M. Porcius in Spain. Item, That both Consuls should govern Italy, and levy two legions of Citizens to go thither, that when those forces were dismissed and licensed to go home, which it pleased the Senat to set at liberty, there should be eight Roman legions in all, and no more in pay.

In the former year, when M. Porcius and L. Calpurnius were Consuls, there had been held a solemnity of a sacred Spring. But when P. Licinius, the high Pontifex made report first to the Colledge of the Priests, and by the advice and authority of that Colledge, unto the L.L. of the Consuls. That there was some error committed, and that it was not performed accordingly: the Senators ordained, that it should be done again, according to the discretion and direction of the Pontifex aforesaid. Also that the great Roman Plaies, which together with that Spring were allowed, should be exhibited with the accustomed cost and expence: And that all young men that fell between the Calends of March, and the last day of April, in that year wherein P. Cornelius, Scipio and T. Sempronius Longus were Consuls, should be accounted as consecrated for that sacred Spring above-named. After this, there was an assembly held for the choosing of Censors, wherein were created Sex. Elius Petrus, and C. Cornilius Cethegus: who chose P. Scipio the Consul, President of the Senat, like as the Censors before them had done. In the survey and review of the whole Senat, they left out and discarded three only, and none of them who had borne office of State, and sat in the Ivory chair. Great love these Censors won amongst them of that calling and equality, in giving commandment to the Ediles curule, that at the Roman games and plaies they should set out places apart from the rest of the people for the Senators to behold the said sports. For aforesaying they beheld the sports and pastimes all together, without regard and distinction. Few also of the Gentlemen or Knights of Rome had their horses of service taken from them: and rigorously dealt they with no estate and degree. The porch of Liberty, and the bannet called Vila publica, were by them repaired and enlarged. The sacred Spring was celebrated, and the games vowed by Se. v. Sulpitius the Consul, were by them exhibited. And while all men were amused, and their minds occupied thereupon, Q. Pleminius, who had been cast in prison for divers and sundry outrages committed at Locri, to the great offence of God and man, had procured certain persons, who in the night season at one instant should set on fire many places of the City, to the end that while all the people were affrighted in this night tumult, he might break prison and escape. This complot was discovered and reported to the Senat by some of them that were privy and accessory thereunto. And Pleminius was let down into a lower dungeon, and there killed.

That year were certain Colonies of Roman Citizens conducted to Patris, Tulturnum, and Buxentum, and three hundred men planted in each of them. Likewise Colonies of Roman Citizens were brought to Salernum and Buxentum. The Triumvirs who had the placing of them were T. Sempronius Longus, Consul for the time being, M. Servilius and Q. Adianus Thibullus. The territory of the Campans was divided amongst them. Three other also deputed for the like purpose, D. Junius Brutus, M. Babius Tampilus, and M. Helvius placed a Colony of Roman Citizens in Sipontum to enjoy the lands of the Aprians. Likewise other Colonies of Roman Citizens were planted in Tempe and Crotone. The lands belonging to Tempe were won from the Arrians, who had expelled the Greeks: and the Greeks remained in Crotone. The Triumvirs for Crotone were Cn. Octavius, L. Brutus Paulus, and C. Platerius: and for Tempe L. Cornilius, Adianus, and C. Salentinus. Also that year were kept at Rome divers wonderful and prodigious sights, and others were reported from other parts. In the common place place, in the public Hall, Comitium, and Capitol, were seen certain drops of blood. And oftentimes it rained earth. The third of October was seen fire. News came that at Turraunum there ran a stream of milk. Also that at Antium there were

A were two Infants both of free condition, born without eyes and nose, and another in the Picene country handless and footless. These strange tokens were by order given from the chief Pontifices, looked unto and expiated, and a Novendial sacrifice continued for nine daies, because the Adrians brought word that in their territory it rained stones.

In Gaul near to Mediolanum, L. Valerius Flaccus the Pro-Consul, fought a fier field with the French Insubrians and Boians, Which Boians under the conduct of Dorulacus passed over the river Padus, for to sollicit and raise the Insubrians. In which conflict were slain ten thousand enemies. About the same time his Colleague in government M. Porcius Cato triumphed over Spain. In this triumph he carried in pomp and shew 25000 pound weight of silver in bullion, and in coin 123000 Bigar pieces: of Olean silver 540 pound weight, and of gold 400000 pound weight. Of B the booty won from the enemies he dealt among his souldiers that were footmen 270 asses a-piece, and trebble so much to every man of arms.

T. Sempronius the Consul having put himself in his journey toward his Province, led first his legions into the Boians country. Boetix at that time their Prince with his two brethren, having raised the whole nation to rebellion, encamped in certain commodious places: so as it appeared that if the enemy entred their confines, they were ready to give him battell. The Consul perceiving how strong and confident the enemies were, dispatched a courier to his Colleague, to make halt if he thought to good and come unto him: for untill his coming he would fall off, seem to retire and not fight. But the same cause that moved the Consul to stay, gave occasion to the Gauls to make more haste: for besides that the delaying & lingring of the Consul, encouraged the

C enemies, they were desirous to have the triall of a battell before the forces of both Consuls were joynd together. Howbeit, for two daies space they did nothing but stand ready ranged for fight, if any should come forth to brave and dare them. On the third day they approached the trench and rumper of the Consuls Camp, and on every side at once gave the assault. The Consul immediately commanded the souldiers to arm. And when they were armed, he kept them in awhile, with intent to encrease the foolish confidence in the enemies, and to dispose of his own forces, and give direction, what companies should sally out at every gate. The two legions he commanded to issue forth under their colours at the two side gates called Principales: but in the very passage without the Gauls stood thick and made head again, so that the way was stopped up. A long time they fought in those very straights. And they bestirred themselves no more

D with their hands and swords, than they pressed one upon another with their bodies and targets: while the Romans strived to advance their epigns out of the gates, and the Gauls endeavoured no less, either to enter themselves within the camp, or else to impeach the Romans for going forth. But in this conflict there was nothing between them either won or lost, no ground gained the one of the other, before that Q. Victorius a principall Centurion of the Pilani in the second legion, and C. Arinius, a Tribune or Marshall of the fourth, caught the banners from the ensign-bearers (a thing often practised in time of extremity) and slung them among the enemies. For whiles these laboured and strained themselves to recover each one a banner, they of the second legion first brake through and got forth of the gate: so as now, they maintained skirmish without the trench, and the fourth legion stuck still in the gap. By which time there

E arose another tumult and noise in the contrary side of the camp: for the Gauls were broken in at the Quæstors gate (or the gate against the * Quæstorium) and slain those that valiantly made head and held them play; to wit, Lucius Posthumus a treasurer surnamed Tympanus, Marcus Arinius and Publius Sempronius two Colonels of the allies, and well near two hundred souldiers besides. Thus the camp on that part was won, untill such time as one extraordinary cohort was sent from the Consul to defend the Quæstors gate aforesaid: which either slew those that were within the rampier, or else drave them forth, and so withstood those that would have rushed in. And much about that very time the fourth legion also with two extraordinary squadrons brake forth at the gate. Thus at once there were three severall battels in sundry places about the camps, and the dissonant cries and noises (according to the divers occasions of each party ministered by their fellows) turned and withdrew the minds and spirits of

F those that were in fight, from the present skirmish before them. In this manner maintained they the fight till noon, equally matched in strength and number, and little or no odds between them for hope of victory: but tedious travell and extremity of heat compelled the Gauls (whose bodies are soft and open, and soon running to sweat, and who of all other things can least away with thirst) to abandon the battell: and those few that remained behind, the Romans ran upon, mist their colours, and chased them into their own hold. Then the Consul sounded the retreat, at which signall given the most part retired themselves: but a sort of them, upon a hot desire of fight, and good hope to be Masters of their camp, persisted still close to their trench. The Gauls discarding their small number issued all forth out of their Camp: and then the Roman

G being discomfited, were glad now of themselves, for fear and flight to studge unto the strength of their own hold, which they would not retire unto at the commandment of the Consul. Thus on both sides there was one while victory, and another while fearfull flight: howbeit, when all cards were told and the reckoning made, the Gauls had the worst of the game: for of them were slain eleven thousand, whereas of Romans there died but five thousand. Then the Gauls retired themselves into the most inward parts of their country, and the Consul marched with his legions to Placentia. Some write, that Scipio and his Colleague with their

this joynt forces, invaded and spoiled the countries of the Boians and Ligerians; so far forth as they could pass for woods and bogs: others again record, that he, having done no memorable exploit at all, returned to Rome about the assembly for election of Consuls.

The same year T. Quintus spent the whole winter season at Elania (whither he had retired his forces for winter harbour) in hearing mens causes and ministering justice to every one; also in reforming and redressing all such disorders as had passed in the States and Cities, through the licentious government and jurisdiction either of Philip himself or his Captains, whiles he advanced those favourits of his own faction, and put down the right and liberty of others. In the beginning of the spring he came to Corinth, where he had given summons, that there should be holden a general Diet of the States. There in the assembly of all the Embassadors and agents from the Cities, gathered about him as it were to hear an Oration, he made a speech unto them: beginning first with the amity contracted between the Romans and Greece: and proceeding to the acts achieved in Spain by the Generals afore him, and those also of his own. All that he spake was heard and received with great applause, untill he touched the point concerning Nabis: for it was generally thought unfitting, that he undertaking to set all Greece at liberty, had left a tyrant (not only a grievous oppressour of his own subjects, but also dangerous to all the Cities about him) to remain still as a fearfull malady seated in the very bowels and heart of a most noble and renowned State. Quintus, not ignorant of their affections and dispositions, confessed, that he should not indeed have any ear at all to the motion or mention of peace with the tyrant, in case that Lacedaemon could have stood in safety without so doing: but now since that Nabis might not possibly be confounded and overthrown, without the present ruin and fearfull downfall of the City, he thought it a better course in policy to leave the tyrant enfeebled and disarmed of all means to offend and hurt any man, than to suffer so goodly a City to die is the cure, and under the hand as it were of the Physician, amidst those quick and sharp remedies which it were never able to endure: and so in seeking to recover liberty, to perish and die for ever. And after he had discoursed of things past, he intreated, that his purpose and intent was, to go into Italy, and to have away with him his whole army: also that within ten daies they should hear news how all the garrisons had quit Demetrius and Chalcis: and that he would deliver out of hand unto the Achaeans in their very sight, the fortalls of Corinth: that all the world may know, whether it be the Romans guile, or the fashion of the Aetolians, to over-reach and lie: who in their common talk have not let to discourse, to sow fumes, and to buzze into mens heads, that it was dangerous for Greeks to put their liberty into the Romans hands: & that they had but made a change of their lordly rulers, admitting the Romans in lieu of the Macedonians. But as for them (quoth he) their tongue is no sword, being such persons as never took heed and made regard what either they did or said. But the other Cities he advertised to weigh their friends by deeds and not by words: to be wise and well advised whom they are to trust, and whom they are to beware of: to use their liberty in measure and moderation; which if it be well tempered and qualified, is good and wholesome to particular persons and general States: but excessive if it be, it would not only be grievous and unsupportable to others, but also unruly, dangerous, and pernicious to themselves that have it. He gave them counsell, that the Princes and States in each City should maintain concord not only among themselves, but also with all other in one community: for so long as they accord and agree together, no King nor tyrant should be strong enough for them: whereas discord and sedition maketh overture and openeth easie way to enemies that lie in wait for the vantage: considering, that the side which in civill contention is the weaker and goeth to the walls, will band rather with a forrainger, than give place and stoop to a Citizen. In conclusion, he advised them, to keep and preserve by their careful regard, this their liberty purchased for them by forrainger forces, and delivered unto them with faithfull security of strangers and aliens: that the people of Rome might see, that they have given freedom to well deserving people: and this their great benefit hath been well bestowed upon worthy persons. Whiles they hearkned to these sage admonitions, as uttered out of the mouth of a very father, the tears gushed plentifully out of their eyes for kind heart and joy: insomuch as they troubled him in the delivery of the rest of his speech. For a while there was a plausible noise heard among them as they approved his words, and advised one another to ponder these sage sayings, and to imprint them deeply in their hearts, proceeding as it were from divine oracle. After silence made, he requested them to seek up all those Roman Citizens (if haply there were any) who lived in servitude and slavery among them; and within two months to send them unto him into Italy: for it were a great ignominy and shame even for them, that in their countries there should remain in bondage any of those, by whose means they themselves were set free and delivered out of bondage. With that, they all cried aloud with one voice, That for this above all the rest they rendered thanks unto him, in that they were admonished and warned by him, to perform their devoir and duty, so honest, so religious, and so necessary. Now a mighty number there was of captives in the Punick war: such as Annibal (when their friends redeemed them not by ransom) had sold in open market. And how great the multitude of them was, this may prove and testify which Polybius writeth to wit, that the cost the Achaeans for their part *one hundred talents: and yet they ordained and set down, that there should but 300 Denarii be repaid unto their Masters for the redemption of every poll: for by this account Achaea had 1200 of them. Add now unto them as many as all Greece was like to have by that proportion [and see what number may arise.]

A The assembly was not broken up and dismissed, before they might see the Garrison descending from the fortress of Corinth, who marched thence to the gate and went back wiles. The General presently followed them and being accompanied with them all, who called him with a loud voice, Their Saviour and Redeemer, he took his leave and bid them farewell: and so returned the same way he came to Enna. From thence he sent his Lieutenant A. Claudius with all the forces, commanding him to conduct the army to Orion, by the way of Theffalle and Epirus, and there to expect and wait his coming: for he purposed there to take Sea and set over his army into Italy. He wrote also to L. Quinctius his brother and Lieutenant and Admiral likewise of the fleet, to gather all the ships of burden from along the Sea coast of Greece into that place. Himself went to Chalcis, and having withdrawn the garrisons not only from thence but also from Oreum and Eretria, he held a general Council there of all the Cities of Euboea: and after he had made remonstrance unto them in what case he found them, and in what estate he left them, he dismissed the assembly. From thence he departed to Demetrias, where also he removed the garrison, and being attended with a train of all the citizens, like as at Corinth and Chalcis before, he took his journey into Theffalle: where the cities were not only to be let free, but also to be reformed, and from a general disorder and confusion wherein they stood, to be reduced and framed into some tolerable order and form of government. For they were not only tainted and infected with the corruption of the times, and the violent current of licentious outrage, which had taken head under the government of the King; but also of an indred troublesome spirit and humor of their own, whereby, since their first beginning and uprising, even unto our daies they never held Parliaments, Elections, Diets, Councils, or any other assemblies whatsoever, without much trouble and sedition. He chose the Senate and Judges there in regard especially of their wealth, and in all Cities he made that part more mighty, unto which it was more expedient and beneficial to have all quiet and in peace. Thus having visited Theffalle, and taken a general review thereof, he came by the way of Epirus to Orion, from whence he intended to cross the seas. From Orion all his forces were transported to Brundisium, and so they passed forward throughout Italy to the City of Rome, in manner of triumph, sending before them as great a train of prizes by them taken, as they made themselves in their march. After they were come to Rome, the Senat assembled without the City for Quintus, where he had audience to declare and discourse of his worthy exploits: and willing they were to grant him triumph, according to his deserts. Three daies together he rode in triumph. The first day he made a shew of all the armour, as well defensive as offensive, also of brassen and marble images, of which he had taken more from King Philip, than he found in the sackage of the cities. The second day there was carried in pomp, the gold and silver both unwrought and wrought into plate, yea, and cast into coin. Of silver unwrought there was 18000 pound weight: of wrought, 270 pound weight. Many vessels of plate of all sorts, and most engraven, some of right curious and exquisite workmanship. Likewise brassen vessels, cunningly and artificially made: and besides, ten shields of silver, and in coin eighty four thousand Attick peeces of silver, which they call Tetradrachma, weighing almost four Roman deniers apeece: of gold there was three thousand seven hundred and fourteen pound weight, and one shield full and whole of beaten gold: and of Philip golden peeces in coin, fourteen thousand five hundred and fourteen. The third day were born in view for a pageant, a hundred and fourteen coronets of gold, which were the presents of Cities given unto him. Moreover, there were led that day the beasts for sacrifice: and before his chariot went many noble prisoners and hostages, and among them, Demetrius, King Philip his son, and Armenus the son of Nabis the tyrant, a Lacedaemonian born. Then rode Quintus himself in a chariot into the City, and a great number of souldiers followed after, by reason that his whole army was retired with him out of his province. To every footman he gave two hundred and fifty Ases, double as much to a centurion, and triple to an horseman. Those who were redeemed out of captivity, followed his chariot with their heads shaven, and much beautified the glory of the triumph.

In the end of this year, Q. Atilius Tubero a Tribune of the Commons, presented a request or bill into the people, and they granted and enacted it, to wit, that two Colonies of Latins should be conducted, the one into the Britian country, and the other into the territory of Thurium. For the conduct and blessing whereof, there were ordained three Deputies called Triumvirs, whose commission was in force for three years, namely, Q. Nevius, M. Minucius Rufus, and M. Furius Crassipes for the Britians: and for Thurium, A. Manlius, P. Atilius, and L. Apustius. For the choosing of these officers, Cn. Domitius the Pretor in the City, called two several assemblies in the Capitol. In that year were certain Temples dedicated, one of Iuno Sospita in the herb-market, which had been vowed and set out to building four years before, by C. Cornelius the Consul, during the war with the French: and he in his Consulship dedicated it. Another Temple of Faunus: the Ediles C. Sempronius and Cn. Domitius, had likewise bargained for the building thereof two years before, and laid by the money therefore; and this Cn. Domitius being now Pretor of the City dedicated it. Also Q. Minucius Ralla, dedicated a Temple to Portuna Primigenia upon the hill Quirinalis, having been created Dumvirs himself for that purpose. Sempronius Sophus had vowed the same ten years before, in the time of the Punick war, and agreed for a certain price to have it built. Also P. Atilius the other Dumvir consecrated the Temple of Jupiter within the island. Vowed he was five years before in the Gallic war by L. Furius Purpurio Pretor, and by him afterwards (when he was Consul) order was given for the edifying thereof. And these were the affairs which passed that year.

P. Scipio returned out of his Province and government of Gaul for the election of new Consuls, and to that purpose was the general assembly summoned: wherein were chosen L. Cornelius Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The next morrow after were created Pretors, L. Cornelius Scipio, M. Fulvius Nobilior, C. Scribonius, M. Valerius Messala, L. Porcius Licinius, and C. Flaminius. C. Atilius Serranus, and L. Scribonius Libo, Ediles of the chair, were the first that exhibited the Stage-plays called Megalæta. And the Roman plays or games, represented and set out by these Ediles, the Senat now first and never before beheld apart from the rest of the people. And this (as all novelties and new fashions) ministred much talk: whiles some gave their opinion and said, That now at length that was given to this most noble and honorable State, which long ago was due; others again confirmed thus, and gave out, "That whatsoever was added to the Majesty of the Senators and Nobles, was derogatory from the dignity of the people: and that all such kind of distinctions, whereby estates and degrees are severed one from another, are prejudicial as well to common peace as publick liberty. For these five hundred and eighty years say they, these plays and games have been beheld and looked upon in common, without any such precise difference. What new accident is suddainly befallen, why the Nobles should not be willing to let the Commons be intermingled with them in the Theatre? and why a rich man should disdain his poor neighbour to sit by him? This is a new appetite and strange longing of theirs indeed, full of pride and arrogancy, a thing never desired nor taken up and practised by the Senat of any nation whatsoever. So as in the end even Africanus beshrewed himself (men say) and repented thereof, for that he in his Consulship moved and perswaded the bringing up of this new fashion. So hard a matter it is to alter an old custome, and make a new order to be well liked of. And men are ever more willing to keep them to ancient customes, unless they be such, as practise and experience do evidently check and condemn.

In the beginning of the year, wherein L. Cornelius and Q. Minutius were Consuls, news came so thick of many earth-quakes, that men were not only weary of the thing it self, but also of the holy dayes and solemnities that were published and proclaimed in that regard. For the Consuls could not intend either to assemble the Senate and sit in Councel, or manage the affairs of the Common-weal, for being wholly employed about sacrificing and appeasing the wrath of the gods. In conclusion, the Decemvirs were commanded to peruse the books of Sibylla, and according to their answer and direction, a procession and supplication was for three daies solemnised. And before the Altars and shrines of the gods and goddesses, they made their prayers with garlands and coronets on their heads: yea, and commandment was given, that every household and family by it self should fall to their prayers and devotions. Also the Consuls by order from the Senat made proclamation, That upon what day a feast or solempny was ordained by occasion of one earthquake, no man the same day should bring news of another. Then the Consuls cast lots for the government of their provinces, and after them the Pretors did the like. Unto Cornelius befell Gaul, and to Minutius the Ligurians; C. Sempronius had the charge of the civil jurisdiction, and M. Valerius of the forraign: L. Cornelius governed Sicily, L. Porcius Sardinia, C. Flaminius high Spain, and L. Fulvius the lower. The Consuls looked for no war that year: but even then at that instant were letters brought from M. Cincius Lord President of Pisa, which gave notice, that twenty thousand Ligurians were up in arms, having conspired together in all market Towns and places of resort throughout the whole nation, and that they had already wasted the territory of Luna; and having invaded and passed through the Pisan Land, had over-run also the Sea coasts. Wherefore Minutius the Consul, unto whom the government of Liguria was allotted, by the advice of the LL. of the Senat mounted up into the pulpit Rostra, and published an act, That those two legions of Roman citizens, which the former year had been enrolled, should within ten daies present themselves at Arretium, in lieu whereof he would levy two other legions out of the City. Also he commanded the allies and Magistrats of the Latin nation, and their Embassadors leagers, who owed knight-service, and were bound to find souldiers to come before him into the Capitol. And from among them he enrolled fifteen thousand foot and five hundred horse, according to the number of young and serviceable men that were to be found in each State: which done, he commanded them forthwith, to go directly from the Capitol to the gate of the City, and presently to take musters that all might be done with greater expedition. Unto Fulvius and Flaminius were appointed three thousand Roman footmen and two hundred horsemen apiece, for to supply and strengthen their forces: also five thousand foot to either of them of allies of the Latin nation, with two hundred horse. Moreover the Pretors were charged to dismiss and call the old souldiers, so soon as they were arrived into their provinces. Now, when as the souldiers who were enrolled in the City-legions, resorted thicket unto the Tribuns of the Commons, that they should take knowledge of as many of them as were exempted from warfare, for that they either had served out their full time by law appointed, or were sickly and diseased: behold the letters of Sempronius dashed all this, and cleared every difficulty and scrupulosity: wherein it was written, that fifteen thousand Ligurians were entred the territory of Placentia, and had made great wast and laccage therein putting all to fire and sword as they went, even as far as to the very walls of the Colony it self, and the banks of Padus. Also that the nation of the Boii made countenance and gave suspicion of rebellion. In which regards seeing there was a tumultuous and suddain war toward, the Senat passed a decree, wherein they signified that it was not their pleasure that the Tribuns should accept any excuses pretended by the souldiers, but that they should all meet

A meet and assemble together, according to the Edict. Over and besides they gave order, that the allies of the Latin nation, who had served in the armies of P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius, and were discharged from soldiery by them being Consuls, should now be ready to shew themselves, against that day which L. Cornelius the Consul should appoint, and at what place soever of Herruria he should command by way of proclamation: Also that the said L. Cornelius the Consul in his march and journey toward the Province, might take up, enrol, and arme, what souldiers he thought good, out of all the burroughs and villages in his way, and have them with him whither soever he would, yea, and have commission to dūmīs whom of them he thought good, and when soever he listed at his good pleasure.

After that the Consuls had taken musters, and were gone into their Provinces, then T. Quintus demanded to have a day of audience in the Senate concerning those affairs that he had concluded with the assistance of the ten Delegats above said: and that it would please them to confirm and establish the same by vertue of their assent and authority. Which they might do with more ease, in case they would hear the Embassadors themselves speak, who were come out of all Greece, a great part of Asia, and from the Kings. These embassies were admitted into the Senat by C. Scribonius the Pretor for the City, and all dispatched with a gracious answer. But because the dispute about Antiochus required long time of debate, therefore it was referred and put over to the ten Delegats, of whom some had been in Asia, or at Lysimachia with the King. And Quintus was commanded, that together with those said Delegats he should hear what the King his Embassadors could say, and so return unto them such an answer, as might stand with the honor and welfare of the people of Rome. The chief of this embassy from the King were Menippus and Hegesanax. Then Menippus began and said, "That he knew no such perplexed difficulty in their embassy, considering they were come simply to treat for peace, and to contract a league and alliance. For, saith he, there are three sorts of confederacies and associations, whereby States and KK. ordinarily conclude league and amity one with another. The first, when they that are vanquished in war, have conditions and articles imposed upon them: for when all is yeilded into the hands of him that is the mightier and more puissant, then it is in his power and at his discretion and will, to give unto the conquered party what he list, or to take from him as he pleaseth. The second is, when they that are equal in warlike forces give over on even hand, and be content to make peace and amity, upon indifferent and equal conditions, one with the other: in which case, demand and claim is made, restitution and amends performed according to the accord and agreement: and if in time of the wars, any have been molested and troubled in their possession, they fall to composition either by the form and tenor of ancient law, or respective to the good and profit of both parties. The third is, when they that never were enemies, meet and confer together about concluding some friendship, by way of solemn alliance and society, who neither give nor take any conditions: for that belongeth properly to Conquerors, and those that are conquered. Seeing then that Antiochus is comprised in this last kind, I marvel (qd. he) that the Romans should think or say. It is reasonable to tender articles unto him, or to prescribe and set down, what Cities of Asia they would have to be free and exempt, and which they would have to be tributary: and into what Cities they would expressly forbid the King his garrisons, or the King himself to enter and set foot. For in this wise ought they to make peace with Philip their enemy in times past, and not to draw a contract of amity and association with Antiochus, a friend at this present. To this Oration Quintus shaped his answer in this sort. "For asmuch as it pleaseth you to make your speech thus distinctly by way of division, and severally to rehearse all kinds of confederacies and accords, I also will set down as methodically in order two conditions, without which, you may let the King your master to understand, that he must not look to entertain any friendship with the people of Rome. The one is this, that if he would debar us to intermeddle with the Cities of Asia: he likewise himself have nothing to do with all Europe. The other, that if he cannot contain himself within the compass of Asia, but will needs encroach upon it, the Romans likewise may have liberty and power both to maintain those amities which they have already, and also to entertain new with the States of Asia. Hereat Hegesanax inferred and said, "That this was an indignity intolerable, and which he could not abide to hear, namely, that Antiochus should be dislaid of those Cities of Thrace and Chersonesus, which Seleucus his great grand-father had conquered with singular honor from King Lysimachus, whom he vanquished in war and slew in field, and setled the same in him as his rightful inheritance. As for the same cities possessed by the Thracians, Antiochus himself with as great praise and glory hath partly by force of arms regained out of their hands, and partly re-peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and desolat, and namely, Lysimachia it self, as all the world seeth: and more than that, hath re-edified to his exceeding charge and expence, those that lay along in their ruins, and were consumed with fire. What likenes then is there between these two demands: namely, that Antiochus should quit the possession of that which either he acquired or recovered in that sort: and that the Romans should abstain and forbear Asia, which never appertained unto them? To conclude, Antiochus saith he is desirous of the Roman friendship, but in such terms as may stand with his honor, & not purchase himself shame and reproach. Then Quintus rejoyned again in this manner: "For asmuch as qd. he, we balance and weigh things according to honesty (as in truth it is befitting the chief and principal state of the world, and so great and mighty a King to prize that only or at leastwise leastwise principally above all other regards) I would gladly know of you. Whether ye think it more honest of the Swain, either to will and wish that all the Cities of Greece whatsoever and wheresoever should enjoy liberty: or to make them homagers and tributary? If Antiochus thinketh it be an honorable thing for him to reduce into servitude and bondage as his own, those Cities which his great grand-father held by right of arms, and whereof neither his father nor grand-father afore him were in possession: the people of Rome likewise esteemeth it a material point that toucheth their faithfulness and constancy, not to forsake the Greeks, whose protection and defence they have enterprised and taken in hand. And like as they have freed Greece out of the hands of Philip, so they intend to deliver those Cities of Asia which are of Greekish race and descent, from the subjection of Antiochus. For the Greek Colonies were not sent into Eolia and Ionia, to live in servitude under the King, but to increase and multiply, that a most ancient nation might spread over the face of the whole earth. Now when as Hegefanax knew not how to shift and turn himself, and could not deny but that the cause of liberty which the Romans pretended in the title of their quarrel, was of more honesty and credit, than that other of slavery: Let's lay away all these circumstances of words (quoth P. Sulpitius, the ancientest person of all the ten Delegates) and choose ye one of the two conditions which even now were expressly offered unto you by Quintius, or else make no more talk about amity with the Romans. Then quoth Menippus, As for us, we may in no case, neither will we capitulate and covenant any thing prejudicial to the Kingdom and royal State of King Antiochus. The morrow after Quintius when he had brought all the Embassies of Greece and Asia into the Senat, that they might know what affection the people of Rome carried, and what mind Antiochus bare to the Cities of Greece, he declared before them all as well his own demands, as those of the Kings part: willing them to make report unto their own Cities, and assure them, that the people of Rome would maintain them against Antiochus (unless he departed out of Europe) with the same vertue, valour, and fidelity wherewith he had defended their liberty against Philip. Then Menippus was earnest with Quintius and the LL. of the Senat, beseeching them instantly not to proceed in haste to a decree whereby they should fet all the world in trouble and uprore; but both take leisure themselves and give respite unto the King to deliberate farther of the matter: for no doubt, upon the relating of the conditions, he would consider upon them, and either obtain somewhat at their hands, or for peace sake yeeld his consent to all. Thus was the matter wholly and entirely deferred: and agreed it was, that the same Embassadors should be addressed unto the King, who had been with him at Lyfimachia, to wit; P. Sulpitius, P. Villius, and P. Elins.

Scarcely were they gone from the City and entred upon their journey, but Embassadors arrived from Carthage, who reported, that without all doubt Antiochus made preparation for war, and therein used the hand and ministry of Annibal: in so much, as it was feared also that a third Punick war would break out withal. Annibal, as we said before, having fled his native countrey, repaired unto Antiochus, and was in great account and estimation with the King, for no other cause and policy in the world, but that the King who projected and plotted long time in his spirit to levy war upon the Romans, could find no man more fit than Annibal to break his mind unto, and with whom to discourse upon a matter of such consequence. Annibal his long and resolution was ever one and the same still, namely, To make war within Italy: and that Italy was M able to furnish a forrain enemy, with men munition and victuals. For this he cast with himself and considered, that if all were quiet there and no troubles set a foot, but that the people of Rome might with the forces and riches of Italy, furnish themselves to make war without Italy, there was no Monarch nor nation under the sun able to make head against the Romans. He demanded therefore to have the command of 100 close ships with hatch and deck, 16000 foot, and 1000 horse: and with the said fleet he would first sail into Affrick, where he assured himself that he should be able to solicit and induce the Carthaginians to rebellion: but if they held off and made it goodly and strange, yet would he settle in some part of Italy and levy war against the Romans. His advice and counsel furthermore was, that the King should with all his other forces pass into Europe, and in some one part of Greece keep his power together, and not to take the Sea, but to be ready ever to cross over; which would be sufficient to make a shew and raise a bruit all abroad of war. When he had perswaded the King to this designment and resolution, supposing that he was likewise to sound and prepare the hearts afore-hand of his own countrymen to this purpose: he durst not dispatch any letters unto them, for fear they might chance to be intercepted by the way, and so discover the whole plot. He hapned at Ephesus upon a Tyrian one Arifon, a man whose industry and dexterity he had tried in some small services wherein he had employed him. Him he plyed with gifts in hand, but fed him more with large promises of great rewards, which King Antiochus also himself seemed to make good and give his word for; and so sent him to Carthage with credence and instructions. He acquainted him with the names of all those persons with whom he was to talk and confer: he furnished him with secret tokens, whereby they might assuredly know, that he was no counterfeit, but came with a message from him. Now whiles this Arifon conversed in Carthage, the friends of Annibal knew no sooner about what errand he came, than his very enemies. At the first, much talk and discourse there was in every corner of the City, where they met, and at their feasts and merriments, of this matter: Afterwards at their council-table some stuck not to say, that the exile of Annibal was to little or no purpose, if whiles he was absent he could contrive and compass new plots, and by soliciting and tempering mens minds, disquiet

A disquiet and trouble the state of the City. There is a stranger, say they, one Ariston a Tyrian, hither come with instructions from Antibal and King Antiochus: certain men there are, that daily have privy conference with him, and devise in secret of that, which anon will break out to the utter ruin and overthrow of all. "Whereupon they all cried with one voyce to convent Ariston presently before them, and to examine him about what business he was thither arrived: and unless he would bewray & declare the matter, to send him with Embassadors of purpose, to Rome: "For why? we have (say they) felt the smart enough, and paid sufficiently for the folly and rash head of one harebrained man already. Let privat persons bear their own load hereafter, and at their own peril commit a trespass: provided alwayes, that the Common-weal be preserved cleare not only from all fault, but also from all apparance and bruit of any such intent. Ariston being

B called before them, stood stiffly upon his integrity and excused himself, and evermore used this for his best and surest defence, That he had brought no letters at all to any person: howbeit he could not render a ready & sound reason of his coming thither: but especially he was shrewdly troubled and put to his trumps when they charged him, That he had talk and communication with those only of the Barchine faction. Hereupon arose some debate and altercation in the house: whiles some were of opinion that he should be apprehended for a spie, and clapt up fast in ward: others again were of mind that there was no cause to make such a stir and tumult: for it was an evil precedent to be given, that strangers coming to their City, should be troubled and hardly intreated: and the like measure no doubt would be offered to the Carthaginians in Tyrum & in other Towns of marchandise, whereunto they use to have resort for exchange and traffique. So for that day the matter was put off. Ariston framing himself to play the crafty Carthaginian among these Cartha-

C ginians, wrote a certain bill, and in the shutting in of the evening, hung it up in the most conspicuous and publick place of all the City, even over the seat where the head Magistrate useth daily to sit: and himself about the third watch gat to shipboord and escaped. The morrow after, when the Suffetes were set on the bench to minister law, the bill aforesaid was seen, taken down, and read: wherein to this effect was written, That Ariston was not come with a message to any person in particular, but to all the Seniors or Elders in general (for so they call the Senat.) After that the thing was by this means made a publick matter, and the whole state of the Senators reputed culpable, they were not so earnest to search into privat persons. Howbeit thought good it was, that Embassadors should be sent to Rome to give information hereof to the Consuls and the Senat, and withal, to make complaint of certain wrongs done by Masanissa.

D Masanissa understanding that the Carthaginians were suspected and in some ill name among the Romans, and also at jar and variance within themselves; and namely, that the great and principal men were had in jealousy by the Senat for their conferences with Ariston: and their Senate likewise suspected by the people, by reason of that writing above-named of the said Ariston: taking this for a good advantage and opportunity to do them some injury, not only invaded their maritime parts and made spoil, but also forced certain tributary Cities to the Carthaginians for to pay himself tribute. That quarter of the countrey they call Emporia. It is the Sea coast of the lesser Syrtis, and the country is exceeding fertile: there is in it one only City named Leptis, which paid to the Carthaginians for tribute, a talent every day. All this region Masanissa then had plagued sore,

E yea, and for one part thereof he made some claim, as being litigious whether it pertained to his Kingdom, or the Seignory of the Carthaginians: and because he knew for truth, that the Carthaginian Embassadors were about to go to Rome, as well to purge themselves of some crimes where-with they were charged, as to complain of him: therefore himself also addressed his Embassadors to Rome, who should lay open more matter against them of deeper suspicion, and debate withal as touching the right of those tributes. The Carthaginians were no sooner heard speak concerning that Tyrian stranger, but the LL. of the Senat grew into some doubt lest they should wage war with Antiochus and the Carthaginians both together. And this presumption of all the rest made the suspicion most pregnant, because when they had the party among them and were purposed to send him to Rome, they neither made the man himself sure, nor the bark wherein he arrived. After this,

F they fell to debate and argue with the Kings Embassadors, about the territory and land in controversy. "The Carthaginians pleaded for themselves, and stood much upon their bounds and limits, for that the land in suit lay within that precinct, by which P. Scipio the Conqueror limited out that territory which pertained to the seignory of the Carthaginians. Also they alledged the confession of the King himself, who at what time as he pursued Spheres, that fled out of his own realm, and with a company of Numidians ranged abroad about Cyrena, made request unto them to give him leave to passe through this very ground, as if (without all question) it belonged to the Carthaginians. The Numidians answered again to these points & said plainly to their faces,

G "that they lied in their throats, as touching that supposed limitation and bounding by Scipio: "and moreover, if we would go (say they) and search the very original indeed of the law, what land at all ought the Carthaginians have of their own proper inheritance? For being but meet strangers, they had after much praier and entreaty, as much ground allowed them and no more, to build them a City in, as they could compass with thongs cut out of one bull hide: And look whatsoever they had encroached upon; without that nest and fear of theirs in Byssa, they gat and held it by force and violence. And as for the land now in strife, they are not able to prove, that they alwayes held the same in possession, no, nor that they kept it any long time together. But as occasion and opportunities served of advantage, one while they, and another while the Numidian

"Kings made reentry and enjoied it, and evermore he went away with the possession thereof. That was the stronger, and had the keener sword. In these considerations they requested the Romans to leave the thing in that state and condition, wherein it stood before that the Carthaginians were enemies, or King Masanius a friend and allie to the Romans; and not so intermeddled between, nor take a part, but let the winner wear it; and him have it that can hold it. In conclusion, it was thought good, that to the Embassadors of both parties this answer should be returned, namely: That they would send certain Commissioners into Affrick, to decide this controversy about the land in question, between the people of Carthage and the King. So there were sent of purpose, P. Scipio Africanus, C. Cornelius Cethegus, and M. Minutius Rufus. Who having heard what could be said, and seen the thing, left all hanging still in suspence and undecided, without adjudging it by their definitive sentence to the one or the other. But whether they so did, on their own head and self-accord, or by direction from the Senat, is not so certain as it seemeth agreeable unto that present time in policy, to leave them as they found them, and the controversie still depending. For unless it were so, Scipio himself alone, in regard of the knowledge that he had of the thing, and of his authority with the persons (so much bound they were unto him on both sides) might with a word of his mouth, or a nod of his head, have ended all this matter.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the five and thirtieth Book.

Publius Scipio Africanus being sent Embassador unto Antiochus, talked at Ephesus with Annibal (who had sided with Antiochus) to this end, that he might rid him of that fear which he had conceived of the people of Rome, as touching the taking away of his life. Among other matters passed between them, when he demanded of Annibal, whom he judged to have been the noblest and greatest warrior that ever was, he answered, that it was Alexander King of the Macedonians: for that he with a small power had discomfited and defeated an infinite number of armies, and withal, passed through a host far distant and remote parts of the world, unto which a man would not believe, that it were possible for any person to go and see them. When he asked again of him whom he deemed for the second: Whom, Pyrrhus (qd. he) because he taught the manner how to pitch a camp, & besides, no man had the cost to gain places and holds for advantage, nor could set his corps de guard, or plant garrisons better than he. And when he proceeded still to know whom he took to be the third, Annibal named his own good self. At which answer Scipio fell a laughing: And what would you have said then (qd. he) if your hap had been to have vanquished me? Marry then (saith he) I would have set my self before Alexander, before Pyrrhus, and before all other. Among other prodigious fights, whereof there were reported very many, it is said, that in the year wherein Cn. Domitius was Consul, an Ox spake, and said these words; Rome, look to thy self. The Romans prepare to war with Antiochus. Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, provoked by the Aetolians, who solicited both Philip and also Antiochus to wage war against the people of Rome, revolted from the Romans; and after he had levied war against Philip, then Pretor of the Achaens, was by the Aetolians slain. The Aetolians likewise abandoned the friendship of the people of Rome, with whom Antiochus King of Syria banded: who warred upon Greece, and surprised many Cities, and namely, Chalcis and Euboea among the rest. Besides, this book containeth the martial affairs in Liguria; and the preparation of Antiochus for the war.

The five and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

IN the beginning of that year wherein these affairs thus passed, Sext. Digintus Pretor in high Spain, fought battels (rather ordinary, and for number many, than otherwise memorable and worth the speaking) against those States, whereof after the departure of Cato a great sort had rebelled. And those battels for the most part were so unfortunate, that hardly he could deliver up to his successor the one half of those souldiers which he had received. And doubtless all Spain would have taken heart again, if the other Pretor, P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Cneus, had not sped better in many of his conflicts beyond Iberum. Upon which terror, no fewer than fifty good Towns revolted unto him. And these exploits performed Scipio as Pretor. Who also in quality of Propretor, encountred the Lusitans upon the way, as they returned homeward charged with a mighty great booty raised out of the base Spain, which they had utterly pillied and spoiled: where he fought from the third hour of the day unto the eight, with doubtful event. For number of souldiers he was inferior to his enemies, but for all things else he had the vantage and went beyond them. For his battailions were well appointed and close compacted of armed men, and so he charged upon the enemies marching in a long train, and the same encumbered with a deal of cattle: besides, his souldiers were fresh and in heart, whereas the other were wearied with long travel.

A yet. For the enemies set forth at the third watch, and besides their night journey, they had marched three hours also of the day, and without any repose or rest at all, they came to a conflict presently upon their travel on the way. And therefore at the beginning of the battel, so long as they were in any heart, and their strength served, they troubled and disordered the Romans with the first charge they gave; but afterwards for a while they came to be equal in fight. In which hazard of doubt in issue the Propretor vowed to set forth certain solemn games to the honour of Jupiter, in case he might discomfit the enemies, and kill them in chace. At the length the Romans advanced forward more holily, and the Lusitans retreated, yea, and anon turned their backs quite. And when as in this train of victory the Romans pursued them hard in the rout, there were of the enemies slain upon 12000, 500 and forty taken prisoners, all in manner horsemen; and of military B ensigns they carried away one hundred thirty and four. Of the Roman army seventy and three only were lost. This battel was fought not far from the City Ilipa. And thither brought P. Cornelius his victorious army, enriched with prey and pillage. Which was laid all abroad before the Town, and every man had leave given to challenge and claim his own. All the rest was given to the Treasurer for to be sold, and the money raised thereof, was parted among the souldiers.

Now had not C. Flaminius the Pretor as yet taken his leave of Rome, when these things fell out in Spain, and therefore both he and his friends talked and discoursed much upon these occurrences both good and bad: and forasmuch as a great war in his Province was broken out to a light fire, and himself was to receive from Sext. Digitius but a small remnant of an army, and the same timorous still and full of fright, as not well recovered of their former flight, he had assaied to bring C about, that the Senat would assign unto him one of the City-legions; to the end that when he had joined thereto those souldiers which himself had enrolled according to an order set down by the Senat, he might out of all that number chuse forth six thousand and five hundred footmen, and three hundred horsemen. With which legion (for in the army of Sext. Digitius he reposed small confidence) he minded to make war. The ancient Senators denied and said, That acts of the Senat were not to be made upon every flying tale and report set abroad and blazed by some particular persons in favor of Magistrats. Neither would they hold any thing for certain, but that which either the Pretors themselves wrote out of the Provinces, or Embassadors sent of purpose, related. And if there were any such commotion and trouble in Spain, they were of advice, that the Pretor should levy in haste without Italy, such tumultuary souldiers, as in that case were usually taken up. The intent and mind of the Senat was, that souldiers should in that sort be prest out in Spain. D Valerius Antias writeth, that C. Flaminius both sailed into Sicily to levy and muster men, and also as he made sail from Sicily toward Spain, was by wind and tempest put with the shore of Africk: where he found certain souldiers dispersed over the countrey, remaining of the army of P. Africanius: of whom he took a military oath to serve him in his wars: and that to these levies raised in two Provinces, he joynd also a third in Spain.

The war of the Ligurians likewise grew as fast: for they had already besieged and invested Pisa with forty thousand men: and thither resorted and flocked dayly unto them great multitudes, as well for hope of pillage, as upon the bruit and rumor that went of the war. Minutius the Consul came at the day appointed to Arretium, which was the Render-point where he had commanded all his souldiers to meet him: from whence he marched with a four-square Battailon toward Pisa. And when the enemies had removed their camp a mile from the City on the other side of the River, the Consul entered the Town, which no doubt by his coming he preserved. The next day himself also encamped on the other side of the River, almost half a mile from the enemies, from which place he made light skirmishes with them and saved the territory of his allies from the excursions and robberies of the enemies. He durst not as yet try a battail in pitched field, as having but raw and new souldiers, and those gathered out of many kinds of men, and not so well known among themselves, that one might surely trust another. The Ligurians bearing themselves bold of their numbers, not only came forth into the field ready to bid battail, and hazard all upon a throw: but having multitudes at commandment and to spare, sent out into all parts sundry companies to spoil and raine booties as far as to the marches and frontiers of the countrey. And when they had gathered together much cattail and great store of pillage, they had a strong place of defence ready at hand, well manned and guarded, by means whereof all was convoyed into their burroughs and Towns.

Thus while the Ligurians war was settled about Pisa, the other Consul L. Cornelius Merula entered Ombrina his army by the utmost confines of the Ligurians into the territory of the Boians: where the war was managed far otherwise than with the Ligurians. For the Consul entered the field in battail array, but the enemies fell off, and would not fight. In so much as the Romans seeing none to come forth and oppose themselves, ran abroad into all parts to speed their hands with pillage. And the Boians chose rather to suffer their goods to be ransacked, making no resistance, than to have the same with the hazard of a battail. The Consul when he had wrought his pleasure, and consumed all with fire and sword departed out of the territory of the enemies, and marched toward Modena securely without any regard of himself, as through a peaceable country of his friends. The Boians perceiving one that they were gone out of their limits, followed after with a still and close march, seeking some convenient place for to lay an ambush. And having in the night season passed beyond the Roman camp, they seized themselves of a straight passage within a fathoms, through which of necessity the Romans must pass, and there they forlayed them. This

This was not so closely carried, but the Consul had an inkling thereof: and therefore where as his manner was to set out in his march early in the morning, long before day light, now for fear lest the darkness of the night should increase the terror of a tumultuary skirmish, he waited for the day. And albeit the sun was up before he removed and set forward, yet he sent out a Troop of horsemen to scout and discover the quarters. And after he was advertised by these spies what number there was of enemies, and in what place they were, he commanded that all the baggage and carriage of the whole army should be bestowed in the mids, and that the Triarii should stake and pale it all about, while he with the rest of his forces marched in order of battail, and approached the enemy. The like also did the French, after they once saw that their ambush and trains were detected, and that they must of necessity fight a set pitched battail, where down right blows, clean strength, and pure valour, was to carry away the victory. Thus about the second hour of the day they affronted one another. The left wing of the horsemen of the allies and the extraordinaries fought in the vanguard, under the conduct of two Lieutenants that had been Consuls, to wit, M. Marcellus, and T. Sempronius, Consul the year before. The new Consul one while was in the front of the battail, another while at the tail to keep in the legions, left for eager desire of fight they should advance forward to the conflict before that the signal was given. As for the men of arms belonging to the legions, he commanded Quintius and P. Minutius, Marshals or Colonels, to bring them forth, and conduct them without the battail into a large plain, from whence out of the open ground they should on a suddain charge the enemies, when he gave them a signal by sound of Trumpet. Thus as he was marshalling and directing his men, there came a messenger from T. Sempronius Longus with a report, that the loose Extraordinary K souldiers aforesaid were not able to abide the violence of the Gauls: that very many of them were slain, and those that remained, partly for weariness of travail, and partly for fearful cowardice began to quail their heart of fight: and therefore if he thought so good, he should send one of the two legions to succour, before they had received farther dishonor. Whereupon the second legion was sent, and the Extraordinaries retired themselves out of the battail. Then began the conflict anew, by reason that the souldiers came in fresh and in heart, and the legion besides was compleat and fully furnished with all her companies: the left wing of horsemen aforesaid was retired out of the battail, and in lieu thereof, the right wing advanced into the fore-front. By this time the sun with extreme scorching heat, roasted and fried the bodies of the Frenchmen, which of all things can least abide heat: howbeit, standing with their ranks thick and close together, one while they L leaned one upon another: other whiles they rested and bare themselves upon their targets, and sustained the violence of the Romans. Which when the Consul perceived, he commanded C. Livius Salinator who had the conduct of the light horse in the wings, to send in the quickest horse in all his company, with sul carrier to break their ranks: and gave charge that the legionary horsemen should abide behind in the rereguard. This tempest and storm of Cavalry first shuffled and put in disaray the battail of the Gauls, and afterwards brake their ranks and files clean: yet not so, that they turned their backs: for why, their Captains and Leaders would not suffer them, laying about with their runcheons upon the backs of them that so trembled for fear, and forced them again into their ranks: but the light horsemen aforesaid riding among them would not permit them to stand to it, and keep their place. The Consul for his part encouraged and exhorted his M souldiers to stick to it awhile, for the victory was in their hands: and to charge still upon them, so long as they saw them disordered and affrighted: for if they suffered their ranks to close again they should abide another conflict, and the same perhaps doubtful and dangerous. The Ensign-bearers he commanded to advance their banners: and thus at length with putting all their power and good will together, they discomfited the enemy, and put him to flight. After they shewed their backs once and took them to their heels, running away on all sides, then the legionary horsemen were sent out after to follow the chase: fourteen thousand Boians that day were slain, a thousand and nine hundred taken prisoners alive: 221 horsemen, three of their Leaders, and of Ensigns were won 212, and chariots 63. The Romans likewise won not this victory so cleer, but it cost them some blond. For of their own souldiers and allies together, there died above five thousand, N 23 Centurions, besides four Colonels of Allies, and two Marshals of the second legion, to wit, M. Genutius, and M. Martinus.

At one and the self same time in manner, both the Consuls letters were brought to Rome. Cornelius his letters, touching the battail fought at Mutina with the Boians: but the other of Q. Minutius from Pisa, were written to this effect, That whereas by lot it belonged to him to hold the assembly for the election of new Magistrats, yet considering in how doubtful terms of hazard his affairs stood in Liguria, that he might not possibly depart from thence without the utter ruin of the allies, and hinderance of the weal publick: therefore if it might seem so good unto the LL. of the Senat, he would advise them to send unto his brother Consul, That he, who had finished his war, might return to Rome for to hold the foresaid general assembly for the election: but in case O he should think much thereof, because this charge properly appertaineth not to him: he promised them, that himself would do whatsoever the Senate should think good. But he requested them to consider and be well advised, Whether it were not more expedient for the common-weal to proceed rather to an interreign, than that he should leave the Province in that state of jeopardy. The Senat hereupon gave in charge to C. Scribonius for to send two Embassadors both of Senators calling, unto L. Cornelius the Consul, who should carry also with them unto him the

A the letters of his colleague written and sent unto the Senat: and withal, to let him understand, that unless he would come himself to Rome for the election of new Magistrates to succeed, the Senat would suffer an interreign rather than call away Q. Minutius from the war unfinished, and wherein he was wholly employed. The Embassadors that were sent, brought word back, That L. Cornelius would repair to Rome himself for the chusing of new Magistrates. As touching the letters of L. Cornelius, wherein he gave them to understand, what happy issue & success he had in the battail with the Boians; there was some reasoning and debate in the Senat-house: for M. Claudius his Lieutenant had written other letters privately to most of the Senators, to this effect: That they were much beholden and bound to give thanks unto the good fortune of the people of Rome, and the valour of the souldiers, in that they sped so well as they did: for by means of the Consul, not only there were a good number of men lost, but also the army of the enemies was escaped out of their hands, when they had fit opportunity presented unto them, of a final defeat and overthrow thereof: and that by this occasion there was a greater number of the souldiers miscarried; for that they who should have rescued and succoured those that were distressed, came too late out of the reregard: and the reason why the enemies got away and escaped was this, because the legionary horsemen had not the signal soon enough sounded unto them, and could not possibly pursue them in the chase. Therefore as concerning that point, they would not determine any thing rashly and hand over head, but the matter was referred and put over to a more frequent assembly of Senators.

A greater object there was to trouble their heads; for the City was much oppressed with usury: and albeit the avarice and covetousness of men had been well gaged and bridled by many laws concerning usury, yet there was a cautelous device and shift found out, to avoid all statutes in that behalf: to wit, that all obligations should pass in the names of allies, and be sealed unto them, who were not tied and bound to observe the laws aforesaid. By which means the creditors enwrapped their debtors in what bonds they list, and forced them to pay extream interest as they would themselves, without stint. For to see into this disorder and enormity, and to redress the same, it was thought good and order taken, to set down and limit a certain day, namely, upon which the usurers were last restrained. From which day all those allies should come in and declare and profess, what mony they had put forth upon usury to any citizens of Rome; and that the creditour should have right to recover those monies put forth from that time, according to such conditions as the debtor would himself. Hereupon, after there were discovered great sums of money and debts contracted by this fraudulent practise, M. Sempronius a Tribun of the Commons, by advice of the Senat propounded a law, and the Commons allowed it. That the same course of putting out money practised between citizen and citizen of Rome, should likewise be in force among the allies of the Latin Nation. In this sort went matters in Italy, both within the City of Rome, and also in the wars abroad.

In Spain the war was nothing so much as the bruit that ran thereof. Q. Flaminius in high Spain, won Ilucia, a Town in the Oretans countrey: after which exploit, he laid up his souldiers in their winter harbour. And in winter time there passed certain light skirmishes (not worth the naming) against the excursions of brigands and thieves, I may rather say, than enemies: and yet the fortune was variable, and not without some loss of men. As for M. Fulvius he achieved great matters: for he fought in a ranged battail with banner displayed against the Vaccæans, the Vedtones, and the Celtiberians, before the Town Toletum: where he discomfited and put to flight the army of those nations, and took prisoner alive, their King Hilernus.

Whiles these things thus passed in Spain, the day drew neer, of the solemn election of Magistrates at Rome: and therefore L. Cornelius the Consul having left M. Claudius Lieutenant in the army, came to Rome: who, after he had discoursed in the Senat-house of his own exploits, and in what estate the province stood, he complained to the LL of the Senat, that considering so great a war was brought to an end, by one battail so fortunately and happily fought, there was no solemnity to the honour of the Gods, performed in that behalf. Over and besides, he demanded, That they would decree a procession and triumph withal. But before the Senators were to deliver their opinions to this demand, Q. Metellus, who had been Consul and Dictator, rose up and said, That there had been letters brought at one and the same time; both from the Consul Cornelius to the Senat, and also from M. Marcellus to a great many of the Senators, and those letters importing contraries: whereupon the consultation of that matter had been deferred and put off to the end that it might be argued and debated in the presence of them both, who wrote the letters: and therefore I ever looked (quoth he) that the Consul (knowing especially that his Lieutenant had written and informed somewhat against him, and considering that himself was to repair to Rome) would have brought him also with him: seeing that it had been more meet and befitting him to have delivered the army to T. Sempronius, one that was in the commission and had a command, than to a Lieutenant. But it should seem now, that he was left behind far enough off of every purpose, for fear he would avow and justify personally his hand-writing, and charge him self to face: and that if the Consul should make report of any untruth, he might be challenged therefore, and the thing sifted and canvased, until the truth appeared clearly and came to light: and therefore my opinion is (quoth he) that nothing be determined at this present, as touching the demands of the Consul. But when as he persisted notwithstanding, and followed the suit still, namely, that they would ordain a solemn procession, and that himself might enter the

the City, riding in triumph: then Marcus and C. Titinius, both Tribuns of the Commons, interposed, that they would interpose their negative, and cancel the order of the Senat in that behalf.

The Censors for that time, were Sex. Aelius Patrus and C. Cornelius Cethegus, created the year before. Cornelius took a review of the City and numbred the people; and there were accounted by his survey 143704 polls of Citizens. Great floods arose that year, and Tyber overflowed all the flats and plain places of the City: and about the gate Flumentana certain houses and buildings were overthrown withal, and laid along. The gate Calimontana besides, was stricken with lightning, and the wall about it was likewise blasted from heaven. At Aricia, Lanuvium, and in mount Aventin, it rained stones. And reported it was from Capua, that a great swarm of Wasps came flying into the market place, and settled upon the Temple of Mars; which being with great care taken up and gathered together, were afterward consumed with fire. In regard of these prodigious tokens, order was given, that the Decemvirs should search and peruse the books of Sibylla; whereupon a novendial sacrifice (to continue nine dayes) was appointed, a publick procession solemnized, and the City was cleansed and hallowed. About the same time M. Porcius Cato, dedicated the Chappel of Virgin Victory, near to the Temple of the Goddess Victory, two years after that he had vowed it. In that year also the Triumvirs, C. Manlius Vulso, L. Apustius Fullo, and P. Aelius Tubero, (who had preferred a bill of request about the planting of a Colony) had commission granted, to conduct a Colony of Latins into the countrey of Thurinum; and thither went three thousand footmen and three hundred horsemen; a small number in comparison of the largeness and quantity of the territory. There might well have been set out thirty acres for every footman, and threescore for an horseman: but by the motion and advice of Apustius, one third part of the Lands was excepted and reserved, to the end, that afterwards in time, they might enrol new Coloners if it pleased them. And therefore the footmen had twenty acres, and the horsemen forty apeece.

Now approached the end of the year, and more ambition there was, and hotter suit for place of dignity in the election of Consuls, than ever had been known any time before. Many mighty men, as well of the Patritii and nobles, as the Commoners, stood and laboured hard for the Consulship, to wit, P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Cneus, who lately was departed out of Spain after he had achieved many worthy deeds. L. Quintius Flaminius who had been Admiral of the navy in Greece, and Cn. Manlius Vulso, all of the Nobility. But of the Commons were C. Laelius, Cn. Domitius, C. Livius Salinator, and M. Atilius. But all mens eyes were fixed upon Quintius and Cornelius. For they desired one place, being both of them nobly descended, and their fresh glory for feats of war, recommended both the one and the other. But above all other things, the brethren of these competitors, two most renowned warriors of their time, set the debate on a light fire. The glory of Scipio, as it was the greater of the twain, so it was more subject to envy. The honour of Quintius was more fresh, as who that year had newly triumphed. Over and besides, the one of them had been now almost ten years continually conversant in the eyes of men (a thing that maketh great men not so highly regarded, by reason that they are grown stale, and the world is full already of them) also he had been twice Consul, and Censor since he vanquished Annibal. But in Quintius all was fresh and new, to win the good grace and favor of men. And more than that, he neither after his triumph had obtained ought of the people, nor, to say a truth, requested any thing. He alledged, that he made suit for his own natural and whole brother by both sides, and not for a Confin German; in the behalf of a very companion and partaker with him in the managing of the war (for as himself served by Land, so his brother performed many exploits by sea.) So he obtained, that Quintius should be preferred before his competitor, whom Africanus and his brother [Asiaticus] brought in and graced, whom the whole race of Cornelii seemed to countenance, even then when a Cornelius, Consul, was president of the election and held the assembly; whom the Senat had given so grave a testimony of, in adjudging him to be the best man simply in all the City, and thought most worthy to receive the goddess Idaea, coming from Peisinnus to the City of Rome. Thus were L. Quintius, and Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus created Consuls, in such sort, that Africanus was of no credit, and bare no stroke at all (ye may be sure) in the election of a Consul out of the third estate of Commons, albeit he employed himself, and did his best for C. Laelius. The next day after were the Pretors elected namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Fulvius Crassus, A. Atilius Serranus, M. Papius Mamilianus, L. Valerius Tappus, and Q. Salinius Sarrus. In this year M. Emilius Lepidus and L. Emilius Paulus, the Censors, bare themselves so in their office, as they made their year to be notable and much spoken of. They condemned and fined many of the City graziers or farmers of the common pastures: and of that money which arose of their amercements, were certain gilded shields made, which were set up on the finial or lantern of Jupiter's Temple. They made one terrace or gallery without the gate Trigemina, with a marchants Hall or Bursé adjoined thereto, near Tyber: and another from the gate Fontinalis they built in length as far as to the Altar of Mars, leading to Mars field.

For a long time nothing was done in Liguria worth the remembrance. But about the end of the year twice were the Romans in great jeopardy: for both the camp of the Consul was assailed and hardly defended, and also not long after, as the Roman host marched through a streight pass, the army of the Ligurians kept the very gullet of the passage, and the Consul seeing he could not make way through, turned his ensigns, and began to retire the same way he came: but by that time, some of the enemies had gained also the back part of the pass, inasmuch as the lamentable

A lamentable remembrance of the Candine overthrow, not only presented it self to their spirit and mind, but also was in manner an object to their eye. Now had he amongst his auxiliary or aid-forces, to the number almost of eight hundred horse. Whose Captain promised the Consul, that he and his would breakthrough whither way he would, let him only buttell him which of the two quarters were better peopled and inhabited: for the first thing that he did, he would fire their Villages and houses: to the end, that the fear and fright thereof might force the Ligurians to depart out of the chafe which they held and befer, and run to succour their own neighbours. The Consul commended him highly, and fed him with hope of large rewards. Whereupon the Numidians mounted on horseback, and began to ride about the corps de guard of the enemies, without offering to charge upon any man. At the first, a man that had seen them, would have thought nothing more contemptible, being both men and horse, little, spare and gaunt. The horseman unarmed and without weapon, save that he carrieth about him some light darts: the horses without bridles, and as they ran shutting out their stiff necks, and bearing their heads forward without any reining at all, they made a very ill favoured sight. And the riders, for to make themselves more despised, would on purpose seem to take fells from their horses, and made their enemies good sport. Whereupon they (who if at first they had been assailed, would have been heedful & ready to have received the charge) now sat still (many of them unarmed) to behold this pleasant pastime. The Numidians would gallop toward them and presently ride back again, but so, as by little and little they gained ground, and advanced neerer to the pals, yet making semblance, as if they had had no rule of their horses, but were carried thither against their wils. At the last, they set spurs to their horses indeed, and brake through the mids of the enemies guards: and so soon as they had recovered the open ground, they set on fire all the houses near the high way side, and so forward they burnt the next village they came unto, and destroyed all afore them with fire and sword. First, the sinoak that was decried, afterwards, the outcry heard of them that were affrighted in the villages, and last of all, the children and old folk that fled to save themselves, made a trouble and hurlyburly in the camp: inso much, as every man of himself without advice, without warrant or direction, made what hast he could to run and save his own. Thus in the turning of an hand, the camp was abandoned, and the Consul delivered from siege, arrived thither where he intended.

But neither Boians nor Spaniards (with whom that year the Romans made war) were so spitefully and maliciously bent against them, as the whole nation of the Aetolians. They at the very first were in very good hope, that presently upon the remove of the forces out of Greece, Antiochus would have entred Europe, and seized upon the vacant possession thereof: and that neither Philip nor Nabis would be in rest and do nothing. But seeing them not to stir in any place, they thought it high time to make some trouble and confusion themselves, for fear lest by delays and lingering, all their designments would turn to nothing: and therefore they published a Diet or Council to be holden at Naupectum. In which assembly Thodas their Pretor, after he had made grievous complaint of the wrongs received by the Romans, moving and solliciting the state of Bullia (for that they of all other nations and Cities of Greece, were least honoured and set by after that victory, whereof they had been the cause) gave his advice, That there should be Embassadors sent to all the neighbour Kings, not only to found their minds and affections, but also to incite and prick them every one forward to enter into arms against the Romans. So Damocritus was addressed to Nabis, Nicander to Philip, and Dicaarchus the brother of the Pretor unto Antiochus. Damocritus had in commission to signify unto the tyrant of Lacedamon, "That by the loss of his maritime Cities, the very sinews and sinews of his tyranny and Kingdom were cut in sunder: "For from thence was he furnished with soldiers, from thence had he his ships and servitors at "Sea: whereas now, he might see the Achazans LL. and rulers of Peloponnesus, whilst himself was "plined up and enclosed within his wals, and never should he have opportunity to recover himself: if he let pass this that presently was offered unto him. No Roman army was now in Greece: "and never would the Romans think it sufficient cause, to pass over the Seas with their legions "into Greece, for any occasion of Gythium or other Laconians inhabiting the Sea-coasts. These reasons were laid forth to incense the courage of the tyrant, to the end, that when Antiochus was once passed over into Greece, he being touched in conscience, that he had broken the Roman league, by committing outrage upon their allies, might of necessity join and band with Antiochus.

Suchlike remonstrances and reasons used, Nicander for to provoke and perswade Philip: and much more matter he had to enforce that point, as the King was deposed from much higher degree of estate than the tyrant had been, and also had sustained far greater losses. To this, he alleged the ancient name and renown of the KK. of Macedany; and how that nation had overrun the whole world and filled all places with their noble conquests & victories. Moreover he said, That he advised him to take a course, which was safe both to be enterprised, and also easy to be executed. For he gave not Philip counsel to stir, before that Antiochus were passed over with an army into Greece: and considering that he without the aid of Antiochus had maintained war so long against the Romans and Aetolians, what possible means had the Romans to withstand him assisted with Antiochus & the Aetolians his allies, who even then were fiercer enemies than the Romans? Over and besides, he inferred this reason also, what a brave and doughty Captain Antiochus was, a man even born to be an enemy to the Romans, and who had slain already more leaders and soldiers of theirs than were left behind. These were the allegations of Nicander to Philip. As for Dicaarchus, he had other motives to perswade with Antiochus. First, and principally pally above all others, he affirmed, "That howsoever the prize and booty of Philipp fell to the Romans, the victory was gained and achieved by the Ætolians; and none but they either gave the Romans entrance and passage into Greece, or furnished them with forces for the performance and accomplishment of the victory. Then he shewed and made promise what power as well of foot as horse they would present unto Antiochus toward his wars; what places they would give him for his land-forces, and what havens and harbours for his strength and army at Sea. After all this he stuck not (to serve his own turn) for to over-reach and tell a loud he as touching Philipp and Nabis, in giving out confidently that they were both of them ready and at the point to renew war: and would take the vantage of the very first opportunity and occasion that could be preferred; to recover those things which by war they had lost. Thus the Ætolians laboured to set all the world at once upon the top of the Romans. Howbeit, the R.K. were either not moved at all with their soliciting, or bestirred them more slowly than they looked for. But as for Nabis, he sent immediately about all the Towns by the Sea side, certain persons of purpose to sow discord and kindle seditions among them: and some of their principal citizens he won by gifts and presents to his own purpose and designs: but such as stiffly continued fast and firm in alliance and allegiance with the Romans, those he made away and murdered. Now had T. Quintus given in charge and commission to the Acheans, for to guard all the Laconians that dwelt upon the Sea-coasts: and therefore presently they both dispatched their Embassadors unto the Tyrant, to put him in mind of the confederacy and association with the Romans; and to warn him and give him advertisement, that in no wise he would trouble that peace, which he had so earnestly craved and sought for: and also sent aid unto Gythium, which now the tyrant began to assault: yea, and addressed other Embassadors also to Rome to give intelligence of these occurrences.

Antiochus the King after he had that winter time given his daughter in marriage to Pithonius the King of Egypt at Raphia a City in Phœnicia, retired to Antiochia; and in the very end of the same winter, passed through Cilicia over the mountain Taurus, and came to Ephesus. And from thence in the beginning of the Spring, after he had sent his son Antiochus into Syria for to defend and keep in obedience the utmost frontiers of his Kingdom, left in his absence there might arise some troubles behind his back, he marched with all his Land-forces against the Pisidians, who inhabit about Sela.

At the same time the Romans Embassadors P. Sulpicius and P. Villius, who as we said before had been sent unto Antiochus with direction, first to visit K. Eumenes, arrived at Ephesus, and from thence went up to Pergamus, where Eumenes kept his royal court; Eumenes was desirous in his heart that Antiochus should be warred upon: supposing verily, that if he were at peace, being a Prince so much mightier than himself, he would be but an ill and dangerous neighbour, so near unto him: but if war were once afoot, that he would be no more able to beard and match the Romans than Philipp had been: and that either he should wholly be overthrown, and come to utter ruin; or if being vanquished he had peace given unto him by the Romans; then, as he lost much thereby and would be weaker, so himself should gain by the bargain, and grow mightier; that afterwards he might be able easily of himself to make his part good, and hold his own against him, without the help and aid of the Romans: or if any misfortune should happen unto him, he were better by far, to hazard any fortune whatsoever in the Roman society, than either alone to endure the Lordly dominion of Antiochus and be subject, or in refusing to obey, be compelled thereto by force and arms. For these causes he employed all the credit and authority he had, yea, and addressed all counsel that he could devise for to prick on and set forward the Romans in this war. Sulpicius remained behind sick at Pergamus, but Villius advertised that the King was occupied and busied in the Pisidian war went to Ephesus: and while he abode there some few dayes, he endeavored and made means to have conference oftentimes with Antiochus, who haply at that time sojournd there, both to sound his mind if possibly he could, and also to secure him of all fear from the Romans. In these meetings and communications, no other thing passed nor was done between them, but see what ensued hereupon of it self, as if it had been a thing wrought and compassed of men's policy. Antiochus by this means was less set by and in smaller credit with the King, yea, and in all matters began to be more and more suspected and had in jealousy. Claudius (the Historian) who followeth the Greek books of Attilius, writeth that P. Africanus was joynd in that embassage, and that he talked and devised with Antiochus at Ephesus: and namely, maketh report of one conference and speech between them twain, and that is this. Africanus demanded of Antiochus, whom in his judgment, he took to have been the greatest commander for feats of arms, that ever was: to which he made answer, that he judged Alexander the King of the Macedonians was simply the most excellent warrior: in this regard, that he with a small power had defeated innumerable armies; and besides had passed as far as to the utmost bounds of the whole earth, even to those lands, that a man would think incredible for any one to reach unto. And when he asked again whom he deemed worthy to stand in the second place, he answered, that Pyrrius was the man; for that he first taught how to pitch a camp, and above all other points of military skill, no man knew better to choose out commodious ground and places of advantage, or more cunningly to plant and dispose garrisons: besides, he had such a might and dexterity to draw and win men unto him, that the Italian nations had rather have been subject to him a foreign Prince, than to live under the people of Rome, notwithstanding they had of long time the sovereignty and rule of those parts. And

A when he proceeded still to know whom he meant for the third he made no sticking at the matter but named himself. Whereupon Scipio took up a long staff and replied again: What would you say then if your hap had been to have imbrued me? May then, quoth he, I would think I were worthy to be set before Alexander, before Darius, yea, and before all other martial men and commanders in the whole world. At this answer, Scipio took delight and pleasure, so for how subtilly and counselously he had like a cunning Carthaginian, couched his words in a certain kind of flattery, as if he had soughtred him from out of the range and task of all other Captains as being by many degrees incomparable, and far above all others. Then Kilius went forward from Thessaly to Apamea, and thither Antiochus also repaired farto meet him, hearing of the coming of Roman legats, for his communication and conference at Apamea, the matter was debated much after the same sort, as it had been at Rome between Quintus and the Kings Embassadors. But the news of Antiochus the Kings son his death, whom I said a little before to have been sent into Syria brake off this peace. Great mourning and sorrow there was in the Kings Court, and much was that young Prince wept and moaned, for, that good proof he had given of himself, that if he had lived any long time, he would have proved by all likelihood of his towardsness, a great, a mighty, and a righteous King. The docters and better beloved he was of all men, the more suspicious was his death, and namely, that his father doubting that he would press forward and be instant to increase him in his old age, took order by the ministry of certain Eunuchs or guided men (persons greatly accepted with Kings for such services) to have him poisoned. And they say, that another cause also set him forward to commit this secret act, because having given the City Asmachia to his son Selenus, he had no such place to bestow upon Antiochus his son, for to keep his residence in, whereinto he might have removed him farther off from his own person, under colour of doing him honor. Howbeit, great semblance and shew there was of much mourning and lamentation all over the court for certain dayes: insomuch as the Roman Embassador retired himself to Ephesus, because he was loth to converse there natively, at so unreasonable a time. The King returned to Ephesus and gave over the war that he had enterprized. Where, the courtiers being thus by occasion of the mourning time, he devised and consulted in great secret with one Mina, an old friend unto him, and whom of all other he loved best and trusted most. This Mina is more strange and strange ignorant in foreign affairs and forces, measuring and esteeming the power, and greatness of the King by his exploits done in Syria or in Asia, deemed verily, that Antiochus had not only the better cause in that the Romans demanded unreasonable conditions, but also should have the upper hand in the tryal thereof by war. When as now the King refused to have any conference and dispute with the Embassadors, either for that he knew by good experience, that it would be harmful for him so to do, or because he was troubled in spirit upon this late and fresh object of grief and sorrow: Mina undertook the business, and professed that he would speak to the point of the matter and to good purpose: and so perswaded the King to send for the Embassadors from Perjanus. By this time Sulpicius was recovered of his sickness, and therefore both of them repaired to Ephesus: where Mina excused the King, and in his absence they began to treat about their affairs. Then Mina with a premeditated oration began in this wise, "I see well (qd. he) that you Romans pretend unto the world a goodly title of setting free the Cities of Greece, but your deeds are not answerable to your words: and ye have set down unto Antiochus one manner of law to be tied unto, and practise your selves another. For how cometh it about that the Smyrneans and Lampfacens should be Greeks, more than the Neapolitans, the Rhegins, and Tarentins, of whom you exact tribute and require ships by virtue of the accord and covenant betwixt you? Why send you yearly to Syracus and other Greek Cities of Sicily, a Prefor in foreign authority, with his rods and axes? Certainly, ye have nothing else to say, but that ye have subdued them in war, and by right of conquest have imposed these conditions upon them. The like, ye and the same cause know ye that Antiochus alledgeth as concerning Smyrna, Lampfacus, and other Cities and Rates of Ionia and Ælia. For having been conquered in war by his ancestors and progenitors, having I say been made tributary and liable to impositions, he challenge length of them the ancient rights and duties due from them, and to him belonging. And therefore if ye will debate and treat the question according to equity and reason and not rather pick quarrels and seek occasions of war. I would gladly know what ye will answer to him in this point? To this Sulpicius made answer in this wise, "Antiochus (qd. he) hath done very well and with good regard of modesty, in that having no other matters to plead unto for his defence and the maintenance of his cause, he hath made choice of any other rather than himself to be the speaker. For what one thing is there alike in those cities which you have named and put in comparison? Of the Rhegins, Neapolitans and Tarentins, we demand that which is our due according to the deeds of covenants indentured, and hath ever been since time that first they were in subjection under us: that I say which we have challenged and enjoyed by virtue of one continued course and trend of right, by us ever practised without any intermission or interruption. And are you able to avouch, that as those nations neither by themselves nor by any other, have altered and changed the accord between us and them, so the Cities of Asia, when they once became subjects to the ancestors of Antiochus, remained alwayes in the perpetual possession of your Kingdom? And not rather, that some of them have been under the obedience of Philip & others obedient to Ptolemaus? Yea, and divers of them for many years have been free & used their own liberties without contradiction, and no words of doubt made hereof? For admit this once, that that (because these Cities sometime were in bondage through the iniquity of those times wherein they were oppressed) there shall be a right pretended, and the time be effected to reduce them again after so many ages into servitude? What wanteth it but yet may as well say that we have done just nothing, in delivering Greece out of the hands of Philip, and that his successors and posterity may thin again and lay title to Corinth, Chalcis, Demetrias, and the whole Thessalian nation? But what mean I to maintain the cause of the Cities of Greece, whom it were more meet and reasonable that both we and the King himself would give audience unto; and let them plead what they can for their own selves? With that he commanded the embassages of the Cities to be called in, which were prepared and instructed aforehand by Eumenes, who made this reckoning, that whatsoever strength went from Antiochus, should accrue and come unto him and his Kingdom. Many were admitted to speak: and whiles every one set forward his own cause, I some by way of complains, others in manner of demand, each one putting in for himself without regard of right or wrong, so he served his own turn, they fell at length from reasoning to wrangling and wrangling in so much, as the Embassadors returned to Rome as uncertain and doubtful in all matters as they were when they came, without releasing or obtaining any one thing at all.

 When they were dismissed and gone, the King held a Council as touching the Roman war. In which assembly some delivered their opinion more freely and stoutly than others: but generally the more bitter speech that any one used against the Romans, the greater hope he had to enter into special grace and favour with the King. One above the rest inveighed much and spoke against those proud and insolent demands of the Romans, who imposed hard laws and conditions upon Antiochus, the mightiest King of all Asia as if he had been no better than Nabus, whom they had conquered and subdued. And yet (saith he) they left unto Nabus some signory and dominion in his own countrey and City of Lacedemon: whereas if Lampiscus and Smyrna should bear the command of Antiochus, they deemed that an unworthy thing and a very indignity. Others opined and said, that those two Cities were but small causes, and not worth the naming, for so puissant a Prince to stand upon and to wif for. But alwayes (say they) men begin with just and reasonable demands, to make an overture and way to compais and obtain that which is unjust. Unless one would believe, that when the Persians requested of the Lacedemonians, water and earth, they stood in need of a dot & turn of ground, or draught of water. In like sort for all the world the Romans do but sound and try the King, in their demands touching these two Cities. For other Cities likewise, so soon as they shall perceive that those two have shaken off the yoke of obedience, will soon revolt and turn to that people which is their deliverer, and as whole hands hope for liberty. And say that freedom were not to them more dear and precious than bondage yet it is the nature of every man to feed and please himself with a bare hope of change and new world much more than with the assured hold of any present state whatsoever. There was in place at this council, Alexander of Acarnania, one who sometime had friended Philip, but of late dayes was fallen from him and followed the court of Antiochus, a more wealthy and magnificent Prince: and being taken for a politician who had a special insight into the state of Greece, was not ignorant of the affairs of Rome, had wound himself into high favour and inward friendship with the King, that he was taken in to be one of his privy council, and acquainted with all his secrets. This man, as if the question in hand had been, not, Whether war should be levied or no; but, Where, and by What means, and How it should be managed, spake aloud & said, That he made full reckoning and account in his very spirit and heart of the victory, in case the King would pass the Seas over into Europe, to plant & settle himself in some part of Greece, and there wage war: for as his very first coming he should see in arms already the Aetolians, that inhabit the very heart and centre of Greece, who would be the only Captains and port-ensigns to march before them, ready to venture and enter upon the most difficult and dangerous enterprises of war. Again, in the two cantons and angles as it were thereof, he should find Nabus of the one side from Peloponnesus, at hand to rise and raise those quarters, with intent to regain the City of the Argives, to win again the maritime Cities, which the Romans have disseized & dispossessed him of, and have mued and shut him within the walls of Lacedemon. On the other side from Macedonia, Philip would no doubt take arms, so soon as he shall hear the first alarm and sound of trumpet. Full well (quod he) know I his courage, and of what spirit and stomack he is right well I wot that he hath fostered in that brest of his for a long time, anger and despite, like to these wild and savage beasts, which either are kept within iron gates, or fast tyed and bound: and is well I remember, how many a time he was wont (during the wars) to pray heartily to all the Gods, to vouchsafe for to give him Antiochus for his helper and assistant: and if now he might enjoy his wish, and have the thing so long desired and prayed for he would without any delay, enter into arms and war incontinently. Only (quod Alexander) we must not linger and stay nor drive off, for as much as herein consisteth the very point of victory, even betimes to seize upon commoditious places of advantage, before the enemies be possessed of them. Also with all speed, Antiochus is to be sent into Affrick, whereby the Romans may be distracted, and compelled to turn themselves sundry wayes. Antiochus only was not called to this council: for by reason of the foresaid conferences with Villius, the King had him in some jealousy, and therefore he was out of favour, and of no credit and account with him. At the first, he put up this disgrace and made no words, but afterwards he thought it better course, both to demand the cause of so sudden strangeness and alienation of his, and also to take some good time to extul and purge himself. And therefore upon

A upon a day having simply asked of the King, and heard the cause of his anger toward him: "My father Amilcar (qd. he) O Antiochus, when upon a time he sacrificed unto the Gods, caused me (a very little one) to be brought and presented before the Altar, where he forced me to touch the same with my hand, and to take an oath; Never to be friend unto the people of Rome. To accomplish and fulfill this oath, I maintained the wars for the space of six and thirty years by virtue of this oath; in time of peace I was driven out of my native country; and being fled from thence, this oath brought me into your court: and by the guidance and direction of this oath, if you should disappoint me of my hope, yet whatsoever I know there are forces, wheresoever I hear there is any stirring and rustling of arms, I shall seek all the world over, until I find some Roman enemies. And therefore, if there be any of your Courtiers that have a mind and desire to advance themselves in your good grace, and would grow by carrying tales and accusing me unto you, let them find some other subject and matter to do this by me: for I hate the Romans, and am likewise hated of them. That this is truth which I say, my father Amilcar and the Gods in heaven, can testify. Wherefore, whensoever you shall think to make war with the Romans, see you entertain Annibal for one of your greatest and most assured friends: but if any occurrence shall force you to peace, seek some other counsellor and not me, to consult withal about that point. This speech was so effectual, that not only it prevailed with the King, but also reconciled Annibal unto his grace. And so they departed out of the council with a full resolution to make war.

At Rome it was commonly talked and discoursed, that Antiochus was an enemy, but no provision and preparation there was for war, but only whetting the edge of their stomachs. For both Consuls had no other Province but Italy assigned unto them to govern. And they were either to agree between themselves, or else to cast lots, whether of the two should hold the general assembly, and be president of the election for that year. And he whose hap was not to be charged with that business, was to be in readiness to lead forth the legions into any place out of Italy, as need should require. And to this Consul it was permitted to enrol two new legions of Citizens, and besides of allies and Latins 20000 foot, and 800 horse. To the other Consul were appointed those two legions, which L. Cornelius the Consul of the former year had under his governance: also of allies and Latins 15000 footmen out of the same army, and 500 horse. As for Q. Minutius, his commission was continued still for the conduct of that army which he had in Liguria. And for to supply and make up the broken companies, he was allowed to enrol 4000 Roman footmen, and 150 horse, and likewise to levy of the allies 5000 foot, and 250 horse for that service. To Cr. Domitius it fell by lot, that he should go with a power out of Italy, whither soever the Senate gave order; and unto Quintius to govern Gaul. Then the Pretors election followed, who likewise cast lots for their Provinces. M. Fulvius Centimalus had the civil jurisdiction, and L. Scribonius Libo the forrain, L. Valerius Tappus governed Sicily, Q. Salinius Sarrus, Sardinia: M. Babinus Tamphilus high Spain, and A. Atilius Serranus the baile. But these two changed their Provinces, first by an order from the Senate, and afterwards by an act also of the Commons. For to Atilius Macedony was assigned and the navy, and to Babinus the countrey of the Brutii. Flaminius and Fulvius continued in the government and command of Spain, and to Babinus Tamphilus for the rule of the Brutii, were those two legions appointed which the year before lay in the City, with commission to take up and levy of allies fifteen thousand foot, and five hundred horse to go thither. Aulus Atilius had in charge to cause thirty galleaces to be made with five banks of oars on a side, and to take out of the harbors and docks as many old vessels as were fit for service, and to enrol mariners and rowers. The Consuls also were enjoined to deliver unto him two thousand allies of the Latin nation, and a thousand Roman footmen. It was commonly voyced, that these two Pretors with two armies both by Land and at Sea, were prepared against Nabis, who openly now assailed the confederats of the people of Rome. But still the Embassadors were looked for, who had been sent unto King Antiochus, and the Senat commanded the Consul Domitius not to depart from the City before their return. The Pretors, Fulvius and Scribonius, whose charge it was to minister law and execute justice in Rome, had commission to provide a hundred galleaces, besides that fleet which Atilius was to command. But before that either Consuls or Pretors went forth into their Provinces, there was a procession holden, in regard of the prodigies and fearful sights that were reported. For word was brought out of Picenum, that a she-goat had yeared six kids at once, and that it rained earth at Anternum; and at Formia, that a gate and wall of the City were smitten with lightning; and (that which most of all troubled and frightened the Consul Domitius) that an Ox spake these words, Rome, take heed to thy self. In regard of the other prodigious tokens, there was a supplication holden: but as for the Ox, the Sooth-sayers and bowel-priests gave commandment, that he should with great care be kept and nourished. The Tiber also with more violence overflowed into the City than in the former year, and overthrowed two bridges and many buildings, especially about the gate Flumentina. Moreover, a mighty huge stone shaken out of the Capitol cliff, fell from thence into the street called Ingarium, either by the force and violence of rain, or some earthquake (which if there were any, was so little, that it could not be perceived) and that stone killed many a man. In the countrey also, by reason of this deluge, much cattle was carried away with the flood, and many farm houses and granges were broken down and laid along.

Before that L. Quintius the Consul was arrived into his Province, Q. Minutius fought a battell with the Ligurians in the territory of Vifa, and slew nine thousand enemies: the rest he dispersed, confited, put to flight and chased into their camps which being assailed, was defended manfully with much fighting until dark night: and then the Ligurians slip away in the night (as on secretly. And by the dawning of the next day the Romans entered and seized thereof when it was empty of the enemies. Less pillage was there found, for that ever and anon what booties soever they got in the country they sent home to their houses. Minutius notwithstanding gave the enemies no repose from that time forward. For being departed out of the territory of Elis he came into Liguria, where he destroyed their boroughs and Castles, and put all to fire and sword. There the Roman souldiers filled their hands with the Tuscan prizes, sent thither by the foragers and robbers.

Much about this time the Embassadors returned to Rome, from the KK, who brought word and made relation of nothing that was sufficient to enforce them to proceed in any haste to war, but only against the Lacedæmonian tyrant, by whom (as the Achæan Embassadors also gave intelligence) the Sea coasts of Lacodia were wronged and assailed, against the covenants of the league. Whereupon Attilius the Pretor was sent with a fleet to defend the associates. And forasmuch as there was no imminent peril from Antiochus, it was thought good, that both the Consuls should go into their Provinces. Domitius took his journey, and went the nearest way by Ariminum, and Quintus came into the Boians country by the way of Liguria. And these two Consuls armies in divers quarters, wasted all abroad the enemies country. At the first some few of their Gentlemen and Horsemen, together with their Captains; afterwards, all those of Senators calling; and last of all, as many as were of any repute, worth and worship, to the number of fifteen hundred fled to the Consul.

Likewise in both *Spain*s that year the affairs went prosperously: for not only C. Flaminius won by force of mantelets and engins of battery the rich and strong Town Litabrum, and took prisoner alive their Lord Corribila a noble Prince, but also M. Fulvius the Pro-consul fought with two armies of the enemies twice, and put them to the worse; and won by assault two Towns of the Spaniards Veseltia and Holone, with many other fortresses: the rest of themselves revolted unto him. After this he made a journey into the Orétans country, & there having gotten two towns, Nalika and Cusibi, he set forward and marched to the river Tagus, where that quarter there stood Taletum, a small City but strongly feared: while he assaulted it, there came a mighty army of the Vestons to aid the Toletans, with whom he fought a set field, and won the day, and having defeated the Vestons, he forced the Toletans with engins of battery, and won the Town.

But all the wars which at that time were in hand, nothing troubled the LL of the Senate so much as the expectation of the war, which Antiochus had not yet begun and enterprised. For albeit they had ever and anon certain advertilements and intelligences of all things by their Embassadors, yet many flying tales and headless bruits there went without any certain Authors, reporting lies as well as truths. And among the rest there ran a rumor, that Antiochus, so soon as he was come into Ætolia, would presently put over a fleet into Sicily. Whereupon the Senate, notwithstanding they had sent Attilius the Pretor with a fleet into Greece, yet forasmuch as there was need not of forces only, but also of authority to entertain the hearts and affections of their allies, they sent over T. Quintus, Cn. Octavius, Cn. Servilius, and P. Villius, as Embassadors into Greece, and gave order that M. Pabius should advance his legions out of the country of the Brutians, toward Tarentum and Brundisium, that from thence if need required, he might sail over into Macedonia. Moreover, That M. Fulvius the Pretor should put out a fleet of thirty sail, for the defence of the coast of Sicily and that the Admiral thereof should have full commission there to command (now L. Oppius Saliator, who the former year had been one of the Ediles of the Commons, had the conduct of those ships.) Also, that the same Pretor should address his letters unto L. Valerius his Colleague, and advertiled him that it was to be feared, that the armado of King Antiochus would cross over out of Ætolia into Sicily; and therefore it was the will and pleasure of the Senate, that he should take up and enrol into that army which he had already, of tumultuary souldiers 12000 footmen, and 400 horse, by whose means he might defend that coast of the Province which looketh toward Creece. For the levy of these forces, the Pretor took musters not only in Sicily, but also in the Isles adjacent and lying thereabout, and fortified with good garrisons all the Towns upon the Sea side which lie toward Greece. Those rumours aforesaid were fed still and maintained by the coming of Attalus the brother of Eumenes, who reported that King Antiochus was passed over Hell Spontus with an army: and that the Ætolians were in that forwardness, that they would be prest and ready in arms against his arrival. Great thanks were given as well to Eumenes in his absence, as to Attalus there present in place. Also order was taken, that he should have a lodging allowed him at his pleasure, and his charges born for his diet and house-keeping. Moreover, there were given him as presents, two great horses of service, two pair of horsemens armors, as much silver plate as amounted to an hundred pound weight; and of gold plate, as much as weighed 20 pound.

And forasmuch as messengers one after another advertiled and gave warning, that war was at hand, it was thought requisite and expedient, that the new Consuls should be chosen in all convenient speed: whereupon a decree passed from the Senate, that M. Fulvius the Pretor should forthwith dispatch his letters unto the Consul, to certifie him of the Senats pleasure, namely, that he should commit the government of his Province and the army unto his Lieutenants, and return himself unto Rome, and in his way send out his writs aforehand for the publishing of an assembly general

A general for the election of Consuls. The Consul obeyed these letters, directed forth his summons in manner aforesaid, and came to Rome. In this year also great ambition there was, and much suit for the dignity of government. For that three noblemen stood for one place, namely, P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Cneus, who the former year had the republic, L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Manlius Vulso. The Consulship was conferred upon P. Scipio, so as it might appear to the whole world, that this honour was deferred only, and not fully denied to so worthy a personage. His adjunct companion in government was M. Aquilius Glabrio, a man by calling a commoner. The morrow after were the Pretors chosen, to wit, L. Emilius Paulus, M. Emilius Lepidus, M. Junius Brutus, A. Cornel. Mammula, C. Livius, & L. Oppius, both surnamed Sabinator. This Oppius was he that had the conduct into Sicily of a Fleet of thirty sail. Mean while that these new Magistrats cast lots for the government of their Provinces, M. Brutus was commanded to pass over with all his power from Brundisium into Epirus, and to keep his forces about Apollonia. And M. Fulvius the Pretor of the City had in charge to build fifty new Galeaces called Quinqueremes, of five banks of oars on either side. And thus verily the people of Rome was provided against all enterprises and attempts of King Antiochus whatsoever.

Neither was Nabis behind for his part in levying war; but assaulted with great force the Town of Gythium; and of a mischievous and malicious mind against the Achæans, for sending a garrison to aid the besieged Townsmen, he foraged and wasted their country. The Achæans durst not go in hand with war, before their Embassadors were returned from Rome, and until they might know the pleasure and will of the Senat: but after the return of those Embassadors, they both published a Diet and general Council at Sicyone, and also sent their Embassadors to Quintus for his advice and counsel. In this Diet, all their opinions inclined and tended to make war out of hand: only the letters of T. Quintus made some stay of the enterprise, wherein he advised them to expect the Pretor and navy of the Romans. Now when the States there assembled in council were distracted, some persisting still in their former opinion, and others of mind to take with them the advice of him unto whom they had sent for counsel: the multitude at length looked what Philopamenes would say in that behalf. The Pretor he was for the time, and in those dayes surpassed all other in wisdom and authority. Then he rose up and used this preface and said, "That it was a good custome among the Aetolians, and well ordained and provided, that the Pretor himself in all consultations of war should not deliver his own opinion; and therefore willed them of their selves to resolve and determine with all speed possible what they pleased. As for the Pretor, saith he, he will be ready to execute with fidelity and careful diligence their decrees accordingly: yea, and indevor, so far forth as mans policy may reach unto, that they shal not repent of their resolution, be it war or peace. This brief speech of his was more forcible and effectual to incite them to take arms, than any perswasive Oration, wherein he openly could have shewed his desire to follow the wars. And therefore with exceeding accord of all in general they agreed upon war. As for the time and means of managing the same, it was wholly referred to the discretion of the Pretor, to use his own liberty and pleasure. Philopamenes, besides that Quintus so advised, was also himself minded to wait for the Roman fleet which on the Sea side might defend Gythium: but fearing again that their present necessity could abide no delays, and lest not only Gythium should be lost, but the garrison also miscary, which was sent to the defence of the war he set afloat and put to the Sea the Achæans shipping. The Tyrant likewise had rigged and dressed a small fleet to impeach any aid and succours that haply might be sent to the besieged by Sea, to wit, three covered ships with hatch and deck, three Brigantins or Pinnaces, and as many Gallions. For the old ships were by composition and covenant delivered up to the Romans. And to make proof and tryal of these new vessels how swift and nimble they were, and withal to see how all things else were well fitted for a battail, if need were: he made every day certain shews and representations of fight at Sea, and exercised both mariners and soldiers by such kind of false alarms: supposing that herein principally consisted the hope of his siege, in case he could cut off all their aid from the Sea side. Now the Pretor of the Achæans as he was equal to any of the best and most renowned commanders and Captains of that time in Land service, either for experience and practise, or wit and policy: so at Sea he was but a novice and a learner, as being an Arcadian born, an Inlander far within the main, and ignorant besides of all foreign forces, but that he had borne arms and served a little in Caesy, whiles he had the leading there, of some auxiliaries. One old Gally there was a Quadrireme, taken at Sea 80 years before, at what time as she carried Nicala the wife of Craterus from Naxos to Corinth. And having heard much talk of this ship (for indeed she had been sometime of great name in the Kings royal fleet) he commanded her, all rotten as she was now, and ready to fall in pieces, to be shot into the Sea from out of the Bay of Argium. This ship as admiral, made way before the rest, wherein Tisoo of Parga, a Captain General of a fleet was aboard; and encountered the ships of the Lacedæmonians, making sail from Gythium. And at the first she chanced to affront and run against a new strong ship, and being old of her self, leaking and taking water at every joyn, she was rent asunder and fell in pieces. All within her were taken prisoners. The rest of the fleet having lost their captains fled as fast as possibly their oars could make speed and away. Philopamenes himself was in a light foist, full of oar, and fled again, and never stayed until he was arrived at Parga. This mishap nothing discouraged and abated the heart of this martial warrior, who had run through many and many adventures: but contrary-wise wrought this effect, that he assured himself and said, that if he were overtaken and put to the worse in service at Sea, wherein he had no skill, he would so much the rather quit himself upon the Land (where he had such experience and was so ready) as that the Tyrant should not long joy and make boast of his winnings. Nabis puffed up with pride of his fortunate victory, and persuading himself assuredly that he had no cause to fear any more danger from the Sea, purposed likewise to stop up all the avenues and passages by Land; and therefore beset all the wayes betimes with strong guards, which he bestowed in convenient places. And retiring with a third part of his forces from the siege of Gythium, he encamped before Pleia. This is a place that overlooketh and commandeth Laconia and Aetolia, by which wayes it seemed that the enemies would make their approach with their army. Whiles he kept a standing camp there, and few of his souldiers were provided of tents and pavilions, and the rest of the common sort had made them cabins of reeds, wound and interlaced one within another, and the same covered with leaves only to give them some shade. Philopemenes devised, before that he were discovered and came in sight of the enemies, to assaile them at unawares and not looking for his coming, after a new fashion of war that they little doubted. Certain small craies or boats he got together into a secret blind bay, lying within the territory of Argos: in which he bestowed certain souldiers nimble appointed, most of them having round bucklers, with slings, darts, and such like offensive light weapons. From thence he coasted along the River near the shore, until he was come to the promontory or cape adjoyning close to the enemies camp: then he went a land, and by known wayes he came by night unto Pleia: and whiles the watch was fast asleep, as mistrusting no such fear neer hand, he set fire upon the cabins afore-said in every quarter of the camp. Many men were consumed with the fire before they wist that the enemy was come: and they that were ware of them, had no means to help and save their fellows: so with fire and sword all went to wrack. Some very few escaped out of this extremity of danger, and fled to the main camp before Gythium. Thus Philopemenes having discomfited and frightened his enemies, led his army forth with to wast Tripolis in the territory of Laconia, bounding fast upon the confines of the Megalopolitans: and having driven from thence great prizes of men and cattel, he departed before that the Tyrant could send any guards from thence for the defence of the Countrey. And when he had gathered and assembled his army at Tegae, and published and made known unto the Achæi and other Allies, a Diet or general council to be holden there, whereat also were the chief States of the Epirots and Acarnanians: he determined (forasmuch as both the hearts of his own people were sufficiently recovered after the disgrace and shameful dishonor received at Sea; and also the courages of his enemies well cooled and they affrighted) to lead his forces against Lacedæmon: supposing that, that only means to draw the enemy away from the siege of Gythium. And first he encamped before Caria within the enemies ground. But that very day was Gythium forced by the enemies and won. Philopemenes nothing ware thereof, set forward, and encamped neer Barbosthenes, a mountain ten miles from Lacedæmon. Nabis also, having gained Gythium, departed from thence with his army lightly appointed; and marching apace beyond Lacedæmon, seized upon a place, called, The Camp of Pyrrhus: which he made no doubt but that the enemies intended to be possessed of. And then from thence he went to meet them. Now by reason of the narrow way, they took up in their march almost five miles of ground in length. At the tail of the army were the horsemen, and especially, where the Auxiliaries marched: because Philopemenes thought, that the tyrant would charge his men behind with his mercenary souldiers, in whom he reposed his greatest trust. Two things fell out contrary to his expectation at once, which troubled him much: the one was, that the place was gotten by the enemies before, which he intended to have seized upon for his own advantage: the other was, for that he saw the enemy affront his vanguard in a place so rough and rugged, that without the guard of his light-armed souldiers, he could not possibly march forward and advance his Ensigns. Now Philopemenes had a singular dexterity and skill, yea, and great experience in leading an army, and in making choice of his ground either to pitch or fight: and not only in time of war, but also in peace, he busied his head and employed himself principally therein. His manner was, when he rode forth any whither and was come to a streight passage hard to pass through, to look every way, and diligently to view and consider the situation and posture of the place on all sides: and if he were alone, to cast about and advise with himself; but if there were any in his company, to aske their advice in this wise: What if the enemy appeared and shewed himself in that place? How if he came affront or a flank on this or that side; nay, How if he should charge upon our back, what were best to be done? It may be the enemies will encounter us directly ranged in battail array; it may be they march disorderly and loosely, minding nothing else but their way, and to travail on. Thus I say, would he either devise with himself or seek advice of other, what place he were best to seize for his own purpose and commodity: also what number of armed men he should need to employ; or what kind of armour and weapons were needful to use. (for therein also lay no small importance.) Moreover, where he should bestow his carriages? where he should lay his baggage? and where he should place and dispose of the multitude that were not meet to bear arms? what strength and what manner of guard was needful for their defence? and whether it were more expedient to go forward still the way that he was entred into, or better to go back again as he came? likewise, what ground was meet to be chosen for to pitch his camp upon? what compass and space were necessary to be taken up for the fortification of the place? from whence he might have convenient watering? from what quarter he might be best provided of fodder and fiewel? Finally,

A Finally, against the morrow, which way were safest to remove the camp? and what form and manner of march were best? In these condes and discourses, he had from his childhood so inured and exercised his spirits, that he was never to seek what to do upon any such sudden occasion or occurrent presented unto him. And now, at this present, seeing his enemies so near, first and foremost he made stand with his vanguard; then he sent out toward the foremost ensigns, his auxiliary Candiots that came to aid him, and those horsemen which they call Tarentin, whose manner is to have with them, two horses apiece; and then commanding his own men of arms to follow after, he possessed himself of a rock standing over a brook or running rill, from whence they might water commodiously: into that place he gathered together all his bag and baggage; there he bestowed all the paces and horse-paces, and followers of the camp, whom he employed also with armed men; and as the nature of the place would give him leave, he fortified his camp. But to pitch pavilions in a craggy, rugged, and uneven ground he found much ado. Now were the enemies about half a mile off: and at one and the same rivulet they watered both with the guard of their light armed souldiers: but before that they could skirmish and skirmish together (as commonly they do when the camps stand so near one to another) the night overtook them. It appeared plainly there would be some fighting the next day about the brook for water: and therefore in the night season he bestowed close in a valley, farthest out of sight from the enemies, as many of his targeteers as possibly the place would contain and hide. When day-light was come, the light armed Candiots and those Tarentin horsemen (of both sides) entered into skirmish upon the very banks of the brook. Letemnaeus the Candiote had the leading of his country-men: Lycortas the Megapolitan commanded the light horse. The Candiots, who likewise were auxiliaries and aid-souldiers to the enemies, and the same sort also of the Tarentin horsemen, guarded those that came to water for them. Doubtful was the skirmish for a good while (as being managed and maintained of the one side and the other by men of one Nation, and those furnished with the same kind of weapons) but those that were for the Tyrant, were more in number than the other. And by reason that Philopemenes had given charge and direction to the Captains, after they had held skirmish a while, to seem to retreat and flee, thereby to train the enemy into the aforeaid place of ambush, they followed hard in chase upon them as they fled along within the valley, and most of them were either slain or wounded before they saw the enemies hidden there within. Now those targeteers aforeaid, were set in that order (so far forth as the breadth of the valley would permit) that they might easily receive their fellows as they fled, within the spaces between their ranks and files. Then at once they arose, fresh in heart, and ordered in good array, and charged upon the enemies, disordered, disbanded, loose, scattered, weary with travel, and faint of their wounds. Then was it out of doubt and past all peradventure where the victory went: for presently the Tyrant souldiers turned their backs, fled a good deal faster than they made pursuit before, and were beaten into their camp: many were either killed or taken prisoners as they fled; and they had been put in affright also within the camp, but that Philopemenes commanded to sound the retreat, fearing more the rugged and broken ground, and the disadvantage and difficulties thereof, in case he had rashly ventured forward any farther, than he did the enemy. Then he taking his conjecture by the issue of the fight, and guessing by the nature of Nabis the General, in what fear and fright he might be, sent unto him one of his auxiliaries that were strangers, counterfeiting himself to be a renegade revolt, to inform him assuredly, that the Achæans determined the next day to march as far as to the river Eurotas, which runneth hard by the walls of Lacedæmon, for to stop the passage, that neither the Tyrant might retire himself into the City when he would, nor any munition or victuals be carried from thence into the camp: moreover, that they would give the attempt, and assay if they could sollicite any of the citizens to revolt from the Tyrant. This counterfeit carried himself so in this errand, that the Tyrant believed not so much his words, as took hold thereby of a good pretence and honest occasion for to quit and abandon the camp: and therefore the next morrow, he commanded Pythagoras, with the auxiliary souldiers and the horsemen, to keep a good guard about the trench and enclosure of the camp: himself in person with the strength of his army, marched as it were to a battail, and commanded to advance forward the ensigns in all haste toward the City.

Philopemenes perceiving that the army marched so fast through the narrow passage down the hill, put forth all his own horsemen and the auxiliary Candiots, against the guards of the enemies that guarded before the camp. They, seeing the enemies to approach and themselves forsaken of their own fellows, at first went about to retire within their hold: but afterwards when they perceived the whole army of the Achæans advancing against them in order of battail, fearing that they and their tents should be at once surprised, made apace after their own host which was gone a good way before. With that, the targeteers of the Achæans assailed the camp, entered upon it, and ransacked the tents, whiles the rest went forward and pursued the enemies. The way was such, as that an army at liberty and free from fear of enemies, might hardly and with much ado find any ground and march without encumbrance: but so soon as the skirmish began in the tail of the reeward, and the noise and cry of them affrighted behind was heard in the vanguard: every man made shift for one, flung away weapons, and fled into the woods on either side of the way: and ere one could turn about, all the wayes were strewd and choaked up with armour and weapons, and especially with darts or javelins, which lighting for the most part with one end full against the enemies, were in stead of a staked or empalled palisade to hinder their passage.

Philo-

Philopemenus having given commandment to his light armed aid-souldiers to presse forward still, and to follow the chase as fast as they could, knowing that the horsemen would have much ado and trouble in their sight, conducted himself the main army and he easily charged, by a more open way to the River Eurinus: where he encountered himself a little before the going down of the sun, and there he staid for his light appointed souldiers, whom he had sent to follow after the enemies. Who being come about the time of the sun setting brought word, that the Tyrant with some few was entred into the City, but the unarmed multitude were distressed, and wandered all about the Forrest and the Woods. Then he willed them to repose and refresh their bodies: which being done, himself chose out of all the souldiers besides (who because they were come first into the camp, had well bearded themselves with taking their refection and some small sleep) certain elect and special men, and took them forth immediately with him, having about them nothing but their swords, and set them in good order to keep two port-waies, by which men go to Phars and Barnophenas, where he presumed that the enemies would take their way, and retire themselves upon their flight: and nothing was he deceived. For the Lacedaemonians so long as the day light lasted, had withdrawn themselves to the middle of the Forrest, through by-lanes and blind paths, but when the night was once come, and that they descried lights within their enemies camp, they kept themselves aloof over-against them within close and secret lanes: and when they were once passed beyond, and thought all to be in safety and security, they came down into the more open high waies, where they were received and caught up by their enemies that forlaid them in ambush: so they were every where by numbers either killed or taken prisoners: inso much as scarce one fourth part of their whole army escaped. Philopemenus having shut up the tyrant close within the City, spent almost thirty daies consequently ensuing, in waiting and spoiling the territory of the Lacedaemonians: and when he had thus weakened and in manner broken the back of his enemy, he returned home, and the Achaeans held him a paragon, and equal to the Roman General for glorious deeds of arms. nay, in the service of the Lacedaemonian war they preferred him before the other.

During the war between the Achaeans and the tyrant, the Roman Embassadors, who carefully and diligently visited the Cities of the Allies, for fear lest the Aetolians had alienated any of their affections from them to King Antiochus, travelled but little in going about to the Achaeans, whom by reason of the hatred they bare to Nabis, they hoped easily to be fast and fastidious through unto them in all other things. And first they came to Athens, from thence to Chalcis, and so into Thessaly: and after they had conferred with the Thessalians in a frequent council of theirs, they turned their way to Demetrius, where there was published a solemn Diet to be holden by the Magnetes. Where they were to frame their speech more curiously than in other places, because certain of their great men and Potentats were estranged from the Romans, and altogether made for Antiochus and the Aetolians. The reason was this: because when news came that Philip his son, who was left hostage with the Romans, should be rendred again unto him, and like wise themselves but remitted which had been imposed upon him, among other false tales and untruths, it was reported, That the Romans would redeliver Demetrius also into his hands. And rather than that should come to pass, Eurylochus (a principal and chief man among the Magnetes) and some others of that faction, desired to have a new world and an alteration, by the coming of the Aetolians and Antiochus. To these Magnetes, they were to couch and place their words so, in riddling them of that foolish vain fear which they had conceived, that thereby they did not put Philip clean beside his hope, and so give him occasion to be ill affected unto the Romans: considering that he alone was to them of far greater importance in all respects, than were the Magnetes, put all together. Thus much only they said by way of advertisement, That as all Greece generally was much beholden and bound unto the Romans for the benefit of Liberty, which they by their means enjoyed, so that City and State especially above all others was obliged unto them. For there, not only a garrison of Macedonians had been maintained to keep them in awe, but also the King had built him a royal palace, to seat himself there, to the end, that they might evermore have in their eye, their Lord to command them. But in vain, and to no purpose was all this, in case the Aetolians brought Antiochus in his stead to make his residence in the house and palace of Philip: and would needs entertain a new and unknown King in lieu of the old, so long a time and so well known. The sovereign Magistrat of that City, they call Magnetarches, and for that time Eurylochus was the man: who bearing himself big and stout of his high place, said plainly, That he knew no cause, why either he or the Magnetes should suppress and smother the rumor that it is so rise touching the delivery of Demetrius into Philip his hands. For rather than to suffer that, the Magnetes were to oppose themselves, yea, to do and dare any action whatsoever. And in the vehement heat of speech he went so far, that inconsiderately he cast out one word and said, That Demetrius seemed free in outward shew and appearance, but in very truth was at the command and devotion, yea, and at every beck of the Romans. At this speech there arose a dissonant bruit and murmuring of the assembly, which jarred and varied one from another, whiles some foolish him up, others were offended, and took it in great despite, that he should presume to utter and speak so much. And Quintus was in such an heat of choler therewith, that stretching forth his hands to Heaven, he cald the Gods to witness this ingratitude and dishonour of the Magnetes. At whose words they were all greatly terrified. Then Zeno one of the chief, a man at that time of great authority and reputation, as well in regard of the honourable port that he ever carried in the whole course of his life, as also for that he always stood firm and true

A "to the Roman side, besought Quintius and the rest of the Ambassadors with tears. Not to im-
 "pute the folly of one man to the whole City; for every man is to bear his own burden, and as he "hath braved, so to drinke and abide the smart of his own catching. As for the Magnates
 "(saith he) they acknowledge to owe unto Quintius and the people of Rome, not only their "freedom, but all other things else that are most dear and precious unto men. Neither could "man pray or wish at the hands of this immortal Gods for any thing, which the Magnates had "not received by their means: and sooner would they like stanch persons pluck the very heart
 "out of their own bellies, yea, and tear themselves in peeces, before they would violate and break
 "the amity which they had with the Romans. This speech of his was followed and seconded with "the humble prayers of the multitude: Enchiridion departed out of the assembly, and through by"ways and blind lanes recovered the gates, and from thence fled straight into Ætolia. For now by B this time, and every day more than other, the Ætolians discovered and shewed themselves how "they were affected to revolt. And happily at the same time, Thon, a principal personage of that "Nation, whom they had sent as Ambassador to King Antiochus, was newly returned, and brought "with him Menippus the Kings Ambassador, who, before they had audience given them in a coun-
 "cel assembled for them, had filled every mans ears and blabbed forth, what forces were prepared "both for Land and Sea, what a mighty power was coming, both of foot and horse, how Elephants "were sent for out of India and above all (where with they thought the minds of the people would "be most moved). That there was such a mass of gold brought, as would buy all the Romans out
 "and out. It was easy to see what trouble and broil such language might make in the general dis"cussion and assembly. For the Roman Ambassadors had intelligence, both of their coming, and of all C that ever they did. And albeit there was little hope or none at all to do any good, yet Quintius
 "thought it not amiss, that some Ambassadors from the allies and associate Cities should be present
 "at that Council, such as might admonish and put the Ætolians in mind of the Roman alliance "and society, and not stick to speak their minds frankly, yea, and thwart the King his Ambassador.
 "The Athenians of all other were thought the meetest men for that purpose, both in regard of the "authority and reputation of their City, and also for the ancient league between them and the "Ætolians. So Quintius requested them to send their Ambassadors to the Panætolian Parliament.
 "When the assembly was met, and the Council set, Thon first declared his embassy: and after "him was Menippus called in, who being entered in place, spake in this manner: "It had been (and D "he) the best course for all them that inhabit both Greece and Asia, that Antiochus had intermed-
 "led in these affairs; during the upright fortune and entire state of Philip: then, every man had "enjoyed his own, and all had not been reduced to the appetite and devotion, nor brought under "subjection of the Romans. And even yet (quoth he) in case ye persist still in the same mind, and "purpose resolutely to accomplish and finish these your designs and commented enterprises, pos"sible it is by the favor and help of the Gods, and by the means of the Ætolian association, that "Antiochus may recover the State of Greece, crased as it is, and much broken, and bring it again to "her first fresh hue, to her lively and lightsome lustre, which consisteth in true liberty, even that "which is able to stand alone and maintain it self, and dependeth not upon the will and pleasure "of others. The Athenians, who first after the Kings embassy was delivered had audience given E them and liberty to speak their mind, without making any mention at all of the King. "Adverti"sed the Ætolians of the Roman society, and put them in mind of the favors and good turns done
 "by Quintius to all Greece in general: advising them to take heed, that without discretion they "overthrew not the welfare thereof, by running rashly and too soon into a new world of strange "courses and fine devices: for hot, hasty, and heady counsels are at the first sight and entertain"ment, pleasant and amiable: in the handling and managing, hard and difficult: in the end and "issue, heavy and dangerous. Consider how the Roman Ambassadors, and namely, Quintius, ar"mong them, are not far off: and whiles things stand in good terms of integrity, it were better to "treat and debate of matters in question and doubt, by words and reasons, than to set all Asia and "Europe together to take arms and to make lamentable and deadly war one upon another. The F multitude desirous of a change, enclined altogether, and were wholly devote to Antiochus, being "of opinion, that the Roman Ambassadors were not to be admitted into the Council: but the more "grave and ancient persons of the nobility and states-men, obtained thus much by vertue of their "authority: That they should have audience granted unto them. And when the Athenians had "made relation of this decree and conclusion passed, Quintius was of mind to go into Ætolia, for "this accompt he made, either to obtain somewhat that he came for, or else to have all Gods and "men to bear him witness, that the Romans would enter into the action of war justly, and in man"ner upon constraint and necessary. "Quintius being thither come, began at first to discourse be"fore the whole assembly, as touching the society of the Ætolians with the Romans, and how "often they had broken for their parts the faithful accord between them: and when he had so G said, he used a brief speech concerning the right of those Cities that were in question. And if they "thought that they had any law and reason of their side, how much better (quoth he) were it to "send Ambassadors to Rome, either to argue and expostulate the matter with them, or to demand
 "their advice (whether they would themselves) than to cause the people of Rome to make war
 "with Antiochus & the Ætolians together, not without great trouble of the whole world, & cer"tain ruin of all Greece? For none should feel the smart & calamity of this war sooner than they
 "that are the very causes thereof: so began first. Thus spake the Roman Embass, by way of prophecy, but

but in vain and to no effect. After him Thon and the rest of that faction, were heard with the general applause of all: and they effected so much, that without any farther prolonging of the Diet, and referring the matter to another day, yea, and without saying so long until the Romans were out of the place and thence, they concluded to make a decree, by virtue whereof Ambrosius should be sent for to disfranchise Greece, and so decide the quarrel between the Romans and the Ætolians. This decree was too profound and insolent, but Demetrius, their Pretor accompanied it with an arrogant and reproachful a trumpet of his own. For when Quintus required of him to see the said decree, he without any respect of the honorable personage of the man, made answer, That for the present time he had somewhat else to do of greater importance: but he would give him the decree and answer withal shortly, and that within Italy, encamped upon the bank of Hydrunt. So great a spirit of senseless folly in those days, had possessed the nation of the Ætolians, I and their chief Magistrates! Then Quintus and the delegates returned to Corinth.

After the Romans were dismissed, the Ætolians held no more general council of the whole Nation, because they would make semblance and seem to do nothing of themselves as touching the cause and question of Antiochus, but sit still and expect the coming of the King. Many, they braided and debated the matter by their Apostols (so to they call their special and privy Council which consisteth of certain elect chosen persons) by what means there might be an alteration and change in the affairs of Greece. This was held of all men for certain, that in every City and State, the chief and the best men generally were for the association of the Romans, and contented themselves with the present condition wherein they stood: but the multitude and those who had not all things to fall out to their own good liking, were desirous of a change. And one day above the rest, the Ætolians entered into a designment and plot, which was not only out of all measure audacious, but also most shameless, namely, to surprise and possess themselves of Demetrius, Chalcis and Lacedæmon. And to each of these Cities there was sent one of their principal personages, namely, Thon to Chalcis; Alexandrus to Lacedæmon, and Diocles to Demetria. This Diocles had the help and assistance of Eurylochus a banished man (of whose flying away, and the occasion thereof we have spoken before) who otherwise had no hope at all to return again into his native country. The kinsfolk and friends of Eurylochus and thereof of that faction, upon instructions given them by his letters, willed his wife and children to present themselves in the frequent assembly of the citizens in habit of mounters, in poor array, and veiled after the manner of humble suppliants, there to beseech them all and some not to suffer him a guiltless person, neither convicted nor condemned, to wax old and pine away in exile. All that were plain and simple men seemed to be touched with pity and commiseration. The wicked and seditious persons conceived some hope to make a confusion in the State by these Ætolian troubles: in so much as every one was of opinion and gave his voice, that he should be restored and sent for home. This ground being laid and matters thus prepared, Diocles with his horsemen (for then was he the Captain of the Cavalry) took his journey, under a colour and pretence to reduce and bring home this banished person his host and good friend: and in one day and night travelled a mighty great journey, and came within six miles of the City. And betimes in the morning by day light, accompanied with three elect troops he marched forward, commanding the rest of the horsemen to follow after. When he approached the gate, he caused them all to alight on foot and to lead their horses in their hands by the reins of their bridles, and to go without order, resembling travellers and wandering men, so as they seemed more like to the ordinary train of Captain Diocles, than to the men of arms and warriors under this charge: and leaving one of his troops at the gate, for fear lest the horsemen behind might be shut out, he led Eurylochus by the hand, and brought him through the mids of the City and the market place home to his house: and all the way he was met with many of his lovers and friends that welcomed him, and joyed for his return. Upon the whole City was full of horsemen, and all places of opportunity and advantage were seized and possessed by them. Which done, divers were sent to massacre the chief of the adverse part in their houses. Thus the Ætolians became masters of Demetria.

As for Lacedæmon, they devised in no hand to force the City, but by some wile to entrap and surprise the tyrant. For seeing the Romans had despoiled him of all his Sea coast Towns: and the Achæans driven him within the walls of Lacedæmon, there was no doubt, but who so ever could first take his life from him, should carry away all the thanks, and curry especial favor with the Lacedæmonians. Good occasion and pretence they had to send unto him a power of armed men, for that he had importuned them by his prayers for some aids, considering that by their advice and persuasion he had rebelled. So there were given unto Alexandrus a thousand footmen, and thirty elect horsemen, drawn out of all the flour of the City. Demetrius the Pretor delivered unto them from the privy council of that nation (of which we have before spoken) "That they should not believe that they were to be employed in war against the Achæans, or in any other service, according as each one might imagine and conceive in his own head: but he charged them to be ready to perform and execute obediently whatsoever sudden designment Alexandrus upon the present occasion should happen to attempt, were it never so unlooked for, strange, inconsiderate, and audacious: and to rest upon this, That they were sent with him to accomplish that, and for no other purpose. Thus Alexandrus with the conduct of these men thus prepared to his hand came unto the Tyrant: and no sooner was he arrived, but he possessed him presently with a world of hopes, giving to understand, "That Antiochus was already passed over into

Alexander: that shortly he would be in Greece, and overspread all seas and lands with his armies and armados; that the Romans should full well know and find, that they have not now to deal with such an one as Philip; that the numbers of his foot and horse by land cannot be counted, nor his ships at sea numbered; that the battail of his Elephants at the very sight will decide the matter and finish the war. Moreover, that the Aetolians with all their forces, were ready and prest to come to Lacedaemon; (as need required at any time; but indeed, desirous they went to shew and suffer before the King at his arrival, a goodly number of armed soldiers. Nabis therefore himself should do very well, not to suffer those forces which he had, to decay with long repose and idleness, but bring them forth and train them a broad, make them to run in their armour thereby both to wether and sharpen their courage, and also to exercise and inveterate their bodies: for by use and custom, the labour will be lighter, and by the courtesy and graciousness of their General, not without delight and pleasure. Hereupon, they began to issue out of the City, and oftentimes went into the plain lying hand by the River Eurotas. They of the tyrants guard kept commonly in the battail or middle ward, and himself with three hundred men at the utmost (with whom Alexandrus for the most part was) used ordinarily to ride before the ensignes, making survey and viewing the narrow points and wings of the army. The Aetolians were placed in the right wing, as well those that came before to aid the tyrant, as those thousand that were newly arrived with Alexandrus. Now had Alexandrus taken a custom, one while to convey as it were amongst the ranks before in the company of the tyrant, and to instruct him in some matters sounding to his commodity: other whiles, to ride to his own men into the right wing, and soon again to return to the Tyrant, as if he had given them charge of some what necessary to be done. Upon that day which was appointed for to do the feat and murder the tyrant, after he had ridden forth with the tyrant to the usual place, and kept him company a while, he took occasion (as his manner was) to make a step aside to his own soldiers; and then he went in hand with those horsemen which were sent with him from out of Aetolia, and said thus unto them: "Now first, you must adventure and execute that lustily and without delay which you were commanded to perform by my direction and leading. Be ready with heart and hand, and be not slack and idle to exploit that, which ye shall see me to undertake and enterprise. And look who so ever he be that either standeth still, or will seem to argue and interpose his own wit and advice to cross mine, let him make account, he shall never go home again to his own country. With that he set them all a quaking; for well they remembered what their charge was when they came forth from home. Now was the Tyrant a coming on horseback from the left wing. Then Alexandrus commanded his horsemen to couch their lances down, and to have their eyes upon him. He also seduced himself to take a good heart unto him, which was not a litle daunted at first with the cogitation of so great a design, that he had projected. When he was now approached and come near the Tyrant, he ran with full carrier at him, gored his horse, and overthrew himself to the ground. He was not so soon unhorsed and laid along, but the horsemen stabbed him with many a thrust; where of the most part did no harm, considering they were driven against his corslet; but in the end they found where his body was naked and unarmed, so he gave his last gasp before he could be rescued by his guard in the main battail aforesaid. Then Alexandrus taking with him all the Aetolians, made all the haste he could to possess himself of the royal place. The Pensioners and Squires of the body, seeing this murder done before their eyes; were at first mightily affrighted; but afterwards perceiving the army of the Aetolians to go their wayes and depart, they ran to the breathless carcase left among them, and of men that should have guarded his body and revenged his death, they became a sort of idle gazers and lookers on. And surely there would not a man have once stirred, in case the multitude had immediately been called to an assembly; and if afterwards laid down, they had been entertained by him with some Oration or Remonstrances framed according to the time. The Aetolians were kept many together, in arms still, without any outrage or wrong done or offered to any one person. But all things that they did, hastened the speedy ruin and destruction of those that had committed this fact: as it could not otherwise be in all reason, but they should so be served, who had plaid so lewd and treacherous a part. The Captain and Ring-leader of all this mischief kept himself close shut within the royal palace, spending both night and day in lifting and searching the Tyrants coffers and his treasury. And the Aetolians for their part also fell to ransacking, as if they had won that City by assault, which they made countenance and semblance to set free. The indignity of these their pranks, the contempt withal and small regard made of them, encouraged and animated the Lacedaemonians to gather together and consult of the matter. Some were of opinion and said, That the Aetolians were to be thrust out by the head and shoulders, and to be sent away with a mischief, and their own liberty to be recovered, which under a colour of being restored, was intercepted and taken from them: others advised and said, that for fashion at least wise, some one of royal blood should be set up for to be the head in this action. Now there was of that race and stem one Laconicus a young Child, brought up with the children of the late Tyrant; him they mounted upon horseback, and then they took arms with all speed; and as many Aetolians as they could light upon, wandering here and there in the streets, they ran upon and hewed in peeces. Then they assaulted the palace, where they also murdered Alexandrus, albeit with some few about him he made resistance and defended himself. The rest of the Aetolians gathered together about Chalciceus (which is a Chappel of Diana made of brass) and there likewise they were massacred. A few of them flung away their weapons and fled, some escaped to Tagra, and others to Megalopolis: where being apprehended by the Magistrate, they were sold in part-sale, to them that would offer most. Philopomenus hearing of the Tyrants death, went to Academea, where he found all things out of order and in confusion by reason of fear. And having called forth the principal and chief citizens, he used unto them such a speech, as indeed Alexander should have made, and thereby knit the Lacedaemonians in league and alliance with the Achaeans: which he effected the sooner, because it chanced even then, that Antilus was come before Gydeum with four and twenty gallees of five banks of oars on a side.

About the same time, Thon had not so good speed before Chalcis by means of Enthyridas, a great and chief man of the City (one, who by the might and stronger hand of those that sided with the Romans, had been expelled the City after the coming of T. Quintus and the Embassadors, or delegates) and also of Hypodant of Chalcis, a Merchant and a man that in regard of his wealth and riches bore a great side in Chalcis. Thon I say, sped not so well by their means, nor understanding that the supporters and part-takers of Enthyridas were well disposed to betray the Town, as Eurytus did in the inspiring and inciting of Demetrius. This Enthyridas from Athens (for there he had made choice to dwell) first came to Thebes, and from thence went forward to Salganea. Herodorus abode at Thronium, and not far from thence within the gulf of Malea, he had seen footmen, and Thon two hundred horsemen, and about thirty light Caravels. Which Enthyridas was commanded to set off into the Island Atalana with six hundred footmen, that from thence, when he perceived once the Land-forces to approach Athens and Euripus, he might run over to Chalcis. As for themselves, they conducted the rest of the forces in all the hast they could, and most by night, journeyed marched into Chalcis: Antis and Xenoclidis (who had the managing of the affairs in Chalcis, and might do all in all there, now that Enthyridas was banished) remained in Chalcis, and whether they mistrusted somewhat themselves, or had some inkling and intelligence of the matter, I wot not, but afraid they were at first, and had no other hope as all by flight to save themselves: howbeit afterwards when their fear was well allayed and settled, seeing evidently, that not only their own countrey was betrayed, but also the Roman society abandoned, they plotted in this wise, and entered into a counsell as followeth.

It fortuned at the very same time, that a solemn anniversary sacrifice was celebrated at Athens to the honour of Diana Amarynthia: to which solemnity there resorted not only the inhabitants of those places neer at hand, but also a number of Carytians. Thither they sent certain Orators, to request and entreat the Eretrians and Carytians, both to take some pity of their estate, considering they were born in the same Island, and also to have some regard to the alliance of the Romans, and not suffer Chalcis to fall into the hands of the Etolians: who no doubt, if they might get Chalcis, would not be long ere they had Euboea too. Sirly Lords (say they) were the Macedonians, and rigorous, but the Etolians would be much more unsupportable. These Chies were principally respective to the Romans, whose virtue and prowess in war, whose justice and bounty in victory they had lately experience of, and therefore both States armed the flower and manhood of all their youth and sent them. The Townsmen of Chalcis having committed the guard of their walls to these, went forth themselves with all their forces passed over Euripus, and encamped neer Salganea. From which place they sent first an herald, and after him Embassadors to the Etolians, to demand of them, Wherein they had so offended either in word or deed, that their allies and friends should come to molest and assail them so by way of hostility? To whom Thon the General of the Etolians made this answer, That they were not come to annoy and trouble, but to deliver and free them from their servitude under the Romans. For bound they were and tied now with a brighter and more glittering chain indeed, but far heavier, than at what time as they had the garrison of the Macedonians within their Castle. The Chalcidians replied again and inferred, that they neither were in bondage, nor needed at all the garrison of any. And thus the Embassadors departed from the party, and returned to their own people. Thon and the Etolians, whose whole and only hope was to come upon them on a sudden and surprise them at unawares returned home again as they came, being not able to maintain open war, nor to assail a City so well fortified both by sea and land, Enthyridas being advertised that his country-men lay in camp at Salganea and that the Etolians were dislodged and gone, retired himself also from Thebes to Athens. And Herodorus likewise, after he had wisely and with great longing, expected from Atalana certain daies together, to see some signal (but in vain) sent out a pinnace or brigantine, to know what the cause might be of such stay: and understanding that the enterprise was given over by his complices and fellows in the complot, he returned to Thronium from whence he came.

Quintus likewise having intelligence of these occurrents, as he sailed with his fleet from Corinth, encountered Enmenes in Euripus neer Chalcis. And thought good it was between them that Enmenes the King should leave at Chalcis five hundred souldiers in garrison, and himself go directly to Athens: and Quintus kept on his way to Demetrius whither he intended, supposing, that the deliverance of Chalcis would make somewhat to induce the Macedonians to embrace again the society of the Romans. And to the end that those persons in Demetrius who sided with him might have some forces for their defence, he wrote unto Ennomus the Pretor of the Thessalians, to put the youth in arms: and he sent Vilius before unto Demetrius to sound their affections, not minding otherwise to give the attempt, unless some part of them enclined to respect the ancient society. Vilius entered the mouth of the haven with a five banked Galliee. Thither ran the

A the whole multitude flocking unto him. And Villius demanded of them whether they had rather that he came to them as to friends or enemies? Unto whom Eurylochus the Magnesian, answered, that he was come unto his friends: but he willed to him forbear the haven, and suffer the Magnesian to be at peace and liberty, and to beware that under a pretence of parle, he did not solicit and disquiet the multitude. After this there was no further talk and speech between them but plain debate and altercation; while Villius the Roman blamed and challenged the Magnesian, as unthankfull persons, and forewarned them of the miseries and calamities that hung over their heads; and again the multitude cried out aloud, and accused as well the Senes as Quintius. Thus Villius without doing any good, returned to Quintius. But Quintius having dispatched a messenger to the Pretor, that he should reduce home his forces, retired himself again by sea to Cornet.

B The affairs of Greece thus interlaced and blended with the Roman, have carried me away as it were out of my lists: not for that they were so necessary and important to be written, but only because they were materiall to the cause of the war against Antiochus. After the Consuls were elect (for there I began my digression) L. Quintius and Cn. Domitius, the Consuls went into their severall provinces, Quintius in Liguria, and Domitius against the Boii. As for the Boii, they held themselves quiet, yea, and the whole body of their Senat with their children, their captains also with their Cavalry, to the number in all of fifteen hundred, yielded themselves to the Consul. But the territory of the Ligurians was overrun and wasted, and some fortresses won: whereby not only there were prizes got of all sorts, and prisoners taken, but also diverse captives, as well citizens as allies were recovered out of the enemies hand. This very year a Colony was planted at Vibi, by an act of Senat and Commons: and there went thither three thousand and seven hundred footmen, and three hundred horsemen. The Triumvirs, who had the placing of them, were Q. Navius, M. Minius, and M. Furius Crassipes. Every footman was endued with fifteen acres of land, and the horsemen with twice as much. It was a territory held last in the tenure of the Brutians, and they had conquered it first from the Greeks.

About the same time, there hapned at Rome two most feartfull accidents; the one of them continued long, but was not altogether so vehement and terrible: for there was an earthquake endured eight and thirty daies. All which time, the lawfted or vacation from all courts of law and civil causes, continued in great fear and pensiveness: in regard whereof, a supplication was holden for three daies. As for the other, it was not a vain fear, but a very loss indeed that touched many men: for there began a scarfire in the beast Market, and continued a day and a night, burning many houses standing on the Tyber side; and all the shops and ware-houses, with merchandise of great price, were consumed. Now was the year well drawing to an end, and daily more and more the bruit and rumor of the war with Antiochus increased: and likewise the care that the LL. of the Senat had thereof. And therefore they began to treat as concerning the Provinces of the Magistrats elect, to the end, that all of them might be more circumspect and intente to their charges. So a decree passed, that the Consuls should have the governance of Italy, by name, and also to go whithersoever the Senat should please to dispose of them: and all men knew well enough, that the war against Antiochus was upon the point. Also ordained it was, that he whose lot it was to manage that war, should have the conduct of four thousand footmen of Roman Citizens, and three hundred horsemen; besides six thousand allies of the Latine nation, and four hundred horsemen.

E L. Quintius the Consul was appointed to take musters for those souldiers, that there should be no stay, but that the new Consul might immediately put himself in his journey, to what expedition soever the Senat thought good. Item, It was decreed as concerning the Provinces of the Pretors, in this manner: namely, That the first lot should assign the double jurisdiction, civil and forreign, as well among Citizens as strangers: the second should concern the Brutians: the third, the navy, and the same to sail whithersoever the Senat would appoint: the fourth for Sicily: the fifth for Sardinia: the sixth for the nether Spain. Over and besides L. Quintius the Consul was commanded to enroll two new legions of Roman Citizens, besides twenty thousand foot and eight hundred horsemen of allies of the Latine nation: and this army they set out for the Pretor, who was to govern the Brutii. Two chappels that year were dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus: the one of them L. Furius Purpureo vowed in the Gauls war, as Pretor; the other when he was Consul and Q. Marcius Ralla the Dumvir, dedicated them. This year there passed many sharp and grievous sentences and judgements upon usurers: against whom (being privat men) M. Tuccius and P. Junius Brutus the two Ediles of the chair, commenced action. Of that silver wherein they were fined, was made a chariot with four wheels, gilded; and set up it was in the Capitol in the cabinet of Jupiter above the top of his shrine: likewise twelve bucklers gilded. The same Ediles also, caused the porch or gallery to be made without the gate Tergemina, among the carpenters.

G As the Romans were wholly amused upon preparation for this new war, so Antiochus for his part sat not still: three Cities there were which kept him back and checked his progresse; to wit, Smyrna, Alexandria in Treas, and Lampsaen; the which they never could to that day force by assault, or draw into amity with any condition whatsoever; and to leave them behind in those terms, when the should in proper person passe over into Europe, he was not willing. Somewhat also he was impeached by a consultation as touching Amibal. For as first he was staid and hindered by occasion of the open ships which he intended to send with him into Affrick. And afterward buzzed it was into his head by Theas the Etolian especially, and question moved, whether it was good simply to send him thither at all; or no? This Theas, when Greece was all in an hurry and full of troubles, bare them in hand, that Demetrius would be in their power and at their devotion. And like as with his leavings touching the King, in multiplying and magnifying his forces; he had brought many of the Greeks into a fools paradise, even so also after the same manner he ceased not to feed the King with lies, and fill him with hopes, making him believe as all men wished for him with all their hearts, and would run by heaps to the sea strand, to meet him to soon as they could ken his fleet under sail. This self-same man was so bold also as to alter the Kings mind as touching Annibal, which seemed before resolved and settled. For he perswaded him that the Kings navy was not to be dismembred, and part therefore to be sent away; and if he wereto make out any of the ships from the rest, yet Annibal of all other was not to have the conduct thereof, a banished person and a Carthaginian; who was like enough to be of many minds, & I to change a thousand times in a day, such was his present condition and fortune, & such was his nature and disposition. And as for that glorious name for martiall prowesse (which is the cause that Annibal is so much set by, and which recommendeth him as a speciall and singular gift to the world) it is too much, and far unfitting for any one captain under a King: and more meet it were that the King himself should be regarded and seen above all other, that the King, I say, and none but the King should be the leader, conductor and commander of all. Again, if Annibal chanced to miscary with a fleet, or to have his forces defeated, the losse would be accounted no more then if any other meaner captain had done it: but if the affairs should prosper and speed well, Annibal should go away with the honour, and not Antiochus. Moreover, say that fortune were so kin as to give Antiochus the upper hand of the Romans, and the entire victory over K them for ever, what hope or likelihood is there that Annibal would be content to live under the King and subject to him alone, who hardly could brook and endure the command and sovereignty of the whole state wherein he was born? He hath not carried himself so, ever since his first youth, bearing agind to compass the dominion of the whole world, as that now in his old age he can not abide to have a lord and a superior over him. To conclude: the King (quoth he) hath no such need of Annibal in this war, as to make him a commander: wel may he use him for a counsellor, and so forth have him in his train and company; for some mean fruit and use of such a nature cannot be cumbersome, hurtfull, and dangerous: but if high and great matters be reached at, soon they may bear down and overcharge both the giver, and also the receiver. And no spirits are so ready to envy and missee others, as they whole birth and parentage, whose degree L and estate is not answerable to their hasty minds: and such commonly, as they hate the vertue, so they depreesse the good of another. Hereupon their course of sending Annibal into Africk, was forthwith laid aside and clean cast behind, which was so well devised in the beginning of the war.

Antiochus bearing himself aloft now, principally for that Demetrius was revolted from the Romans unto the Etolians, determined no longer to delay the matter, but presently to take a voiage into Greece. But before that he embarked and took the sea, he went up to Ilion from the sea side for to sacrifice to Minerva; and when he was returned to his fleet, he made sail with 40 close covered and hatched ships, and 60 uncovered and undecked, and after those followed 200 vessels of burden, charged and fraught with victuals, munition, and warlike furniture of all sorts. And first M he fell with the land * Imbros; and from thence he cut over to Scyathos, where after he had rallied his ships which had been scattered one from another in the wide and deep sea, he arrived at Preleum, the first town of the main and continent. Where Eurylochus the Magnetarches, [i.e. the sovereign of Magnesia] and the principall citizens of the State, who were come from Demetrius, met him and joynd with him; who rejoycing exceedingly to see so goodly a company of them in his train, the next day put into the haven of the City of Demetrius; and not far from thence landed all his forces, which amounted in the whole to ten thousand foot, five hundred horse, and six Elephants: a small power (God wot) and unfficient to leize upon Greece, all naked and alone, far shorter then to hold and maintain war with the Romans. After it was reported that Anti-ochus was come to Demetrius, the Etolians proclaimed a councill, wherein they made a decree N to send for Antiochus. For now the King knowing that they would passe such an Act, was departed from Demetrius, and had withdrawn himself to Phalera within the gulph of Malea. And after he had received once the patent of that decree, he went from thence to Lamia, where he was received with exceeding favour of the common people, with clapping of hands, shouts, acclamations, and others sign, whereby the multitude pleased to shew & testifie their great joy. When they were assembled together and set in Councell, Phaneas the Pretor and other chief citizens brought him solemnly in: where Oyes made, thus the King began his speech, first exusing himself, in that he was come with a far smaller power then all men hoped or looked for. And even this (quoth he) may serve in stead of the greatest argument that may be of my exceeding love and affection toward you, in that being so unprovided and unfurnished of all things, and at a time so unseasonable for to sail, as too early to take the sea, I have not thought much but am willingly come at the call of their Embassadors: being thus assuredly perswaded, that the E. tolians seeing me once, will suppose that in me alone consisted all their hope and defence whatsoever. And yet I would accomplish I assure you, and satisfie to the full even your contentment also, whose expectation for the present may seem to have been disappointed; for soon as the time

A t time of the year will serve, and the spring is once come, that the seas are navigable, I will o-verspread all Greece with men, horse, and munition; I will take up all the sea coasts with fleets,
 "I will spare for no cost, no pain, no perill, untill I have taken from their necks the heavy yoke of "the Roman empire, set Greece free indeed, and the made the Ætolians the chief commanders "therein. Nay, with mine armies besides shall come all kind of provision and furniture out of A- sia. But for the present (saith he) the Ætolians must see & take order, that my people may be served with corn and other victuals at a reasonable rate. To this effect when the King had spoken with the great assent of all men, he departed. After the Kings departure, there rose some contention between two great men of the Ætolians, to wit, Phœnas and Thous. Phœnas was of opinion, that it was better policy to use Antiochus for a mediator and reconciler of peace, or to be an umpire or arbitrator to decide the controversies between them & the Romans, rather then to be the General of the war. For his very coming and majesty would be more effectual then all his forces, to strike some reverence in the Romans, and cause them to be respective unto him. For men oftentimes yield and remit many things of themselves willingly, to avoid war, which they cannot be forced unto by war and by arms, when they are once entred into action. Thous inferred again and said, that Phœnas spake not this for any desire & love to peace, but his meaning was to scatter and dispatch this furniture and preparation of war, for this intent, that by this tedious lingring, the Kings courage might abate, and the Romans gain time to make themselves ready. For, that there was no reason possibly to be gotten at the Romans hand, they had tried sufficiently by good experience, in sending so many embassages to Rome, and in debating the matter so often with Quintus: neither would they ever have fought unto Antiochus and craved his aid, if all their hope otherwise had not been cut off and clean failed. And now since his helping hand is presented unto them sooner then all men thought or looked for, they were not now to begin to faint and give over, but rather to request and intreat the King, that since he was come himself in person (which was the greatest matter of all) to set free and maintain Greece, he would send for forces both at sea and land. For the King in arms, might peradventure obtain something: but disarmed if he were, little or no reckning would the Romans make of him in the quarrell and question of the Ætolians, no, nor in his own affairs whensoever he should reason and deb. thereof. And here went the hure away. They all opened straightwaies to stile the King with the name of Imperator [Emperour] and they chose thirty of the chief personages to assist him in counsell for all things requisite. Thus the Diet was dissolved, and every man slipt away and retired to his own City.
 D The next day the King sat in a consultation with their Apoletes, in what place they should begin the war. And it was thought best, first to assail the City of Chalcis, which lately the Ætolians had assailed in vain. And for to effect this service, there was more expedition and speed required then any other great forces and preparations. Hereupon the King set forward with 1000 footmen which followed him from Demetrias, and made by the way of Phœcia: The Captains of the also of the Ætolians, having levied some few companies of their youth took another way and met with him at Charonæa, and followed with ten covered ships. The King encamped neer Salganea, and himself in person with the chief of the Ætolians crossed the Eurippus: and when he was landed and not far gone from the haven, the Magistrats and chief men of Chalcis came forth without their gates, and some few of both sides met together for to parlee. The Ætolians were earnest to perswade with them, "That so far forth as they might without impeaching the Roman amity
 "they would assume the King to be their allie and friend, for as much as he was passed into Europe
 "not to make war, but to deliver Greece, and set it free in very deed, and not in word only and "false semblance, as the Romans had done. And nothing was there more for the good and benefit "of the Cities in Greece, then to entertain the society and fellowship of them both. For under the
 "the defence and safeguard of the one, they might be sure to guard themselves from the violence "and outrage of the other. But if they accepted not of the King, they were best to take heed
 "and see what danger they presently incurred: considering the succours of the Romans to relieve "them were so far off, and the forces of Antiochus their enemy to annoy them, so neer even at "their gates, whom of themselves with their own power they were not able to withstand. To F this, Mithis one of their chief men made this answer: I marvell much (q. he) who they be, that "Antiochus for to deliver and set free, hath taken the pains to leave his own Kingdome, and to "pass over into Europe. For mine own part, I know no City in Greece, that either hath Roman "garrison, or payeth any tribute unto them, or is bound to unjust and unreasonable covenant, or "endureth any hard laws and conditions against their wils: and therefore the Chalcidians have "need of no person to restore them to freedom, since they be free already; nor yet of a gar"rison for their defence, considering that by the grace and favour of the same people of Rome, they "enjoy peace and liberty already. As for the King, we refuse not his amity, nor yet reject
 "we the friendship of the Ætolians. And we will take it for a speciall point of friendship that G they shal do us, if they gently will depart out of our land and be gone: For, as for us, we are re"solute in this, not to receive them within our wals, no, nor to contract with them any society, "without the advice and consent of the Romans. When these matters were related to the King, who stayed behind with the ships, he determined presently to return to Demetrias, for that he was not come with such a power as to attempt any thing by force where, seeing his first enterprise came to nothing, he conferred with the Ætolians what was to be done next: & concluded it was, to sound the Achæans, & Aminander the King of the Athamans. They supposed that the nation of the Bœotians was clean changed and badly affected to the Romans ever since the death of Basilus and those troubles that ensued thereupon. They were perswaded also that Philip a man of great power, and principal leader of the Achæans, was both malicious and odious unto Quintus for emulation and jealousie of honour in the Læonian war. Aminander had espoused and taken to wife Apama the daughter of one Alexander a Megapolitian, who vaunted himself to be descended from Alexander the Great, named his two sons Philip and Alexander, and his daughter Apama; whom being thus advanced by marriage with a King, her elder brother Philip accompanied into Athemanis. This Philip a vain-headed young man, the Ætolians and Antiochus had induced into a foolish hope, (considering that for certain he was of the royall blood) to obtain the Kingdome of Macedony, if haply he could bring about to joyn Aminander and the Athamanians to Antiochus. And this vain conceits of great benefit wrought mightily not with Philip only, but also with Aminander.

Now in Asbes there was a councill holden at Ægium, and audience given there to the Embassadors of Antiochus and the Ætolians, before T. Quintus. Where the King his Embassador spake first, and being, (as all those commonly are, that have intertainment and maintenance of Kings) full of foolish babble, & making sea and land rebound again with his vain prating and senseless words; set tale an end, and told them, what an infinit number on horsemen were passing over by Hellepont into Europe: whereof some of them were in compleat harness, armed at all peeces, whom they call Catapraiti: others were archers, and shot of horseback, against whom there was nothing close, nothing sure enough, who when their backs are turned, and their horses run away, shoot so much the more surely, and even point-plank. And albeit these forces of horse by his report, were sufficient of themselves to defeat all the armies of Europe if they were put together, yet he added besides a mighty number, I wot not how many of footmen: and terrified them with namely a sort of strange nations, that scaggely had been heard of before, to wit, the Dakes, the Medians, the Elymzans and Cadusians. But for his forces at sea, there was no bay, no harbors, nor havens in all Greece able to receive them. The Sydonians and Tyrians (say they) hold the right side, the Aradians, and the Siders out of Pamphylia keep the left: nations for skill and valour at sea incomparable. As for money and other provision and furniture for the war, it were needlesse to discourse of, since they themselves knew well enough, that the realms of Asia have alwaies flowed with gold, as their proper wealth. So as the Romans now were not to deal with Philip, nor with Antiochus, the one a chief person among many other of a City, and the other limited within the confines only of the kingdom of Macedony, but with the great Monarch of all Asia, yea, and of some part of Europe. And yet he, as mighty a potentate as he is (notwithstanding he is come to the utmost coasts and bounds of the Levant sea, to deliver and enfranchise Greece) demandeth nothing of the Achæans prejudiciall to their fealty and allegiance to the Romans their first allies and associates: for he required not them to take arms with him against them, but only not to intermeddle and take part: his seeking is, that (as becometh good friends and mediators between both parties) they would all well and peace among them, and not interpolate themselves in a quarrel of war. Archidamus likewise the Embassador for the Ætolians, requested in maner the same, that they would hold themselves quiet and in repose (a thing most easie and safe for them) and being but lookers on the war, wait and attend the issue of others mens fortunes, without the hazard of their own; yet he staid not so, but proceeded to M.

far and overshot himself so much in words, that he brake forth at length in ill language, once while railing against the Romans in general, another while against Quintus in particular, calling them ungratefull and unthankfull persons, reproaching, upbraiding, and hitting them in the teeth, how not only they had got the victory of Philip, but also saved themselves by the virtue and valour of the Ætolians: and as for Quintus, he was to thank them and their means, as much as his own life came to & the preservation of his army. For wherein at any time (qd. he) performed be the duty and devoir of General in the field? Seen him indeed I have in the time of battell and in the camp, take the flight of birds, kill sacrifices, and make vows very devoutly, like some holy parish-priest or divining Prophet, whiles I my self was fain in his defence to expose and present my body to lances and darts of the enemies. To these challenges Quintus made answer N in this wise, saying, that Archidamus had more regard in whose presence he spake, then to whom he directed all his speeches: for the Achæans know very well, that all the valour of the Ætolians, standeth in bragging words and not in martiall deeds, as men that love to be heard in Diet and assemblies rather then seen in the field and battell; and therefore no marvell if he made so small reckning to speak unto the Achæans, considering that he knew, how well acquainted they were with the maners and fashions of the Ætolians. But he hath besides vaunted and made great brags before the King Embassadors, and in their person, before the King himself in absence. And if a man had not known before, what it was, and had to knit and united Antiochus and the Ætolians together, he might perceive it evidently by the speeches of the Embassadors: for by exchanging lies reciprocally, and by bragging of their forces which they have not, they have inflated and puffed up one another with vain hopes, whiles they tell and would make them believe, That Philip by them was vanquished; That the Romans by their valour were protected; and other gay matters, which ere while ye heard building castles in the air to the end, that you & other states and nations would side with them and take their parts: the King again (by his Embassadors) overprospereth all with clouds of horsemen and footmen, and covereth whole seas with fleets and

and armados. Now in faith this is mine host of Chalcis up and down, a friendly man I assure you, and a good fellow in his house, and one that knoweth how to entertain his guests and bid them welcome. And verily I can liken this manner of dealing to nothing better then to a supper of his. We went upon a time to make merry with him, and I remember well it was not midsummer (when the daies are longest and the sun at the hottest) where he made us passing good cheer. And as we wondered how at such a season of the year he met with that plenty of venison and such variety withall; the man (nothing so vainglorious as these fellows here) smiled pleasantly upon us and said, we were welcome to a feast of a game (wine and no better: but well fare a good cook my masters (qd. he) who by his cunning hand, what with seasoning it, and what with serving it up with divers sauces, hath made all this fair shew of wild flesh, and the same of sundry sorts. This may fitly be applied to the King his armes and forces: of which even now so great boast was made. For these divers kinds of arms, these many names of nations never heard of before, to wit, the Dakes of Daceans (I wot not what to call them) the Medes, the Cadusians, the Elinians, they are but Syrians when all is done: who for their base minds by nature, are much better to make a sort of slaves then a company of good souldiers. And would to God (you my masters of Achaia) I could represent unto your eyes the port and train of this great King, when he ran from Demetrius, one while to Lamia to the counsell of the Etolians, & another while to Chalcis: you should see in the Kings camp hardly two pretty legiounets, & those but lame ones neither and not well accomplished: you should see the King sometime as good as begging grain of the Etolians, to measure out among his hungry souldiers: otherwhiles making shift to take up monies at interest to make out their pay: now standing at the gates of Chalcis, and anon shot out from thence and excluded clean: and when he had done nothing else but teen Aulis and Euripus, returning fair into Etolia: Antiochus (you see) hath yielded but small belief to the Etolians, and the Etolians have as little trusted & relied upon the vanity of the King. And therefore the lesse should you be deceived by them, but rather repose your selves assuredly in the fidelity of the Romans so often tried, so often known and approved. For whereas they say It is your best counle not to be embarked and interested in this war, I assure you, there is nothing more vain then this, nay, nothing so hurtfull unto your estate. For you shall be a prize and prey to the victor, without thank of either part, without any worth and reputation. Quintius was thought by the Achzans to have spoken not impertinently, but to have answered them both fully: and an easie matter it was to approve his speech unto those, that were well enough enclined to have given him gentle hearing: for that it was no question nor doubt at all, but that every man would judge them to be friends or enemies to the Achzan nation, whom the Romans held for theirs: yea, and would conclude in the end of an act, to denounce war both against Antiochus & the Etolians. Moreover, according as Quintius thought good, they sent presently an aid of 500 souldiers to Chalcis, and of as many to Pyraeum. For at Athens there had like to have been a sedition and mutiny, whiles some drew the multitude (which commonly is bought and sold for mony) to take part with Antiochus upon hope of large rewards and great bounties, untill such time as Quintius was sent for by them that took part with the Romans: in so much as Apollodorus (who gave counsell and periwaded to revolt) was accused by one Leon, and being condemned, was banished. Thus verily the embassage returned from the Achzans to the King with present answer. The Boeotians delivered no certainty: this only was their answer, That when Antiochus himself was come in Baotia, then they would consider and consult what they were best to do.

Antiochus being advertised; that both the Achzans and King Eumenes also had sent men for the defence of Chalcis, thought good to make haste, that his force might not only prevent them, but also if it were possible receive them and cut them short as they came. And for this intent, he sent Menippus with three thousand souldiers or there about, and Polyxenidas with his whole fleet. Himself a few daies after marched with six thousand of his own souldiers, and of that levy, which on a sudden might be gathered at Lamia, no great number of Etolians. Those five hundred Achzans aforesaid, and the small aid that King Eumenes sent under the conduct of Xenocides the Chalcidian, having safely passed Euripus before that the waies and passages were beset, arrived at Chalcis. The Romans also who were upon five hundred, at what time as Menippus encamped before Salganea, came to Hermione, where is the passage out of Baotia into the land of Eubaea. In their company was Mithridates sent as Ambassador from Chalcis to Quintius, for to crave some succour: who perceiving that the waies were laid and the streights kept by the enemies, leaving his intended journey by the way of Aulis, turned to Delium, minding from thence to cut over into Eubaea. This Delium is a temple of Apollo situate upon the sea strand, and five miles distant from Tanagra, from whence there is a short cut (little more then a league) over an arm of the sea unto the next parts of Eubaea: In this Temple and sacred grove about it, so religious, so privileged and secured (as are those franchised houses and sanctuaries which the Greeks call Asyla) and at that time, when neither war was proclaimed, or at least wise not so far proceeded, as that in the hearing and knowledge of any man there had been sword drawn, or blood shed in any places. In this place, and at this time, I say, whiles the souldiers wandred at their leisure and pleasure, some gone to see the temple aforesaid and the grove, others walking upon the strand unarmed, and a great sort also of them scattered over the fields (such as were gone for forrage, and fewell) all on a sudden Menippus finding them loose and disbanded, charged upon them and slew them, and to the number of fifty he took alive: very few escaped, among whom was Mitris, who got into a small vessel of merchandise. This occurred, as it troubled and disquieted Quintus and the Romans, for the loss of their soldiers, so it seemed much to increase the sight of their just quarrell to make war upon Antiochus, Antiochus having advanced his army, and approached Anis, after he had once again addressed Orators, partly of his own subjects, and partly Etians to Chaleis, for to follow those causes which of late he had commenced, but in more minatory terms, now prevailed easily, notwithstanding Mitris and Xenocides laboured to the contrary, that the gates should be set open unto him. All those that were for the Romans abandoned the City a little before the Kings coming. The soldiers of Achaa and King Eumenes, kept Salganea The Rom. soldiers also (who were but few) fortified and made a sconce upon the water of Enripus, to be a defence for the passage. Manipulus began to assail Salganea, and the King himself to set upon the fort of Enripus aforesaid. The Achazans and soldiers of Eumenes first grew to composition, and having capitulated to depart without any harm, quit their place of garrison. The Romans held out longer, and stoutly defended the hold of Enripus: but even they also being so streightly invested both by land & water, and seeing now the ordinance and engines of battery, brought and ready to be planted against them, would no longer endure the siege. When as now the King had possessed himself of the City of Euboea, all the other Cities of that Island, refused not to submit and come under his subjection. And he thought he had made a good beginning and entrance in this war, in that so great an Island, and so many Cities commodiously seated, and of such importance, were reduced under his obedience.

The six and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the six and thirtieth Book.

Marcus Acilius Glabrio the Consul, with the aid of King Philip, vanquished King Antiochus, near to Thermopylae, and drove him out of Greece. He also subdued the Boians. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, the Consul (reputed and judged by the Senat the best man in the City) dedicated the temple of the mother of the gods, whom himself had brought into the Palatium. He also when he had overcome the Boians, took them upon surrender to his protection, and triumphed over them. Over and besides, here are set down the prosperous battles fought at sea, against the admirals and captains of King Antiochus.

The six and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Soon as P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Cornelius, and M. Acilius Glabrio, the two Consuls were entered into their magistracy the L.L. of the Senat enjoined them (before any speech or question moved as touching the provinces) to sacrifice greater beasts in all those temples, wherein the custom was for the more part of the year to celebrate the solemnity of sacrifices, and to make their prayers in this manner, That whereas the Senat intended a new war, the gods would vouchsafe to bless and happily conduct the same to the good and publick weal of the Senat and people of Rome. All those sacrifices proved good and as they ought to be; even the very first beasts that were slain, prognosticated fortunate success, and shewed apparent signs that the gods were pacified and well pleased. And thus the soothsayers and bowel-priests, out of their learning, answered, it was evident, that by this war the bounds and limits of the Roman empire should be extended, and that both victory and triumph was foresignified. These answers being reported, and mens minds setled, and their consciences resolved of all scruples as concerning the gods, then the L.L. of the Senat granted out an order, that a bill should be preferred solemnly unto the people in this form: Plausit in vos, et in vestram vim, ut war should be enterprized against Antiochus, and all that take his part? And if this bill passe and be granted, are ye pleased, that the Consuls, if they think so good, refer the whole matter unto the Senat so take order for the managing thereof accordingly? P. Cornelius propounded this bill, and the people accepted thereof. Whereupon the Senat set down a decree that the Consuls should call lots for the government of Italy and Greece and that he whose lot it was to govern Greece, should (over and above that number of soldiers, which L. Quintus by authority and commission from the Senat had for that province either enrolled or levied) receive that army also which M. Baebius the Pretor caused to passe over the year before into Macedony, by virtue of an order from the Senat, in that behalf enacted. And license he had, if need to required, to take up six thousand soldiers from among the allies without Italy, so as he exceeded not the number of five thousand. Also agreed it was, that L. Quintus the Consul of the year before, should be deputed lord General for that war. As for the other Consul, unto whom had been allotted the charge of Italy, he was commanded to levy war against the Boians.

- A Boians and to their choice; whether army he had rather have of those two which the former Consuls conducted: and when he had received one, to send the other to Rome, that those legions of Citizens should be in readiness for to beset whether it pleased the Senat. This order being taken in the Senat, astouching the appointment and assignation of those provinces, then it was thought good that the new Consuls should cast lots for their governments. To Acilius befell Greece, and Italy to Cornelius. After this by a speciall law there passed an act of the Senat, That whereas the people of Rome had ordeined to wage war at that time ag. Inll King Antiochus, and those that were under his dominion, the Consuls should cause a procession to be solemnized. Also that the Consul M. Acilius should conceive and make a vow to Jupiter, for to celebrat the great Games in his honour, and to bring offerings to every altar. This vow was by him pronounced in this form of words, according as P. Licinius the Arch-Priest endited and prompted unto him. If this war which the people hath determined to be enterprised and made against King Antiochus, shall be performed according to the mind and intention of the Senus and people of Rome, then shall the people of Rome celebrate unto my honour, O Jupiter, the great Games for the space of ten daies together, and oblations shall be brought to every Altar, of that price and amounting to that sum which the Senat shall ordain and set down. And what Magistrats soever shall exhibit those Games, or in what place, yea, and at what time soever they shall be represented, the same Games shall be held for good, and reputed as well done, yea, and the offerings accepted as rightly presented. After this, there was published and proclaimed by both Cons. a supplication for the space of a daies. When the Cons. had cast lots for the parting of their governments, the Pretors likewise went presently about the same for their provinces. To M. Junius Bruttus fell both the iurisdiccions, as well of Citizens as aliens. A. Cornel. Mammula had the charge of the Bruttij, M. Emilius Lepidus of Sicily, and L. Oppius Salinator of Sardinia. C. Livius Salinator was L. Admiral of the navy, and L. Aemilius Paulus governor of the nether Spain. And in this manner following, were the armies and forces distributed and appointed. Unto A. Cornelius were assigned the new souldiers which the former year L. Quinctius the Consul, by vertue of an Act of the Senat, had enrolled. And his commission was to defend and keep in order all that tract and coast about Tarentum and Brundisium. As for L. Aemilius Paulus, who was to take a voyage thio the farther Spain, he was allowed (besides the army which he was to receive of M. Fulvius the Pro-Pretor) to have the conduct of threethousand new souldiers footmen, and three hundred horse: so that of them, two third parts should consist of allies of the Latin nation, and one third of Roman Citizens. The supply was sent unto C. Flaminius into the higher Spain, whose commission was renewed for to have the command therewith. M. Emilius Lepidus had commission to receive the government of the province, and withall, the conduct of the army, at the hands of L. Valerius, whom he was to succceed, and if he thought so good, to keep with him in the Province L. Valerius, in quality and place of a Vice-Pretor: and so to divide the province, that the one part should reach from Agigentum to Pachinus; the other half from Pachinus to Tyndarum: also, that L. Valerius should defend the sea-coasts and the river with a fleet of twenty Gallies. The same Pretor aforesaid was to levy and gather a double tenth of corn, and to take order for the convoy thereof to the sea, and so to be embarked and transported into Greece. The like commission had L. Optimus, to exact and take another tenth in Sardinia: but that grain was to be brought to Rome, and not to be carried over into Greece. C. Livius the Pretor and Admiral of the navy, was appointed with 300 sail ready rigged and trimmed, to sail into Greece with all speed, and to receive the ships that Acilius had: likewise to repair, rigge and furnish the old vessels that lay in the harbors, or lay at one side up in docks. M. Junius the Pretor his charge was, to levy mariners and rowers from among the libertins, for to serve that Armado. And there were sent Embassadors into Africa to Carthage, and into Namidia, three into either part, for to seek and purvey corn to be sent into Greece, for which the people of Rome would make present payment. And so wholly employed was the City to prepare and take order for this war, that P. Cornelian the Consul published an Edict, that no Senators, or any that had authority to give their opinion in the Senat, neither any inferior Magistrats, should take any journey out of the City, farther then they might have return again the sameday: Item, that there should not be five Senators absent at once from Rome.
- C. Livius the Pretor, while he used all diligence and care to prepare and provide his fleet, was impeached and hindred a time, by occasion of a debate and contention that arose between him and the Coloners of the sea-side. For when they should be gathered and lent to sea, they appealed to the Tribunes of the Com. from whom they were put over and referred to the Senat: and the Senat with one voice and accord pronounced and determined, that these Coloners were not exempted from sea-service. The Colonies that contended with the Pretor about their immunity were these, Hestia, Pyrgena, Castrum novum, Pyrgi, Antium, Tarracina, Minerva and Stipaga.
- G This done, the Consul Acilius by order from the Senat, consulted with the college of the Feccials or Heralds at arms, and demanded their advice, Whether the war should be proclaimed and defiance given to Antiochus himself in person; or it were sufficient, to intreat and denounce the same to some one of his garrisons? Also whether they would advise to proclaim war against the Acrolians apart by themselves: or whether it were not meet and convenient first to disclaim and renounce their society and friendship, and then to proclaim and denounce hostility? The Feccials answered, that heretofore they had determined and cleared this point, at what time as their opinion was touching Philip, to wit, That it was all one, and made no matter, whether the defiance were given him to his face, or only intimated to some garrisons of his. And as for the Ætolians, this was their mind, that they had quit already their amity, and abandoned all society, in that when our Embassadors to oftentimes had redemanded amends for wrongs done, they never thought good to make restitution or satisfaction. Moreover, the Ætolians had themselves sent defiance first and proclaimed war against the Romans, when as by force they seized Demetrias a City of our allies, and advanced before Chalcis, to assail it both by land and sea; and lastly, in that they had solicited King Antiochus and brought him into Europe for to levy war against the Romans. All things now being sufficiently provided, M. Acilius the Consul published an edict and proclaimed, That all those soldiers whom L. Quintus had enrolled, likewise all those whom he had levied of the allies of the Latine nation, who were to go with him into his province, likewise all the Colonels and Marshals of the second and third legion, should render themselves, and be ready altogether at Brundisium upon the * Ides of May following. Himself upon the * fifth day before the Nones of the same month departed forth of the City clad in his rich coat of arms. And at the same time the Pretors also took their journeys into their severall provinces.

* I suppose that here wanteth the multiplicant number, viz. 100. For it is not answerable to the proportion of the rest that followeth, nor to the magnificence of so great estate, to send some thirty quarters of wheat, who heretofore allowed a hundred times as much, and yet, the same proportion of barley which now is set down,

Much about that time there arrived at Rome Embassadors from two Kings, to wit, Philip of Macedony, and Ptolomæ King of Egypt, promising their aid of men, money, and corn for that war. And besides from Ptolomæ there was brought * 1000 pound weight in gold, and the weight of * 2000 pound of silver: howbeit nothing was received, but much thanks rendered to both the Kings. And whereas both of them offered to come with all their power into Ætolia, and to be there in person, Ptolomæ was discharged of that offer of his, but the Embassadors of Philip received this answer, That he should highly please and content the people of Rome, in case he would not fail the Consul M. Acilius. In like manner there came Embassadors from the Carthaginians and Masaniissa. The Carthaginians made promise of * a thousand Modii of Wheat, and of Barley five hundred thousand for the army, and likewise to bring half so much to Rome: praying the Romans to accept the same at their hands as a free gift and gratuity: adding moreover, that they would man out a fleet at their own charges, and were ready also to make one entire payment of their tribute behind, which they were of duty to pay by sundry terms of many years. The Embassadors of Masaniissa, promised in the behalf of their King, to send five hundred thousand Modii of wheat, 20,000 of barley into Greece to the army, besides 500 men of arms and twenty Elephants, unto M. Acilius the Col. As touching the corn, this answer was returned unto them, that they were content to accept thereof, so that they would take money therefore to the worth. As to the fleet aforesaid, which the Carthaginians made offer of, they acquit them clean, save as many ships as they were to find and provide according to the tenor of the accord and composition between them. Last of all, concerning the tribute money, none would they receive before the day.

While the affairs passed thus at Rome, Antiochus being at Chalcis, because he would not sit still and do nothing, all a winter time, partly himself solicited (by sending Embassadors) the minds of the States, and partly also there came unto him Embassadors from thence of their own accord: and namely, among others, the Epirots presented themselves by the common consent of their whole nation, and the Eleans also came out of Peloponnesus. They of Elys craved aid against the Achæans, who (they verily thought) would take arms against their City, because war was denounced against Antiochus nothing to their will and good liking. Unto them were sent 1000 footmen under the leading of Euphanes the Cretolian. The embassage of the Epirots, plaid with both hands, meaning to deal roundly and simply with no lide, but to go between the bark and the tree. Gladly they would make court to the King and curry favour with him, but so, as they stood in good terms still with the Romans, whom they were loth to offend. For their request to him was, that he would not draw them without great and important cause into the quarrell, considering that they for the defence of all Greece lay open and exposed to Italy, and were late before others to feel the Romans fingers, and receive their first assaults. But in case he were able of himself with his forces by land and sea to defend Epirus, and furnish it with garrisons sufficient, they would with heart and good will accept of him and his into their Cities & port-towns: but if so be he could not effect that, they besought him not to offer them, naked and unarmed men, to the violence of the Roman wars. Their drift was in that embassie (as it appeared) that if the King and his forces came not into Epirus (as they rather thought nay then yea) they might rescue themselves and all they had, safe, entire, and at their own liberty for the Roman armies, and win withall the Kings good grace in that they seemed to make an offer to deceive him: or if any came indeed, yet they might conceive good hope to find favours, and have pardon at the Romans hands, in that they had not expected their succours being so far off, but rather yielded to the forces of Antiochus being present there in person. In such sort they carried themselves in their embassage so perplexed and intricate, that the King knew not well how to answer them readily: but said, that he would send his own Embassadors unto them for to parle and treat of all affairs pertaining in common as well to them as to him. Then went he himself into Ætolia, which countrey in colour and shew pretended these causes of anger and spite against the Romans, that before I have mentioned, to wit, the murder of Barcillus, and the armies by Quintus levied against Coronea, occasioned by a massacre committed upon Roman soldiers: but in very truth this was the reason, The singular discipline and order of that nation in old time, was going downward and endlong many many years, and ages already, and the popular government of many, grown to decay and ruin, which cannot possibly continue long without some change and alteration of State. Well, to Thes he came, where all the principal and chief seats of Demetrius came flocking from all parts to meet him: Where in the General Diet and Council of that Nation (notwithstanding he had founded the battell, and began the fray already by giving the first blow, in that he had forced the Roman garrison near Delium and Chalcis, which were no small feats nor doubtful ventures of war, yet he began with the same kind of speech he first used in the party and conference at Chalcis, and which his Embassadors had followed in the general assembly of the Achæans, namely, demanding that they would enter into amity with him, without professing themselves enemies to the Romans, or pretending hostility against them. But there was no man there but soon found him and saw him welkenough: howbeit there passed an act and decree in favour of the King against the Romans, under a vain and slight pretext and colourable shew of words. Having gained this nation also, he returned to Chalcis, from thence he sent out his letters before unto the States of the Ætolians, that they should meet him in Demetrius, where he would confer and consult with them of all their affairs to be managed; and thither came he by least the day appointed. Aminander also was sent for out of Athamania to this consultation, yea, and Annibal the Carthaginian (whose council was not required a long time) was present at this frequent Diet and Assembly. Much parle and great opening there was as touching the nation of the Thessalians; and all there in place were of opinion, that they should be founded how they stood affected: but about the manner and some circumstance thereof, they were of divers minds, while some advised it to be done and executed out of hand: others thought good to put it off from winter season (considering now they were in the mids thereof) unto the prime and beginning of spring: others again said, that Embassadors only should be sent: and some hot-spurs there were, that gave counsell to go against them with all their forces, yea, and to fright and terrifie them if they made slow halt. Now when all the knot and difficulty of this deliberation consisteth in one point, Annibal was requested by name to deliver his mind and speak to the cause in question: who turned the King and all that were present from other wandering cogitations, and induced them to the entire consideration of the tall war, and to this effect framed his speech in this wise. "If since the time that we passed over into Greece, my hap had been to be called to any counsell, when as some question was touching Embas, the Achæans and the Bæotians, I had delivered that advice then, which now I purpose to utter this day in the question concerning the Thessalians. Above all things my counsell is, that Philip and the Macedonians may by all means possible be wrought to this out association in the war. For as touching Embas, the Bæotians and the Thessalians, who doubteth, but that they (as nations that stand upon their own bottoms and are of no force by themselves) will always flatter them that are present in place, and be ready to crave pardon upon the same fear that they ever shew when they are to take counsell and resolve? who doubteth (I say) but so soon as they shall see the Roman army in Greece, they will to turn to their accustomed obedience, and that it will be imputed to them no fault at all, that when the Romans were so far off, they were not willing to try the force of you (a puissant Prince in person among them) or of your armies? How much rather ought we then, nay, how much better and more important would it be, to joyn Philip unto us thep these? For if he once enter into the cause and be seen in action, he can not possibly start from us nor draw his head out of the collar: and moreover, he bringeth that power with him, which is not to be held for a simple succour & addition to mend our forces, but such as largely of it self without the help of others, was able to make head against the Roman puissance. Let me have this prince on my side, and (be it spoken without offence of any man here) what need I doubt of the sequel & issue? especially when those, by whose means & assistance the Romans prevailed against Philip, I see now ready to enter the field against them? The Ætolians (I say) who as all the world knoweth vanquished Philip, shall now together with Philip, enter into arms and fight against them. Over and besides, Aminander and the whole nation of the Athamans (whose service in the war, next to the Ætolians, stood the Romans in best stead) shall be on our side. Philip at that time (O King Antiochus) sustained the fight and burden of the whole war, when you sat still and stirred not: now both of you together, two most mighty monarchs, with the puissance of all Asia and Europe, shall wage war against one City and people, which (to speak nothing of mine own fortune good or bad) certainly in our fathers daies was not able to make their part good with one only King of the Epirots: how hardy loever they will be when they shall be matched with you both together. But what moved me to think, yea, and assured me, that Philip may be won unto us to joyn in this action? One thing is this, a common good and benefit even the greatest bond that is of society: and yet there is anothers besides it, namely, an inducement proceeding from you that be here of Ætolia: for Thom your Embassador (who is present in place) among other matters that he was wont to alledge for to animat & move Antiochus to come into Greece, evermore assured him of this principally, and vowed that Philip grumbled, bit the lip and fretted, that under the colour and shew of peace, there were imposed upon him hard conditions of servitude and slavery. And he verily, I mean Thom, let out the fell anger of the King, and with all his words compared it to the wood rage of a wild beast bound with chains, or being enclosed in some cage, would willingly break the gates and bars thereof. Now, if he be disposed thus, and of that courage, let us burst his bonds asunder, let us (I say) force open his iron cage, that his rage pent up so long may now break out upon the common enemies. And

"suppose that our embassage effect nothing at his hands, yet may we provide and take order, that "if we cannot work and win him to side with our selves, yet that he shall not combine and band "with our enemies. Your son Selenus is now at Lysimachia, who shall not so soon with these forces "which he hath about him, begin to invade and wall (by the way of Thracia) the confines of Ma-
 "cedony, but he shall withdraw and turn Philip clean away (from giving succour to the Romans) to
 "the defence especially of his own. Thus have you heard mine advice as touching Philip: now for "the whole course and managing of the war, what mine opinion was, you have not been ignorant "of from the first beginning. If then, I might have had mine own waies, and my counsell had been "taken, the Romans should not have received intelligences of the taking of Chalcis in Euboea, "nor of the forcing and winning of a little pile upon Euripus; but they had heard by this, that all
 "the coast of the Ligurians and of the * Cisalpine Gauls was up in arms and on a light fire of war; I "and (which would have feared and frightened them most) that Annibal was in Italy. And (now "things standing as they do) my advice is, that you send for all your forces both by land and sea.
 "Let your carriks and hulks with victuals and provision follow after your armado & ships of war.
 "For in this place, like as we are too few to perform any martiall exploits, so we are too many,
 "considering our smal store of victuals. And when you rallied and united all your force together,
 "divide your navy in two parts: the one you shall keep in the rode of Coryra, to impeach the Ro"mans, that they shall not passe in safety and security, the other you shall cause to sail unto that "coast of Italy which looketh toward Sardinia and Africk. Your self in proper person, with all "your land army shall march onward into the territory of the Bylliones; thence shall ye have good
 "means for the defence of Greece, as making the Romans beleeve, that you are upon the point "to pass the seas, yea, and being ready indeed to crosse over if need should require. This gene"rally is my counsell; mine, I say, who as I will not take upon me a singular skill in all kinds of war,
 "so me thinks I should know how to war with the Romans, as having learned my skill thereby,
 "as well to my cost as advantage, and as much with my good as harm, & look whatsoever design-
 "ment I have projected unto you, I promise and protest, that I will be faithfull and forward in "the execution thereof: and the gods approve and blesse that counsell, which your self shall think "the best. To this effect, in a manner, was the oration of Annibal directed; which all that were "in place and heard it, rather praised for the present, then put in practise and effected afterwards.
 "For no one thing was done of all that he had said, save only Antiochus lent Polyxenidas for a navy "and army out of Asia; yes, there were Embassadors also dispatched to the General Diets of the "Theſſalians. And a day was appointed for the Etolians and Aminander to meet the army at Phe-
 "ra, whither King Antiochus came straight after with his power. And while he staid there, ex"pecting Aminander and the Etolians, he sent out one Philip a Megapolitan, with two thousand men
 "to gather out the bones and reliques of the Macedonians about Cynoscephala, where the war with
 "Philip was determined, and the quartel decided by a famous battell: were it that therein he fol"lowed his own head and took a conceit, thereby to wind himself into grace and favour with the "Macedonian Nation, and to bring the King into obloquie and disgrace, because he left his souldiers
 "unburied; or that, as it is the vein (or vanity rather) engrafted in Kings by kind, he set his mind "and busied his spirits in matters, for appearance gay and goodly, but in effect fond & foolish. There "he made a mount (as it were) of a number of bones gathered together into one place, that lay scat"tering and strewed here and there: a thing no doubt that the Macedonians conged him no thank "for, and which Philip (you may be sure) took in foul scorn and malicious disdain. And therefore
 "Philip, who at that time minded to take counsell of Fortune, and to be directed by her, as she en-
 "clined now, sent to Marcus Babinus the Vice-Pretor, and advertised him, how Antiochus invaded
 "Theſſaly, and if it pleased him to stir out of his winter harbour, he would meet him, that they might "confer both together what were best to be done.

While Antiochus lay now encamped before Phera, where Aminander and the Etolians had
 "joynd with him, there came Embassadors from Larissa, expostulating, Wherein the Theſſalians
 "had so offended either by deed or word, that he would molest and trouble them with war? and "withall beseeching him to retire & withdraw his forces, and debate the matter (if he had ought a"gainst them) by his Embassadors. At the same time they sent five hundred men in armes, well ap"pointed, under the governance of Hippolochus, to lie there in garison, who because they could not "pass thither, by reason that all the avenues were seized and kept by the Kings forces, returned to "Scotusa. As for the Embassadors of the Larissians, the King made them a gracious answer, and said, "That he was entred into Theſſaly, not by way of hostility to distresse them, but in friendly man"ner to maintain and establish the freedome of the Theſſalians. Likewise he sent an Embassador to "Phera, to signifie so much to them and in the same terms. But the Pheraens giving him no an"swer again, dispatched unto the King an Embassador of their own, one Pausanias, a principal man "of their City. Who after he had pleaded the semblable remonstrances to those, that had been "in the like case alledged, and laid forth in the behalf and name of the Chalcidians, in that Coun-
 "cill holden near the streights of Euripus, and besides, uttered something else with more bold-
 "nesse and courage; the King dismissed him, after he had willed them to consider more of the "matter, and be well advised, that they took not that counsell which anon they would repent, "whiles they sought to be too wary, provident, and forasting the future time. When this em-
 "bassage was related at Phera, the Citizens took no long time to deliberat, but soon resolved in "the maintenance of their faith and loyalty to the Romans for to undergo whatsoever hazard the

A the Fortune of war should present unto them. Whereupon both they addressed themselves to defend the City with all their might, and also the King began to assault and batter the walls on all parts at once. And knowing well enough (as in truth there was no doubt) that in the issue of the siege of that City which he first enterprised, lay the whole importance and consequence of all, either to make him despised ever after, or feared and dread of the Thessalians, therefore he terrified the besieged inhabitants, on every side, and by all means possible that he could devise. The first assault they sustained stoutly and manfully; but afterwards seeing many of the defendants were either overthrown and slain, or grievously hurt and wounded, their hearts began to quail: yet reclaimed by the rebukes and chastisements of their captains and leaders, and animated by their effectual exhortations, to persist still in their purpose and resolution, they quit the utmost compass of their wall, leaving a what default they were for want of men, and retired themselves more inward into the City, into one part thereof, which was strongly fortified with a more and less circuit and compass than the other. At the length, overcome with travel and calamities, and fearing that if they were forced and taken by assault, they should find no mercy nor pardon with the conqueror, they yielded themselves. The King following the train of victory, delayed no time; but while the night was fresh, sent four thousand armed men presently to Scorussa, where the townsmen made no stay, but rendered the town and themselves incontinently, having before their eyes the fresh bleeding example of the Phereans, who tamed by mere force and wofull miseries, were compelled to do that at last which they obstinately refused at the first. Together with the City itself was surrendered also Hippotobus and the Larissæan garrison under his hand. All of them the King sent away without any hurt or violence offered unto their persons: for he thought thereby to win the hearts and love of the Larissæans. Having accomplished these exploits within ten daies after his first coming to Phera, he marched towards Crano with all his army, and at his first coming won it. Then he reigned and seized Cypara and Metropolis, and the boroughs & forts about them: so as now all those quarters were subdued and put under his subjection, except Atrax and Gyrrus. Then he determined to assault Larissa, supposing, that either upon the fearful terror of other Cities forced, or in regard of his demerit in dismissing the garrison so courteously, or by the present example of so many Cities yielded unto him, they would not long persist in their obstinacy. And for to terrifie them the more, he commanded the elephants to march in the forefront of the vanguard, and approached himself in a square battell, with four sides, in such D sort as the hearts of many of the Larissæans wavered in doubtful suspense, between forced fear of present enemies, and kind regard of absent friends.

In this time Aminander, with the whole youth and manhood of the Athamians, became master of Pelinaus. Menippus also with three thousand Etolian footmen and two hundred horse went to Perrebia, won Mallia and Cyrria by assault, and wasted the territory of Tripolis. Having performed these exploits with great expedition, and celerity, they returned to Larissa unto the King, and arrived even then when as the King was in consultation what to do with Larissa: for the councill was divided into diverse opinions. Some thought it good to proceed forcibly, and not to defer and assault the Cities with fabricks and engins of battery on all sides at once: alledging that the town being situated in a plain towards the champain field side, might be approached unto with ease and invested every way. Others again inferred one while, that there was no comparison between the strength of this City and of Phera: other while, that it was now winter time, and a season of the year far unfit for warlike executions, and most of all other for the siege and assault of Cities. As the King thus hung in the equal ballance of hope and despair, the Embassadors of Pharsalus arrived, who, as good hap was, being come to surrender up their town, revived his spirits and mightily comforted his heart.

M. Babius in this mean while having parlied and conferred with Philip in the Dalsaretians country, sent Appius Claudius by the common advice of them both, to the succour and defence of Larissa; who passed through Macedony, and by long journeyes came to the top of those hills that command Gonnus. Now this Gonnus is a town twenty miles distant from Larissa, seated just F in the very streights of that Forrest and passe called Tempe; who having taken up a larger circuit of ground to encamp in, then was proportionable to his number, and made more fires in shew then need was for that company, gave semblance unto the enemy (which was the thing he aimed at), that all the Roman forces were there, together with King Philip. King Antiochus therefore proceeding unto his army, that the unreasonable winter that approached, after he had stayed one only day before Larissa, dislodged, and thence departed, and so returned to Demetrius. The Etolians likewise and Athamians repaired to their own countries.

Appius, albeit he saw that the siege was levied (which was the only cause of his coming) yet down he went to Larissa to encourage and confirm the hearts of the allies against the time to come. And a two-fold joy there was, both because the enemies were gone and had quitted their country, and also for that they saw the Roman garrison within their walls. King Antiochus departed from Demetrius to Chalcis, where he fell in love with a damsell of that City, daughter of Chalcipolus a Chalcidian. Now after he made means to the maidens father first by intercession of messengers and mediators, and after by importuning him in his own person with earnest requests by word of mouth (who was very loth and unwilling to entangle & tie himself, in matching her to high above his own calling) at length so overcame the man, that he obtained his desire: and as if it had been a time of settled and confirmed peace, he proceeded to consummate and celebrate but the murage. And forgetting clean, how at one time he had undertaken the charge of two affairs so important, to wit, the war with the Romans, and the deliverance of Greece, he passed away the rest of the winter in feasts and banquetts, and in those delights and pleasures, which ordinarily (you wot well) follow upon the libell drinking of wine: yea, and when he had thereby rather wearied his body than fulfilled his appetite, he gave himself to sleep without compasse. The like riot and loose life took hold of the rest of the Kings captains, by example in all places, but in Patra especially, such as commanded the garrisons. Nay, the very soldiers were let loose and given over to take voluptuous waies, and not one of them would put on armor, keep the watch, attend the guard, or do any thing pertaining to the duty and charge of a soldier. And therefore at the beginning of the spring, when he was come by Phoci and Cheronea, to the Rendez, where he had appointed from all parts his forces to meet, he soon perceived that the soldiers had spent the winter as licentious as their leaders, and kept no better order and straighter discipline. Then he commanded Alexander the Acarnanian, and Menippus the Macedonian, to lead the army to Stratus, a town in Etolia. Himself having done sacrifice at Delphi to the honour of Apoll, went forward to Nassipsum. And after the Diet holden of all the States of Etolia, in the way which leadeth to Stratus, along by Chalcis and Lyfimachia, he encountered his own forces afore said, that came by the gulf of Malea. Where Musfilobus, a Principal Acarnanian, but wrought and bought with many gifts and presents, not only himself won that nation to take part, & to side with the King, but also had drawn to his own mind and affection Clytus their Pretor, who at that time had the sovereign rule there, and might do all in all. He seeing that the Leucadians (who are the chief of all the Acarnanians) could not be easily induced nor brought to revolt, for the awe wherein they stood of the Roman fleet, which either was with Attidius, or about Cephala, went cunningly to work with them. For having delivered his opinion in their generall Council, that the inland parts of Acarnania were to be well guarded and defended, and that as many as were able to bear arms should go forth to Medie and Tyrbeum, for fear those places should be seized by Antiochus and the Etolians: there were again some who made answer and said, how there was no such need that all should be raised and levied to tumultuously in batt, for a garrison of five hundred men was sufficient. And when he had obtained that number of young & able men, he placed three hundred of them in garrison at Medie, and two hundred at Tyrbeum: his reach and drift was to have them put into the Kings hands for hostages. And even at that time arrived the Kings Embassadors at Medie, whose embassage being heard, they laid their heads together and consulted in the publick assembly what answer to return unto the King. Some were of opinion to continue still in the Roman society: others were of advice again, that the Kings offer of amity was not to be rejected. The councill of Clytus was mean and indifferent between both, and therefore accepted, to wit, that they should addresse the Embassadors to the King, to intreat him that he would permit them to take a day of deliberation upon a matter of such consequence in a full Diet of the Acarnanians. In this Embassage Musfilobus, and those of his faction were employed of set purpose: who having dispatched messengers covertly to King, to advertise him to approach the town with his forces, trifled out the time themselves, and made no halt to set forward in their embasie. Whereupon these Embassadors were scarcely gone forth of the City, when Antiochus was entered the borders, and soon shewed himself hard at the gates. And while they that with nothing of this treason were affrighted, and in great trouble and tumult, called the youth hastily to arm, he was by Clytus and Musfilobus let into the City. Some willingly of themselves came running about the King: those also that were of the adverse part, for very fear joynd with him. Whom he seeing to be afraid and terrified, he entertained with gracious words, and so gently handled them, that in hope of his clemency so much divided and spoken of abroad, certain States of Acarnania revolted and turned unto him. Then from Medie he went to Tyrbeum, unto which place he had sent Musfilobus and his Embassadors afore hand. But the treachery and deceit at Medie being discovered, made the Tyrbeans more wary and carefull then otherwise fearfull, who made him this plain direct answer without any double ambiguity, that they would admit of no new alliance, without the advice and authority of the Roman Generals: so they shut their gates, and disposed armed men upon their walls. Now it fell out very fitly and happily for confirming and encouraging the hearts of the Acarnanians, that C. Octavius sent by Quintus, having received a garrison and some few ships of A. Posthumius, who by Attidius the Lieutenant had been appointed Governour of Cephalaria, was come to Laurium, and much comforted the Allies, and put them in good hope, who also gave them to understand, that M. Acilius the Consul had already passed the seas with his legions, and the Romans were encamped in Thessaly. And for as much as this bruit carried a great likelihood of truth, by reason that the season of the year served now for navigation, the King after he had planted a garrison at Medie and in other towns of Acarnania, departed from Tyrbeum, and passing through the Cities of Etolia and Phocis, returned to Chalcis.

Much about the time M. Bavius and King Philip, who had communed and devised together before (during the winter) in the Dardareans country, having sent Appius Claudius into Thessaly, for to raise the siege before Larissa: and because the season then was unmeet and too soon for execution of any exploit, were retired to their wintering harbours. Now in the beginning of the Spring joynd all their forces together and came down into Thessaly. (Now at that time was Antiochus in Acarnania.) And at their first coming, Philip began to lay siege unto

Mallen

A. Mallac and Babius to Phacium: which when he had forced in manner at the first assault he won Phacium also with like expedition. From whence having retired himself to Ayax, he took Chyrtis, and so consequently surprised Enitium, and after he had placed garrisons in these towns that he had thus recovered, he joyned with Philip again, lying in secret at Mallac. Upon the very coming of the Roman army, when the townsmen had yielded themselves either for fear of forces, or for hope of pardon, they marched jointly together with one army to recover those towns whereof the Athamans were seized: to wit, Aginiam, Ericinium, Gomphi, Silava, Tricca, Melissae, and Phalaria. After this, they invailed Pedinum, where Philip the Megapolitan lay in garrison with five hundred foot, and forty horse: but before they gave the assault, they sent a messenger to Philip to give him warning, that he should not adventure to try the utmost hazard. But he returned this answer again right stoutly unto them, that he would be content to commit himself to the Romans or the Thessalians, he passed not whether, but put his life and estate into the hands of King Philip he never would. Now when it appeared that they were to proceed by force, and for that it seemed that Limnaea also at the same time might be assaulted, it was thought expedient that the King should go to Limnaea, and Babius stand still to batter and force the town of Pollinium.

It fortuned at the same time that M. Acilius the Cos. having passed the sea with a power of 10000 foot, and 2000 horse and fifteen Elephants, commanded certain chosen Colonels of footmen to conduct all the Infantry to Larissa, whiles himself with the Cavalry came to King Philip before Limnaea. At the coming of the Consul the town was yielded incontinently: the Kings garrison was delivered, and the Athamans withall. Then the Consul went from Limnaea to Pellinaeum, where the Athamans yielded first: and afterwards Philip also the Megapolitan rendered himself. And as he came down from the fort, Philip the King chanced to meet with him, and in scorn and derision commanded his men to salute him with the stile of King, and himself also by way of mockage came close unto him, and greeting him by the name of brother Philip, scoffing and jesting in broad terms, far unfitting, I wot, his royall Majesty. Then was he brought before the Cos. and put in ward, and not long after sent bound to Rome. All the multitude besides of the Athamans, as also of King Antiochus his souldiers, which were within the garrisons of those towns that were surrendered about that time were delivered unto Philip, who amounted to the number of 3000. The Consul departed to Larissa to consult and take advice for the generall course of the whole war. And in his way there met him Embassadors from Pieria and Medrapolis, for to render their Cities. Philip having courteously and lovingly intreated above all other the prisoners of the Athamans, that by their means he might win the grace and favour of that nation, and conceived some hope to conquer Athamania, led his army thither, and sent his captives aforehand into their severall Cities. Now they were of great account and reputation among their countyme, and withall made report of the King his clemency toward them, and how liberally and bountifully besides he used them: And Aminander verily, whose presence and majesty had kept some of them in allegiance, fearing lest he should be delivered into the hands of Philip (who long time had been his mortall enemy; and unto the Romans, whom he knew to have just cause at that time to be offended with him for his revolt, departed out of his own Realm with his wife and children, and retired himself to Ambracia. Thus all Athamania became subject to King Philip, and at his pleasure.

The Consul so journeyed certain daies at Larissa, especially for to refresh his beasts, which first had been sea-sick, and afterwards were tired with long travel: and thus when he had renewed, as it were, and repaired his army with a little rest and repose, he marched to Cneta. At his coming thither these towns, to wit, Pharsalus, Scotussa, and Phera, together with King Antiochus his garrisons that lay there, were yielded up unto him. And having put unto their choice, either to be gone or carry still with him: as many of them as he saw willing, and those were about a thousand, he delivered unto King Philip: the rest he sent back disarmed to Demetrias. Then he regained Proerna and the fortresses and places there about it. Then began he to conduct forward his army toward the gulph of Malea: and when he approached the straights, upon which the town Thaumacia is situate, all the flower of the youth in their armour quit the City, and put themselves in ambush about the woods and passages, and from the higher ground charged upon the Romans in their march. The Consul at the first sent certain unto them to parley at hand with them, and to see if they could scare them from such desperate outrage: but perceiving that they persisted still as they began, he commanded a Colonel with two ensignes of souldiers to fetch a compass about, in such sort, that he got between those armed men and the town, and kept them from entrance, whereby he possessed himself of the City, being void of defendants. They they that lay in the forefront in ambush, hearing an outcry behind their backs of the town taken, fled backward out of all parts of the wood, and fell upon the sword. The Consul then departed from Thaumacia, and the second day came as far as the river Sperchius, and so forward unto the territory of the Hypaeans, which he spoiled.

During the time of these occurrences, Antiochus lay at Chalcis, who by this time seeing that he had gotten in Greece, but the pleasure of one wintering, spent so deliciously in Chalcis, and a dishonourable marriage, began to blame the Etolians for their vain promises, and especially Theus: but Antiochus he had in great admiration, reputing him not only for a sage and prudent man, but also for a true Prophet, who foretold him of all things that then were come to pass: howbeit for fear that his cold slackness might not overthrow that quite, which his rash folly had begun and enterprised, he sent out his courriers into Etolia, to give them warning to levy all their youth and assemble them together: and himself for his own part had brought thither almost 10000 footmen, who were made up full and furnished by them that after came out of Asia, and 100 horsemen besides. To this place perceiving that there repaired smaller numbers by many degrees than ever at any time before, and that they were but the Nobles only and some few of their vassals, who protested, that they had done their endeavor to levy out of their Cities as many as possibly they could: but neither by authority, nor for love and favour, nor yet with absolute command, were they able to prevail or do any good with them that refused warfare: and seeing himself thus forsaken on all sides, as well of his own subjects who dragged behind in Asia, as of his allies who performed not those matters, in the hope whereof they had called him to assist them, he withdrew himself within the Straights of Thermopylae.

This mountain divideth Greece in the very middle, like as Italy is parted in twain by the ridge of the Appennine. On the fore-part of this straight and forrest of Thermopylae toward the North lyeth Epirus and Perthubia, Magnesia and Thessaly, also the Phthiotz of Achaia, and the gulph Malea: but more southward is discovered the greatest part of Etolia and Acarmania, Phocis, Locris, and Boetia, together with the Island Euboea joyning close thereto: behind it is situate the country of Attica, running into the sea like a promontory, and besides it Peloponnesus. This mountain taking his beginning at Lencus and the Ponant or Western sea, reacheth through Etolia to the Levant or Easterly Ocean, and is so full of rocks and rough crags between, that no whole armies, no, nor so much as single travellers lightly appointed, can find but hardly and with much ado the waies and paths to pass through the utmost brows and the hills of this mountain bending toward the east, they call Oeta: and the highest pitch and knop thereof, is called Callidromos; at the foot whereof lyeth the valley leading toward the gulph of Malea, wherein the plain is not above threescorpe paces broad. And this is the only high and port-way by which an army may march, if it be not otherwise impeached. And hereupon it is, that the passage is called * Pyle: and of some (because there are found therein certain natural hot waters or bains) Thermopylae: even that very place which is so famous and renowned for the memorable death of the Lacedaemonians more than for any worthy battell against the Persians. Here lay encamped Antiochus at this present (carrying nothing that mind nor resolution as those Lacedaemonians did) within the gates as it were of the Straights, where he enclosed and stopped the passage besides, with strong defences: And when he had cast a double rampire and trench, yea, and raised a mure and wall where need was (which to do the place afforded him great plenty of stone lying every where) and had made all sure: presuming confidently that the Roman army would never venture nor be able to break through those barricadoes that way: he sent of those 4000 Etolians (for so many were met together) some to keep a garrison in Heraclea, situate even before the very gulph and freight; and others to Hypata: for that he made no doubt but the Consul would assail Heraclea, and many posts brought word, that all about Hypata was already wasted.

Now the Consul having spoiled the territory of Hypata first, and then of Heraclea, (where the Etolians aids did no good and served to no purpose in the one place or the other) pitched his camp over-against the King, even in the very mouth of the gulph, near the fountains of the hot waters aforelaid: both those regiments above-named of the Etolians were got within the town Heraclea, and there kept themselves sure. Antiochus, who before he saw his enemies, thought all was fast enough and sufficiently fenced, began then to fear lest the Roman soldiers would find out some privy paths and waies, thereby they might pass and get over those high hills that commanded his camp: for a rumour ran, that the Lacedaemonians in times past were so enclosed by the Persians, and of late daies also King Philip was likewise compassed and environed by these very same Romans. Whereupon he dispatched a messenger to the Etolians in Heraclea, willing them to do him thus much service yet in these his wars, as to seize the tops of those hills and to keep them that the Romans might have no passage that way. Upon this message received, there arose some dissension among the Etolians. Some were of mind to obey the King his will and commandment, and to go accordingly; but others thought better to tarry still at Heraclea, to attend upon fortune, and see what would happen: to the end, that if the King should chance to be vanquished by the Consul, they might have in readiness their forces fresh and in heart, to succour and aid their own Cities near at hand; or if his luck were to defeat the Consul, then they might follow the Romans in chase, when they were disbanded and scattered asunder. Both parts, thus divided as they were, not only persisted still in their severall designments, but also put the same in execution by themselves. For two thousand of them remained at Heraclea; the other two thousand parted themselves three waies, namely, to Callidromos, to Rhodunisia, and Tichius, (these are the names of three principall high hills;) and each company took and held one. The Consul when he saw that the Etolians were possessed of these higher places, sent M. Porcius Cato and L. Valerius Flaccus, two of his Lieutenants (who both had been Consuls) with two thousand chosen men against these holds of the Etolians, to wit, Flaccus against Rhodunisia and Tichius, and Cato against Callidromos: himself before that he advanced his battell against his enemies, made a brief speech unto his souldiers in this manner: "My souldiers, I see that the most part of you even of every quality and degree, are they that in this very Province sometime served under the conduct, charge, and government of T. Quinctius in the Macedonian war. The Straights

A of that passage, then near the river Alone, were far more difficult to gain and get over than this B in for here are very gates, yet, and one naturall way (as it were) to pass through, as if all else were stopped up between two seas. There were more stronger defenses and sconces against them at that time, and also planted in places more convenient and commodious. The army of the enemies then, was both for number greater, & for men's soldiery much better: for therein were the Macedonians, the Thracians, and the Illyrians, all most fierce and warlike nations: in this are Syrians and Asiatick Greeks, or half Arians, the vaigst kind of people of all others, and born to serve. The King there, namely Philip, a most noble warrior exercised and inured ever from his youth in the neighbour wars of the Thracians and Illyrians, & all the nations bordering upon him: but this Antiochus (to say nothing of all his life besides) is he, who being come out of Asia into Europe, for to make war upon the people of Rome, hath done all the long winter time nothing more memorable than this, That for to please his wanton lust he hath taken to wife the daughter of a private person, a man (I say) of low degree and base quality among other Citizens: & this new married man fed fat and franked (as I may so say) with dainty suppers & delicate bride-blankets, is come forth (forsooth) to fight a battell. His whole strength and all his hope hath been in the Ætolians, a people of all others most vain, unconstant, and unthankfull, as ye have tried heretofore, and Antiochus findeth true at this present. For neither assembled they in great number, nor possible was it to keep them together in the camp: nay, which more is, they mutine among themselves, and having demanded and required the guard of Hypata and Morathia, they have defended neither the one nor the other. Some of them are fled to the tops of the mountains: others have shut themselves within Horaeia. The King himself hath confessed plainly, that he was never so hardy as to meet in plain field and affront the enemy, no, nor so much as to pitch his camp in open ground: in that abandoning all that country before him, which he vaunted and bragged that he had taken from us and Philip, he hath hidden himself among the rocks, & hath not encamped before the entrance of the gullet and straights (as the same both of the Lacedæmonians in times past) but pitched his tents far within. And to bewray his cowardly fear, What difference is there between so doing, and housing himself within the walls of some City for to be besieged? But neither shall those narrow straights save him, no more than those steep hills defend the Ætolians, which they have seized. This one thing hath been for a while provided for on all sides, that ye shall have nothing to make head against, but your enemies.
 D Now must ye resolve upon this point, That ye fight not only for the liberty of Greece and yet even this also were a brave and honourable title, to be said for to deliver the same now out of the hands of Antiochus and the Ætolians, which before you freed from King Philip: nor that ye shall have no other reward and recompence for your pains; but that which we shall find now in the Kings camp, but also that the great provision and furniture which daily is expected from Ephesus, shall be your prize and booty, and that ye shall hereafter make a way for the Roman Empire into Asia, Syria, and all those most wealthy and rich Realms, even as far as to the Levant sun. And what shall let us then, but that from Gades to the red sea we bound and limit our State and Dominion, even with the very Ocean that environeth and compasseth the round globe of the earth? What shall hinder us, I say, but that all the nations of the world shall ho-noure and worship the Roman name next unto the immortall gods? Prepare your hearts therefore and courages answerable to so high rewards, that with the leave and help of the gods we may to-morrow fight a field. After this speech the assembly brake up, and the soldiers being dismissed, made ready their armor and weapons, before they took repast or repose. And in the morning, by dawning of the day, the Consul put out the signal of battell, and for his army in array, with a narrow and pointed front, according to the nature and straightness of the place. The King seeing the ensignes of his enemies, led forth his forces likewise. Part of his light armours he planted before the rampier and trench in the forefront: then he placed the flower and strength of the Macedonians, whom they call Sarissophori, i.e. Pikemen, for the safety and safeguard of his defences and fortifications. And to flank these on the left side, he put the archers, the slingers of darts, and slingers of stones, hard upon the foot of the hill, that from the higher ground they might al-fail and peck the naked sides of the enemies. On the right flank of these Macedonians, at the very edge and point of the moines and defences, which as they were enclosed and mounded with those places which reach to the sea, and are unpassable by reason of the bogs, muddy marshes, quagmires, and quicksands, he set the Elephants with their ordinary and usual guard. After them his horsemen and men of arms. Then leaving an indifferent space between, he ranged the rest of his forces in the second ward or middle battillon. The Macedonians who were bestowed before the camp and the trench, at the first sustained the Roman assault enough (who assailed on every side to make an entry) for much help they had of them, who from the upper ground weighed bullets out of their slings, as thick as an hail storm, who lashed darts also, and shot arrows besides. But when afterwards greater numbers of enemies pressed upon them, and charged them with such violence as possibly might not be endured, they gave ground, and retired within their fortifications, keeping yet their array and their ranks whole. And then from the rampier they made (as it were) another pallisado with their long pikes that they held out afore them. Now the height of their camp was so reasonable, that as it afforded some rise and vantage of ground for their bowmen to fight upon it, so by reason of the length of their spears, they might reach the enemy under them, in so much as many of the Romans approaching rashly, and venturing to clamber up, were run clean through: and either they had given over and done nothing, or else more of them had died for it, but that M. Porcius Cato having beaten from the top of Calidone the Ætolians, and slain a great part of them (for he surprised them suddenly at unawares, and most of them fast asleep) appeared upon the hill that commandeth the camp, Flaccus sped not so well at Talys and Rhoduntia, who laboured to get up those cliffs and holds, but to no purpose. The Macedonians and the rest that were in the Kings host and camp, at first, when they descried afar off nothing but a multitude and number marching, imagined verily, that they were the Ætolians, who having discovered the battell and fight a good way off were coming to aid them. But so soon as they beheld and discerned near at hand the ensignes and armour of the Romans, they took themselves in their own error, and were upon a sudden stricken with such fear, that they all flung their weapons away, and fled. But both their fortifications and defences in the way, & also the narrowness of the vale through which they were to be pursued, hindered the Romans in following the chase. And the Elephants above all which were in the rereward took up the ground so, as that the footmen could hardly pass by them, and the horsemen by no means possible: so affrighted were the horses, and caused more trouble and disorder among themselves, than they did during the battell. Besides the Romans staid sometime behind, whiles they rifled and ransacked the camp. Howbeit, they had the enemy in chase that day as far as Lylæum, killing and taking in the very way, not only many horses and men, but also slaying the Elephants which they could not take alive; which done, they returned to their own camp, which that day had been assailed by the Ætolians, who were of the garrison of Heraclea: but that enterprise, as it was exceeding bold and audacious, so it took no effect at all. The Consul having at the reliefe of the third watch the night ensuing, sent before his Cavalry to pursue the enemy, advanced likewise the ensignes of his legions forward by break of day. The King by this time had won some ground, and got a good way before: for he never gave over galloping with bridle in horse neck, untill he had recovered Elania. Where first he gathered together the broken ends of his army thus dispersed in flight, and so having rallied a small and poor troop of souldiers, and the same armed by the halts, he retired to Chalcis. The Roman Cavalry was not able to overtake the King himself at Elania, but overthrew and cut off a great part of his army, which either for weariness rested themselves dragging behind, or else were scattered one from the other, as missing their way in those unknown quarters, going as they did without their guides: and setting aside five hundred which kept about the King, there was not one that escaped of the whole army. Which was but a small number in proportion of 10000, (if they were no more) for so many (according to Polybius) we have written that the King conducted over with him for his part into Greece. What were they then to that greivous war, which (if we beleeve Valerius Antias) came with the King for he writeth that he had in his host threescore thousand, and that forty thousand were slain of them, and above five thousand taken prisoners, with the loss of military ensignes two hundred and thirty. Of Romans there died in all a hundred and fifty.

As the Consul marched with his army through Phocis and Boeotia, the States and Cities which were privy to the revolt, and partly culpable, stood without their gates with their insules and veils in token of peace, and craved mercy, fearing they should have been pilld and ransacked as enemies. But his host journeyed every day as in a peaceable and friend-country, doing no hurt or wrong to any earthly creature, untill they were come into the territory of Corona: where the Statue or Image of Antiochus erected in the Temple of Minerva Ionea kindled their choler, and the souldiers were permitted to spoil the country lying about that Temple. But bechinking themselves that (considering the said Statue was set up with the publike consent of all Bœotia) it was an indignity to deal so hardly with that territory only of Corona, the souldiers were immediately called in and reclaimed, and so they ceased the waiting and spoiling thereof. The Boeotians only had a check and rebuke by words for carrying so unthankfull hearts to the Romans, of whom they had so lately received such high favours and benefits.

At the very time of the battell aforesaid, there rode at anchor ten ships of the Kings, in the gulph of Malta near to Therionium under the charge and conduct of Isidorus. To which place Alexander the Acarnanian, being fled from the conflict, fresh bleeding and full of grievous wounds, brought news of the unfortunate fight. Whereupon the ships in great fear for this late terror, made haste and away to Cenæum in Eubœa, where Alexander died, and was interred. But three other ships which were come out of Asia, and lay in the same rode, upon the news of the defeat of the army, returned to Ephesus. And Isidorus crossed the seas from Cenæum to Demetrias, & peradventure the King were fled thither. About that very time, A. Attilius the Admiral of the Roman navy intercepted and surprised great store of the Kings provisions, which had passed already that straits near the Island Andros. Some ships he sunk, others he boarded and took: as for those that came hindmost in the rereward, they turned sail, and shaped their course into Asia. Attilius being returned to Pyraeum (from whence he came) with a fleet of ships taken from the enemies, divided great store of corn both among the Athenians, and other allies also of that country.

Antiochus somewhat before the Consul his coming, loosed from Chalcis, and first fell with the Island Tennus, and afterwards sailed to Ephesus. Against the Consul his arrivall at Chalcis the gates were set open for him, and Aristotele the Captain there for the King, quit the place upon the approachment of the Consul. In like manner other Cities in Eubœa yielded without resistance. And so within few daies (when all troubles were appeased, and set in quiet order without the hurt and damage lant labour night and day. Thus for the space of twenty four daies they had no rest nor sleep, but day and night was all one unto them, maintaining fight still, and labouring with the same intention against the enemies that assailed the City in all four quarters at once. When the Consul knew once that the Etolians were wearied and overtoiled (partly by counting the time, and partly by that which he had learned of certain fugitives) he used this policy and stratagem. About midnight he sounded the retreat, and having drawn all his soldiers at once from the assault, held them quiet in the camp untill the third hour of the day. After that he began to give a fresh charge, and continued it unto midnight following, and so gave over again untill the same hour before morn. The Etolians supposing verily that the cause why they surceased the assault, was for very weariness (like as themselves were tired out) so soon as the Romans had the retreat sounded unto them, departed every man from his ward and quarter, as if they also by the same signall were called away, and shewed not themselves in armor upon the walls before the third hour of the next day. The Consul having at one time given over the battery foresaid at midnight, began at the fourth watch a fresh assault again with all forcible means in three parts: and at one side, he gave commandment to T. Sempronius to keep his men together, and intently to observe and wait for the signall: assuring himself that in the alarm by night, the enemies would run to those places from whence they heard the noise. The Etolians, many of them being sound asleep, had much to do to rouse themselves, and were loath to rise up from their sweet sleep, their bodies being so weary with toiling moiling, and watching before. Some of them who were yet awake in the dark to the place where the assailants made a noise. Their enemies laboured to get into the town some by mounting over the ruins and breaches of the broken wall, others by scaling and climbing with ladders. And against them the Etolians ran from all parts, ready to succour and help. One quarter, whereas there stood houses without the City, was neither defended nor assailed: but as there were some ready and waited for the signal to give the assault, so there was not one of the other part for to resist and defend. Now began the day to peep, when as the Consul put forth the signall, and the soldiers began to mount over into the City, and found none to withstand them: some entered at the walls half broken down, others scaled them with ladders where they stood whole and sound. And the cry was not so soon heard that the City was taken, but the Etolians left their guard on all sides, and fled into the Castle. The soldiers that had won the town were permitted by the Col. to rife and ransack it: which was not done so much upon anger and despite, as in this regard, that the soldiers who had been kept short & fasting thus long (notwithstanding so many towns recovered out of the enemies hands) might once at length in some one place taste the fruit of victory. The Col. having called from thence about noon, the soldiers unto him, divided them into two parts, whereof he commanded the one to cast about the foot of the hill unto a rock or cliff, which being in height equal to the Castle aforesaid, was notwithstanding divided from it by a valley between, seeming as if it had been sometime a part thereof and cut from it. Now these two points of the hills shot up so near, together in the head that from the top of the one a man might lance a dart into the Castle or fortress. The Col. with the other half of the soldiers staid beneath, expecting a sign and token from them that were to get up the cliff behind, ready thereupon to mount up from the town side into the fort. The Etolians that were within the Castle could neither abide at the first the shout of those that had seized the cliff, nor afterwards the assault of the Romans from the City, both for that their hearts failed them and were daunted already, and also because they were unprovided of all necessities for to endure any long siege and assault: considering that women and children and all the other impotent multitude were to bear arms, were got thither in so great numbers, that the place was hardly able to receive and contain much less to keep and maintain them: and therefore at the first assault they cast down their weapons and yielded. Among other principal personages of the Etolians, Damocritus also was delivered, he, who in the beginning of the war when T. Quintus desired to see a copy of the Decree of the Etolians for the sending for Antiochus, answered, That he would shew it him in Italy, when the Etolians lay there encamped. For this proud speech of his the Romans now conquerors, were the gladder that they had got him into their hands.

During the time that the Romans assailed Heraclea, Philip also beleaged and harried Boeotia, according as it was before agreed between them: for near unto Thermopyle, at what time as the Col. returned out of Boeotia, he met with him, of purpose to signify his joy in the behalf of him and the people of Rome for their achieved victory: and also to excuse himself by occasion of sickness, that he was not present with him in person in the managing of the wars. From thence they parted sunder, and took divers waies, for to assault these two Cities (as I said) both at once and distant they were one from the other near seven miles. And so much as Lamia was situate upon an hill therefore the town discovered and overlooked all the country about, but especially on that side toward Heraclea, where, by reason that it seemeth a less compass, it representeth a full prospect to the eye. When as the Romans and Macedonians labouring and striving who could do better, were day and night employed either about their fabricks and moneys work, or else in skirmish and fight: the Macedonians found more difficulty than they, in this respect, that the Romans were busied in platforms, mantlers, and works all above ground: but the Macedonians were put to undermine: and oftentimes (as it falleth out in such stony and craggy ground) they met with hard flints and rags not minable, and such as no iron or steel tool was able to touch and pierce. The King seeing little good done by this means, and his enterprise going but slowly forward,

A ward began to sound the cornicles, and to crowne them to render the City, using the mediation therein of their chief Citizens whom he perswaded withall this reckoning he made; that if Heraclæa were forced before it, they within the City would sooner yield unto the Romans than to him, and so the Consul should win all she askt to himselfe for levying the siege. And nothing was he short of his count; for immediately upon the winning of Heraclæa, a messenger came unto him from the Consul willing him to forsake the assault and the siege: alledging, it was more reason, that the Roman soldiers who had fought in ranged battell with the Ætolians, should have the reward and recompence of the victory. By this means Lamis was abandoned, and by thierm of Heraclæa her neighbour City avoided and escaped the like calamity of her own.

Some few daies before that Heraclæa was won, the Ætolians having assembled a Diet at Hypa addressed Embassadors unto Antiochus and Thas: among the rest, even he, who a foretime had been sent unto him. His commission and charge was, first, To request the King that once again he would rally his forces as well by land as by sea, and in paction paise over into Greece: secondly, If any other important affairs hindered him, yet that he would send unto them both men and money. For as it touched his Highness in honour, reputation and credit, not to see his allies abandoned: so it made for the safeguard and security of his own Realm and royall estate, not to suffer the Romans (after they had once defeated the Ætolians) to sail over into Asia at their ease and pleasure with all their forces. These were no fained devices, but true remonstrances indeed; and therefore prevailed the more with the King. Whereupon he delivered money presently to the Embassadors, sufficient to defray the charges of the war, and promised certainly to send men to serve both by land and sea. Thas alone of all the Embassadors he kept still with him, who was not himselfe unwilling to stay behind, because he might be ever at hand to call upon the King for to perform his word and benefit. But the winning of Heraclæa killed the hearts clean of the Ætolians in the end: and within few daies after that they had dispatched their Embassadors into Asia, about the renewing of the war and sending for the King, they laid apart all designments of arms, and addressed their Orators unto the Romans to crave peace. Who, as they began to make some speech, the Consul cut them off, and said, he had other matters of greater importance to think upon and to dispatch; and commanded them to content themselves with a truce for ten daies, and to return to Hypa: and with them he sent L. Valerius Flaccus, unto whom they should declare those things that they were about to deliver unto him, and whatsoever else they had to say. When they were arrived at Hypa, the chief and principall Ætolians assembled themselves in the lodging of Elacus, consulting with him what course they were to take in their treaty with the Consul. And when they went in hand to alledge the ancient rights of the leagues, and to lay abroad their good demerits, and what they had done for the Romans: Phacelus bid them lay a straw there, and speak no more of the privilege of those covenants and accords, which they themselves had broken: shewing unto them, that they should speed better and gain more by a simple confession of their trespass, and in teacourse only to prayer and humble supplication: forasmuch as all the hope they might have of safety, rested not in their own desert and goodness of their cause; but in the meer clemency and mercy of the people of Rome:

promising for his part to assist them, and second their positions as well as the Consul as the Senate of Rome. Since that further also they must of necessity send an Embassage. This way seemed to them all the best simply for their safety, namely, to put themselves to the disposition and devotion of the Romans: for they supposed by this means to drive the Romans for very shame to have regard of them, & not to offer hurt or violent outrage to them, coming in the habit of poor suppliants; and yet wishall, if any opportunity of better fortune should in the mean time offer it self unto them, to be their own Masters nevertheless and at their choice. When they were come before the Cos. Phryxus, the chief of that ambassage, made a long Oration, couching and framing his words (andry waies right artificially), so to mitigate and assuage the wrath of the conqueror; which he begun and concluded with this speech, saying, That the Ætolians committed themselves and all that they had to the mercy and protection of the people of Rome. When the Cos. heard those words: See you do so then indeed (quod he) O ye Ætolians, and take heed I advise you that you deal herein wisely. Then Phryxus brought forth and shewed a fair instrument of a Decree, wherein the same was engrossed in plain terms. Since that (quod he) again you mean good earnest, and are at our disposition, I demand that ye deliver unto me out of hand Dicarchus a Traveller of yours, and Menon of Epiron, (who being entered into Nasipatun with a garrison, had compelled the City to revolt), also Antiochus and all the Nobles of the Athamans, by whose council and suggestion ye fell from us and rebelled. Phryxus interrupted the Cos. before he had well made an end of his speech. We yield not our selves (quod he) to be your villains and slaves, but as allies to be protected by you, and as verily perswaded you know not what you do, to impose those things upon us, which all the manner and customs of the Greeks. The Cos. replied again:

In good time (quod he) I will see whether the Ætolians deem well or ill done according to the customs of the Greeks: all that I will say, that I, after the custome of the Romans, have that power and command, as there, who were while by vertue of their own deeds yielded unto us. And Antiochus by force of our arms have been vanquished and subdued by us. And therefore, unless that he be content which I command, yes, and with speed, my will is, that presently here you be bound hand and foot, and with that he commanded chains and gyves to be brought forth, and the Victors to come about them for to lay hold upon them. Then the stout courage both of Phaenar and the rest of the Ætolians, was well cooled & subdued; and so at length they saw to what poor plight they were; and Phaenar made answer, that both himself and the Ætolians there present in place, knew well, that those things were to be performed, which were imposed upon them, but (quoth he) there needs a Council of the Ætolians for to enact a decree thereof; and therefore he requested the Consul to allow a surcease of arms only for ten daies. Then Flaccus began to speak for the Ætolians, and at his request the said abstinence was granted; and so they returned to Hypira. When Phaenar had related in the privy Council of those elect peers of that nation called Apocleti, as well the demands that were commanded, as what had like to have fallen upon themselves in person, the peers sighed deeply and groaned again, to see their miserable condition; howbeit they were all of opinion, that the victor must of necessity be obeyed; and a generall Parliament assembled of the Ætolian Burgeses out of all their towns and Cities. When all that multitude was gathered together, and heard the same related again, their hearts so fretted within them at the cruelty and indignity of those Lordly commands, that if they had been well sealed in peace, yet such a fit of anger had been enough to have put them into arms. And to stir the same and choler the more, the difficulty of effecting the things demanded, helped well; for how possibly could they compass to deliver Amikander, being as he was an absolute King? But even then there was presented unto them by chance a new hope. For Nicander at that very time, coming from King Antiochus, filled the peoples heads with this vain expectation, namely, that the King made wondrous provision for war, as well by sea as land. This Nicander having accomplished his Embassage, and made return again into Ætolia, within the compass of twelve daies, after he was embarked, arrived at Phalera in the gulph of Malea; from whence having brought the monies which he had, down to Lamia, whiles himself with certain humble men and slight appointed, travelled toward Hypira in the evening, between the Roman and Ætolian camp, through paths that he well knew; he chanced to stumble, ere he was a ware, upon the corps de guard of the Macedonians, and was brought to the King before supper was done, the table taken up, and the King risen. When Philip was advertised thereof, he shewed no other countenance, than if a friend or guest, and not an enemy was come; he had him sit down at the board, and eat his meat. Afterwards he kept him there with him still in the room, and voided all the rest, willing him in no case to be afraid. He blamed greatly the bad courtes and demerments of the Ætolians (which evermore lighted upon their own parts) who first had brought the Romans, and then Antiochus into Greece. But for my part (quoth he) since things done and past, may sooner be blamed than amended, I am content to forget and put all under my foot, and will never be the man that will seem to insult over them in their distress and adversity. And so should the Ætolians likewise take up in time, and lay aside all their rancor and malice to me; and Nicander especially ought to remember this day, on which by me his life was preserved. With that he sent him away with a good convoy, untill he was past all danger; and this Nicander as is before said, came to Hypira, even as the Ætolians were in deep consultation about peace with the Romans.

Attilius having either sold outright, or given away to the soldiers the booty of the country about Heraclea, and hearing that the Council at Hypira nothing tended to peace, and that the Ætolians were run together to Naupactum for to abide in that place the whole violence of the war, sent App. Claudius forth with 4000 soldiers to seize the tops of the mountains, where the passages were difficult; and himself ascended up to the hill Oms, and sacrificed to Hercules in that very place which they call Pyra, by occasion that the mortal body of that god was there consumed with fire: from whence he departed with his whole army, & performed the rest of his journey well and marched with ease. Being come to Corat (an exceeding high mountain between Calipolis and Naupactum) he lost there many of his labouring beasts and sumpter horses, which together with their loads and fardels, as they went, tumbled down headlong from the mountain, and his men also were much troubled and encumbered. Whereby it was soon seen, with how lazy and idle an enemy he had to deal, who had not beset and kept with a guard that difficult passage, to encompass and shut up the thoroughfare from the enemies. Howbeit as much toiled and troubled as his army was, he descended to Naupactum. And having erected one Fort against the Castle, he invaded all the other parts of the City, and divided his forces according to the situation of the walls. This siege he found as toilsome and painful, as that at Heraclea.

At the same time began the Achæans to lay siege to Messene also in Peloponnesus, for that it refused to be of their Council and association. For these two Cities, Messene and Elis, were exempt from the Achæan Diet and accorded with the Ætolians. Howbeit, the Ellians, after that Antiochus was chased out of Greece, gave the Embassadors of Achæa a more mild answer, to wit, That when they had discharged and sent away the King's partition, they would consider of the matter what to do. But the Messenians having without any answer at all, sent the Embassadors away, had levied war and seizing much their own estate (seeing their territory overpread with an army, and every where burned, yea, and their enemies encamped near unto their City, addressed unto Chalce their embassadors to T. Quintus the very man who before had set them at liberty) to signify unto him, That the Messenians were ready both to open their gates, & also to surrender their City unto the Romans, & not to the Achæans. Quintus so soon as he had heard their embassage, sent a messenger incontinently to Megilopolis, unto Diphantus, the Prætor there of the Romans, to command him presently to retire his host from Messene, and to repair unto him. Diphantus obeyed

A obeyed his commandment, and having raised his siege, marched himself lightly appointed for speed before the rest of his army, and about Andania, a small town between Megalopolis and Messene, encountered Quintus. Unto whom after he had shewed the causes of the siege, he received at his hands a gentle rebuke only, for that he had enterprised a matter of so great consequence without his authority: with an expresse commandment also to call and discharge his army, and not to disturb and trouble the peace, made for the good and benefit of all. The Messenians likewise he charged to call home their banished persons into their City, and to joyn with the Achæans in their generall Diet and Assembly. And if they either had any matters to refuse, or would willingly provide for themselves against the future time, he willed them to make their repair unto him at Corinth, and enjoyned Diophanes immediately to summon the Diet of the Achæans for him, where personally himself would be. Where, after he had complained as touching the Island Zacynthus, that by fraud and treachery they had come by and kept, he required that it should be restored to the Romans. Now this Isle had sometime appertained to Philip the King of the Macedonians, and he gave it unto Aminander, in consideration, that he might conduct his army into the higher parts of Æolia, through Æthamania: in which expeditions and exploits of his, the Ætolians hearts were so abated and quailed, that they were constrained to seek peace. Aminander made first Philip the Megapolitan governour of this Island: but afterwards, in time of that war wherein he banded with Antiochus against the Romans, he called him away from thence to imploy him in martiall affairs, and sent Hierocles the Agrigentian to succeed him in his place. This Hierocles, after the defeat and flight of Antiochus from Thermopyla, and the expulsion of Aminander out of Æthamania by King Philip, dispatched of his own motion certain messengers unto Diophanes, the Prætor of the Achæans, and for a sum of money agreed upon between them, betrayed the Island to the Achæans. The Romans thought it great reason, that this Island should be theirs, in recompence for the wars which they had maintained: forasmuch as M. Acilius the Consul, and the Roman legions fought not at Thermopyla for Diophanes, nor yet for the Achæans; Diophanes to these challenges and demands sometime excused himself and the whole nation, otherwhiles stood to it, and avowed the action, and maintained the cause by a plea of right. Somethere were of the Achæans there, that both protested, how from the beginning they utterly disliked the course, and also at this present much blamed the Prætor for his wilfull obstinacy. And by their advice and authority an act was set down, that the whole matter should be referred and put to Quintus, to determine what he pleased. Now had Quintus this nature, if a man crossed and thwarted him, he was fierce and fell: if one yielded and gave place, he was gentle again, and pliable. And therefore, without shewing any sign of debate, either in language or countenance, thus he spake. "If I thought (qd. he) and were perwaded in my heart, that it were good and commodious for the Achæans to hold and possesse this Island in question, I would advise the Senat & people of Rome to let you enjoy it. But like as a Tortoise, so long as she keepeth her self close within her shell (I see) is sure and safe enough, against all blows and offence whatsoever; but when she once pisseth forth any parts, look whatsoever is discovered and naked, the same is weak and subject to injury: even so you Achæans, being enclosed round about with the sea, are able easily to adjoyn unto your selves whatsoever lyeth within the precinct of Peloponnesus, and to keep the same also when you have laid it to you: but so soon as for a greedy desire of having more and encroaching further, you go beyond those bonds, you lie open without, and are exposed to all hurt and damage. Thus Zacynthus was delivered to the Romans with the assent of all the Councill there assembled, and Diophanes durst not say a word more to the contrary."

At the same time King Philip asked the Consul as he marched to Naupactum, Whether it was his pleasure, that he in the meanwhile should recover and regain those Cities which were revolted from the allocation of the Romans? And having a grant and warrant from him, he led his forces against Demetrias, knowing well enough in what terms of troubles that City then stood. For being forlorn and in utter despair, seeing Antiochus had forsaken them and no hope at all remaining in the Ætolians: they looked every day and night either for the coming of Philip their heavy friend; or else even the Romans themselves a worse enemy, like as they had a more just cause of anger and indignation against them. A confused and disordered sort there were of King Antiochus his souldiers, who being but a few at first left there to lie in garrison, grew after to be more, and most of them unarmed; such as after he field was lost [at Thermopyla] thither chanced to flee, and neither had strength nor heart enough to abide a siege. And therefore when Philip sent certain messengers before unto them, to signify, that there was some hope that they might be pardoned: they made them this answer. That the gates were open for the King; and that he might enter at his pleasure. At his first entrance, certain chief men of mark quitted the City and departed, and Eurilochus killed himself. The garrison souldiers of Antiochus (for so they had capitulated) were conducted to Lyfimarhia through Macedony and Thrace, accompanied with a convoy of Macedonians, for fear that any man should do them harm. There were some few ships also in the roade of Demetrias, under the command of Iderius, which together with their leader and Captain were dismissed. After this, he regained Dolopia, Aperantia, and certain Cities of Perrebia.

During the time that Philip was employed in these affairs, T. Quintus having recovered the Island Zacynthus, departed from the Diet of the Achæans, and crossed the seas to Naupactum, which had been beleaguered already two months, & was at the point to be forced and lost: which if it might have been won by assault, it was thought that the whole nation and name of the Ætolians there would have perished for ever. And altho he had good cause to be highly offended and displeased with the Ætolians, in remembrance that they only checked and impeached his glory, at what time as he set Greece free: and that they were nothing stirred and moved with his authority, when he (forewarning them that those things would happen which after wards fell out just so indeed) would have discomfited and scared them from foolish and furious designs: yet, supposing that it was a special part of his charge and work, that no nation of Greece (now freed by him) should utterly be subverted and destroyed, he began to walk up and down along under the walls, to the end that he might be seen, and look known of the Ætolians. And anon the very foremost guards took notice of him, & noised it was presently throughout all the ranks and companies that Quintus was there. And thereupon they ran from all parts up to the walls, every man stretched forth his hands, and with one accord and consonant voice called by name unto Quintus, beseeching him to help and save them. And albeit he was moved at these their pious cries with commiseration, yet for that time he signified by the turning away of his head, that he refused and denied them: asking withall, What lay in him to do them any good? But afterwards, being come unto the Consul, "Know you not (quoth he) O Asinius whereabouts we are, and what we have in hand? or if you be a man provident enough, esteem you not that it mainly concerneth the common weal? He let the Consul by these words a longing, and called him to give more attentive ear what he would say, and withall, Why do you not speak forth (quoth the Consul) and utter your mind what the matter is? Then quoth Quintus: "See you not that after you have vanquished Antiochus, you spend and lose much time here in the siege and assault of two Cities, when as now the year of your government is well near come about? And Philip in the mean time without seeing a battell or the ensigns of his enemies displayed, hath gained and joy ned to himself not Cities only, but so many nations already, namely, Arthamania, Perthabia, Asparautia and Dolopia? But it is nothing so good and expedient for us, nor standeth it us so much upon, to take down the Ætolians and pare their nails, as to look unto Philip that he was not so great: and (seeing you and your souldiers have not got yet two Cities in reward and recompence of victory) not to suffer him to go clear away with so many nations of Greece. The Consul accorded hereunto: but he thought it a shame and dishonour for him to give over the siege and effect nothing: but afterwards, all the matter was put unto the disposition of Quintus. Who went again to that side of the wall, whereas a little before the Ætolians called and cried aloud unto him. And when as they intreated him more earnestly and with greater affection to take pity of the Ætolian people, he willed some of them to come forth unto him. And immediately, Phanac himself with other principall persons of the Ætolians, went out unto him: unto whom lying prostrate and groveling at his feet: "Your present fortune (quoth he) and hard estate wherein you are, caused me both to temper my choler and also to stay my tongue. Those things you now see are fallen out, which I foretold would come to pass. And not so much as this is left unto you; That the calamities fallen upon your heads can be truly said to have light upon them that have not deserved as much. Howbeit, since it hath been allotted unto me as it were by destiny to be a foster-father (as I may so say) to nurse up Greece, I will not cease even to do you good, as thankless and ungratefull persons as you are. Send your Orators to the Consul, to intreat him to grant you a truce for so long, untill you may address your Embassadors to Rome, by whom you shall wholly refer and submit your selves to the Senat: and I will not fail to be an intercessor and advocate to the Consul for you and likewise unto the Senat. And as Quintus commended them, so did they. Neither rejected the Consul their Embassie, but granted them abstinence of war for such a term as within which they might have an answer of their Embassage to Rome: so he dislodged the siege was raised, and the army sent into Phocis. The Consul together with Quintus passed over the sea to Asinum, unto the generall Council of Achaia. There was much treaty and parley about the Eleans, and the restoring of the Lacedæmonians exiles: but nothing was effected in the one or the other. As for the Lacedæmonians, the Achæans were desirous to reserve that for themselves, and to win thereby a thank, as proceeding from their speciall grace. And the Eleans, those rather to come and be united to the Achæans Parliament of themselves: than by the mediation of the Romans. The Embassadors of the Epirots came unto the Consul, who (it was well known) carried not themselves sound and upright in the questioning of the Roman amity: howbeit, they had not levied a souldier for Antiochus. Charged they were to have relieved him with money: and deny themselves they could not but they had sent their Embassadors unto the King. And when they put up a petition, that they might be accepted again into the ancient band of amity: this answer the Consul returned unto them, That he knew not yet whether to range them to the number of enemies, or peaceable friends, and thereof the Senat should be judge: and therefore he referred their whole epire cause to Rome. And to that purpose a truce he granted them of four score and ten daies. The Epirots thus sent to Rome, presented themselves before the Senat, and when they stood rather upon these terms in recounting those things wherein they had not shewed any open hostility, than in clearing themselves of those matters that were laid against them: they received such an answer, as whereby they might be thought rather to have obtained pardon, than to have made good and justified their cause. The Embassadors also of King Philip about that time had audience given them in the Senat, who came to congratulate with the Romans, testifying their own joy, and wishing theirs

A theirs for their victory: and upon their request, that they might sacrifice in the Capitoll, and offer an oblation and present of gold in the Temple of Jup. Op. Max. the Senat gave the good leave. So they presented and offered a crown of gold weighing one hundred pound. These Embassadors had not only a friendly answer and gracious dispatch: but also Demetrius the son of King Philip, who had been as an hostage at Rome, was delivered unto them, for to bring home again unto his father. Thus was the war achieved and brought to an end, which M. Acilius the Consul waged against King Antiochus in Greece.

The other Consul P. Cornelius Scipio, whose lot was to govern the Province of Gaul, before that he took his journey to that war which he was to make against the Boians, demanded of the Senat, that money should be assigned unto him, for to perform those plaies and games which he had promised by vow, as Vice-Prator in Spain, when he was driven to a great extremity in a battell. This seemed to be a strange and unreasonable demand. Whereupon the LL. of the Senat ordained, That what plaies the Consul had vowed on his own head without asking the advice and counsell of the Senat, the same he should exhibit and set forth either with the issue of the spoils got from the enemies, (if haply he had reserved any money raised thereout to that purpose) or else defray the charges out of his own purse. These plaies and games P. Cornelius represented for the space of ten daies. And near about the same time, the Temple of the great goddess Cybele (or Ida) was dedicated. This goddess being brought out of Asia, in the time that P. Cornelius Scipio (surnamed afterwards Africanus) and P. Licinius were Consuls, was conveyed from the sea-side into the mount Palatine. The Temple was set out to be built at a price (according to C an act of the Senat) by M. Livius and C. Claudius the Censors, when M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. Thirteen years after the bargain was made for the edifying thereof, M. Junius Brutus dedicated it: and for the honour of this dedication were the first stage-plaies exhibited, (as Valerius Antias mine author saith) called thereupon Megalesia. In like manner, C. Licinius Lucullus (one of the two Duumvirs) dedicated the Temple of the goddess Juvencus, in the great Race called Circus Maximus. The same had M. Livius the Consul vowed sixteen years before, even that very day in which he defeated Asdrubal and his army. The same Livius in his Censorship, went through and bargained for the building thereof, whiles M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. And in the honour of dedicating this Temple, the plaies were set forth: and all was done with more devotion, because there was a new war intended against King Antiochus.

D In the beginning of this year in which these things passed, whiles P. Cornelius the Consul staid still behind at Rome, (for M. Acilius was gone forth already to war:) it is found in records, that two tame oxen climbed up a ladder in the street Carina, to the tile-roof of a certain house there. And the footlayers gave expresse order that they should be burnt quick, and the ashes to be thrown into Tyber. Also it was reported, that at Tarracina and Amiethum, it rained stones sundry times. Item, That in Mimurna the Temple of Jupiter and the shops about the marketplace, were blasted and smitten with lightning: and in the very mouth of the river Vulturnus, two ships caught fire from heaven, and were consumed. In regard of these fearfull prodigies, the Decemvirs by order from the Senat went to the books of Sibylla and perused them: and out of their learning pronounced, that a solemn fast should be now instituted in the honour of Ceres, and the same to be observed and holden every fift year: also that a novendiall sacrifice for nine daies together could continue: and a supplication for one day: and that they who went in this procession and supplication, should wear garlands and wreaths of flowers upon their heads: lastly, That the Consul P. Cornelius should sacrifice to what gods, and with what beasts, the Decemvirs would appoint and pronounce. When the gods were pacified as well by the accomplishment of the vows according to, as by taking order for the expiation of those wondrous signs the Consul took his journey into his province: from whence he commanded Cneus Domitius the Pro-Prator (after he had called his army) to depart to Rome: and himself entred with his legions into the territory of the Boians.

E Within a little of that time the Ligurians (by vertue of a sacred law that they had) levied and assembled an army, and by night assailed the Camp unawares to Quantus Minutius the Pro-Consul. Minutius kept his soldiers in order of battell untill day within his hold, having an eye and circumspect regard, that the enemy should not mount over the trench and defences in any place. And at the day break he sallied forth at two gates at once: neither were the Ligurians repulsed (as he hoped they should) at the first charge: for they sustained and held out the skirmish above two hours, with doubtfull event on both sides. At the last, when band after band issued out, and his fresh soldiers succeeded in the room of the wearied, for to maintain fight, the Ligurians in the end (besides other distresses, lost for want of sleep also) turned their backs. Of the enemies were slain above four thousand: of Romans and allies under three hundred. Two months after or somewhat less, P. Cornelius the Consul gave battell to the Boians and won the day: slew 28000 enemies, (as Valerius Antias writeth) took 3400 prisoners, gained 124 military ensigns, 1230 horses, chariots 247: and of the winners (as he saith) there died not above 1484. Where (by the way) how little credit to ever (as touching the number) we give unto this Writer, (for in that point there is none over-reareth more than he) yet apparant it is, that a right great victory it was: both for that the Camp was won, and the Boians after that battell presently yielded themselves: so for that in regard of this victory a joyfull procession was by order from the Senat holden, and greater heards slain for sacrifice.

Not much under or over his present time, M. Fulvius Nobilior returned out of the farther parts of Spain in pomp of an Ovation, and carried in new, 10000 pound weight of silver in bullion, of silver in silver coin 130000, and in gold 125 li. weight. P. Cornelius the Consul having first taken hostages of the Boian nation, and dissolved them of the one half of their country to the inhabiting whereof the people of Rome might if they would send their Colonies: at his departure from thence toward Rome to an undoubted and assured triumph, licensed his army with commandment to meet him there and give their attendance upon his triumph-day. The morrow after that he was come, the Senat. had summons to assemble in the Temple of Bellona; where after he had discoursed of his acts and deeds achieved, he required that he might be permitted to enter the City riding in triumph. P. Mempronius Blafus a Tribune of the Commons for the time being, stepped forth and said, That his advice was that Scipio should not flatly be denied the honour of a triumph but to put it off to a farther day. And why? The wars (sd. he) of the Ligurians have always been joyned and linked with those of Gaul: which nations being so near together, are ever mutually one to succour another. If P. Scipio (after the Boians defeated in battle) had followed the train of victory, and either himself in proper person with his brave conquering army passed into the territory of the Ligurians, or but sent part of his forces to Q. Minucius, who now for three years (or fast upon) both been detained within those quarters in a war of doubtful issue, we might have seen an end ere this of the Ligurian war also. But now (forsooth) his soldiers are dismissed and brought home to accompany him & to solemnize his triumph: with might well have been employed still and done good service to the Common-wealth: yea, & may do yet (if the Senat. be so disposed) by deferring the time of triumph, for to make amends and regain that which by over-hastiness of triumph hath been over-slipped. And therefore in my opinion (sd. he) they should do well to command the Consul to go his waies back again, and take his army with him into his Province, & to do his best and utmost endeavours to subdue the Liguri-ans also. For unless they be brought under and made subject unto the people of Rome, the danger will be ye sure will not long be quiet: either we must have peace or war at once in both places.
 And so P. Cornelius in quality of Pro-Consul (as many others before him, who in their full Magistracy triumphed not) may after some few months have his triumph. To this the Col. answered again and said, That neither the Province of the Ligurians was any part of his charge by letter warranted he at all with the Ligurians, nor yet demanded to triumph over them. As for Q.
Minucius (sd. he) I hope that shortly after he hath subdued them, he both will acquire his triumph and shall likewise obtain the same. For mine own part, I seek no more but to triumph over the Boians in Gaul, whom I have vanquished in plain battell, beaten out of the field and camp: whose whole nation within two daies after the fight and their general discomfiture, was dead and rendred themselves into my hands, and from whom I have carried away a way of abundance of future peace: nay that which is much more than all this, I have had the killing of so many Gauls in open battell, and fought with so many thousands of Boians as no Consul ever did before me: the better half of 30000 men are slain upon the edge of the sword, and many a thousand taken prisoners: so as the Boians have none left but old folk and young children.
 Can any man make a wonder then, why victorious army leaving no enemy behind in the Province, come to Rome to honour the triumph of their Consul? Whose employment, if the Sen-at. be disposed to tie in any other service or Province. Whether of these two waies think they will make them more willing and ready to put themselves into new dangers, and continue their fresh labour and travell, either to pay them without delay & content them with the deserved hire of their former peril and pain, or to send them away with bare hope only instead of the substance, for to expect still without effect: since they have been once already over-disappointed of their first hope and expectation? Now for mine own part, I obtaine licence enough that day on which the Senat. sent me (deemed & declared the best man in all the City) to receive that great goddess & dame of Ida. This title alone without any other addition of triumph shall be sufficient to recommend to all posterity for honesty & honour both, the name of P. Scipio Nafica. This said, not only the whole Senat. themselves concurred generally to grant N him triumph, but also with their countenance & authority, compelled the Tribunes of the Commons to give over their hold and suppress their interposition of a negative voice. So P. Cornelius the Col. triumphed over the Boians. In which triumph he carried to be carried for them, in French chariots, armor, ensignes and spoils of all sorts: also French vessels of brass and copper. He commanded likewise to be led in pomp a number of horses taken, together with Noblemen and Gentlemen captives. Of chains of gold he made a shew of 1470. Besides there was born in pomp of gold 345 pound weight: of silver new wrought and wrought into plate, not unworke many with their manner (and namely in sundry French vessels) 2240 pound weight: lawly of his own coin 125.
 To his soldiers that followed his triumph, chariot he gave 225. Ales apiece, double so much to a Centurion, and treble to an horseman. The next day after he called the people to a general assembly, where after he had discoursed again of his exploits and complained of the wrongs that the Ligurians had offered unto him in that he would have tied him to the war of another with wrongs against himself of the fruit of his own victory, he called his soldiers and discharged them quite.
 Whiles these affairs thus went in Italy and Spain remaining at Ephesus, where some and councils of the Roman war, if the Romans had no purpose nor intention to advance into Asia. This security of his was occasioned by many of his friends, who partly were ignorant

A and partly upon flattery, perswaded him so. Only Amphal, who at that time was of greatest credit, and might do most with the King, said unto him, "That he rather marvelled much why the Romans were not already in Asia, than doubted of their coming. For a neerer cut (quoth he) it is by Sea out of Greece into Asia, than out of Italy into Greece; and a greater motive to war is Antiochus than the Ætolians. And as for their valour and power, as hardy they are and mighty at Sea, as on Land; and their fleet hath hovered a good while already about Malca. Moreover, I heard say of late, that new ships be arrived, and a new General come out of Italy, to follow and perform this war. And therefore, let Antiochus feed no longer upon a vain hope, and promise himself a permanent peace: for shortly he must make account to fight with the Romans in Asia, yea, and for Asia, both by Sea and Land; and no mean there is, but that either himself must lose his Kingdom, or take from them their sovereign seignory, who affect and pretend to be LL. of the whole world. He was the only man thought to forecast, and truly to foretell what would ensue. Whereupon the King himself in person, with those ships which he had ready rigged and furnished, sailed to Chersounesus, with intent to strengthen those places with good garnisons, if haply the Romans should come by Land. The rest of the navy he commanded Polyxenides to prepare and put to Sea, And al about the Island he sent about his pinnaces and brigantine as elphas to discover the coasts. C. Livius the Admiral of the Roman navy was arrived at Naples from Rome with fifty covered ships. At which place he gave commandment, That the open vessels, which by covenant were due to be sent from the allies of all that tract should meet. From whence he sailed to Sicily, and passed the streights by M. Juna. And when he had received six Carthaginian ships sent to aid him, and called upon the Rhegins and Locrians, and other associates comprised in the same league and holding by the same tenure, for that shipping which of duty they were to find, when he had also taken a survey of all his armado at Lacinium, he weighed anchor, and put to the main Sea. Being arrived at Corcyra, which was the first City of all Greece, that he came unto, he enquired in what terms the war-affairs stood? (for as yet all was not thoroughly quiet in Greece) and where the Roman fleet was? After he heard that the Roman Consul and King, Philip, were about the pass of Thermopylae, and there lay in guard: that the fleet rid at anchor in the port and harbor of Pyraeum: he thought it good to use expedition, and to make speed for all occasions whatsoever, and incontinently determined to sail forward to Peloponnesus. And having at one instant waited Samothrace and Zacynthus as he went, because they chose rather to band with the Ætolians, he set sail for Malca, and having a good wind, within few daies he arrived at Pyraeum, where the old fleet anchored. At Sylladeum King Eumenes met him with three ships: who had but a long time at Ægion, unresolved in himself, whether he should return to defend his own Kingdom: (for he heard that Antiochus made preparation at Ephesus for war, as well by Sea as Land) he not to depart a foot from the Romans, upon whose fortune depended his whole State, Antiochus Attalus, so soon as he had delivered to his successor five and twenty close ships of war, looked from Pyraeum, and came to Rome. So Livius with a fleet of eighty one ships, armed at their bowheads with busen pikes, besides many other smaller vessels, (which open as they were, had busen heads, as is afore said: or if they were without such pikes, served for eipials) sailed to Delos. Much about that time the Consul Achilius sailed Naupactum. At Delos, Livius for certain daies was stayed by contrary winds (for that quarter among the Cyclades is exceeding windy, by reason that these Islands are divided asunder, some with broader gul's, some with narrower.) Polyxenides being certified by the post-ships (set in diverse places to discover) that the Roman armado rid at anchor near Delos, dispatched messengers to the King, who leaving all matters which he entertained in Hellespontos, returned to Ephesus as fast as ever he could make sail with his ships of war, and presently called a council, where it was debated, whether he were best to march on a battle at Sea, or not. Polyxenides was of opinion, "That he should not slack the time, but in any wise give battle and trie a fight: before that the fleet of Eumenes and the Rhodian ships were joined with the Romans: for so in number they should not be much overmarched, and for all other things have the better, as well for nimbleness and agility of ships, as for variety of old soldiers. For the Roman ships, as being unworshmanly built, they are heavy of stature, and heavily, laden with artillery and freight, besides with provision of victuals, as they are commonly that come into the enemies country. But as for your ships (seeing they leave all about first to sea, and quick) they shall be charged with nothing but with men and munition. Besides, the skill of the soldiers and landward of the winds in these quarters, will be a great help unto you: whereas the enemies must needs be much troubled, for want of knowledge in them all. The chief of this counsel had credit given unto him by all parts, and the rather, for that he was himself himself to put in execution the same counsel. Two daies they made stay to see all things in order and readiness, the third day they set forward with a fleet of a hundred sail, whereof 70 were rowed, the rest open, and all of them meller making, and for Phocaea they shaped their course. The King, having that the Roman Armado approached, departed from thence (for that he was not to be present in person at the conflict upon the sea) and went to Magusa near Siphnus for to levy land-forces. But his navy made sail to Cyffus, a port of the Erythraens, to attend the coming of the enemy there, as in a place more commodious. The Romans, when the Northern winds were once laid (for they were aloft for certain daies, and locked them in) sailed from Delos to Phocaea haven Town of the Chians, bearing toward the Aegean Sea. From thence they cast about with their ships to the City, and there having victualled themselves, they crossed over to Phocaea. Eumenes

Eumenes who was gone to Elaa toward his fleet, within few daies after, with four and twenty covered ships, and more uncovered, returned to the Romans: whom he found preparing and marshalling themselves (a little short of Phocaa) for a battel at sea. Then set they all forward with a hundred and fifty close covered ships, and more open and without hatches: and being with side Northern winds, at the first driven to the sea shore, they were forced to sail single in rank one after another. But afterwards, as the violence of the wind began to be allaid, they assaied to cross over to the haven Corycus, which is above Cyffus. Polyxenidas, as soon as he heard that the enemies were at hand, rejoiced that he had occasion presented unto him of a naval battel: and himself stretched forth the left point of his fleet embattelled far into the sea, willing the Captains of the ships to display the right wing broad, toward the land: and so with an even front, he advanced forward to the fight. Which the Roman Admiral seeing, struck sail, took down the masts, and laying together al the tackling of the ships in one place, attended their coming that followed after. By which time there were thirty in a rank afront, with which because he would make them equal to the left wing of the enemy, he set up the trinkets or small sails, meaning to make way into the deep, commanding them that followed still, to make head, and direct their prow against the right wing near the land. Eumenes was the rere-Admiral, and kept the rereward close together: but so soon as they began to be troubled with taking down their tackling, he set forward with all speed and hast that he could make: and by this time were they in view one of the other. Two Carthaginian ships led before the Roman navy, which were encountred with three of the Kings ships. And considering the ods of the number, two of the Kings came about one. And first they wiped away the oars on both sides, then they shewed themselves aloft with their weapons, and boarded her, and after they had either overturned or killed the defendants, they were masters of that ship. The other that was in single fight, and assailed but by one, seeing the other ship taken by the enemies, fled back into the main fleet, before she was environed by the three enemies. Livius chasing hereat, and angry at the heart, advanced forward with the Admiral ship afront the enemy: against her, those other two which had enclosed the Carthaginian ship aforesaid, hoping to do the like by this, came onward: which Livius perceiving, commanded the rowers to let their oars hang in the water on both sides, for the more stay and steadiness of the ship, and likewise to cast their iron hooks fashioned like hands, for to grapple the enemies ships, as they approached and came neer unto them: and when they were come to close fight in manner of land service, then to remember the valour of the Romans, and not to hold the Kings slaves for men of any worth. And with much more facility and ease, than the two ships before conquered one, this one for that gained two. By this time the main fleet on both sides encountred on all sides, and fought pell-mell. Eumenes who being in the rereward, came last in place, after the conflict was begun, perceiving that Livius had disordered the left wing of the enemies, made head against the right, where he saw them fighting on even hand, nor long after the left wing began to flie. For Polyxenidas, so soon as he saw himself without all question overmatched in valour of the souldiers, caused the trinkets and all the cloth he had to be let up, and purposed to flie again. Those likewise that were toward the land, and fought with Eumenes, within a while did no less. The Romans and Eumenes, so long as the mariners were able to plie their oars, and so long as they were in hope to annoy the tail of the enemies, followed the chase lustily enough: but after that they perceived their own ships (charged and heavily loaden with victuals) follow after to no purpose, and to lag behind, nor like to overtake them, which were the swifter, because they were the lighter, staid at length their pursuit, after they had taken 13 ships both with their souldiers and mariners, and sunk ten. Of the Roman Armado there perished but one Carthaginian, which at the first encounter was beset with two ships. Polyxenidas never gave over flight, but made way still, until he had recovered the haven of Ephesus. The Romans abode that day in the place from whence the Kings armado came, purposing on the morrow to make fresh sail after the enemy. And in the mids of their course they met with those 35 Rhodian ships covered, conducted by Pisistratus their Admiral: and taking those also with them, they followed the enemy even as far as Ephesus, where in the mouth of the haven, they rid in order of battel: by which bravado, having wrung as it were from the enemies a plain confession that they were vanquished, the Rhodians and Eumenes were sent home. The Romans setting their course for Chius, first sailed by Phanicius, an haven Town of Erythraa, and having cast anchor that night, the next day they weighed, and arrived within the land, close to the City it self, where having sojourned some few daies, especially to refresh their rowers, they passed forward to Phocaa. Where leaving four quinquereme Galeaces, the fleet arrived at Chius, and because the Winter approached, the ships were laid up in their docks on drie Land, and for their safety were trenched and paled about. In the year end the General assembly for election of Magistrats was holden at Rome, wherein were created Consuls, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Laelius. For now all men had an eye to the finishing of the war against Antiochus. The next morrow were the Pretors also chosen, namely, M. Porcius, L. Aprunius, Cn. Fulvius, L. Emilius, P. Junius, and C. Arinius Laberius.

The seven and thirtieth Book Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Flory upon the seven and thirtieth Book.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio the Consul, having for his Lieutenant P. Scipio Africanus (according as he had promised that he would be Lieutenant to his brother) Greece and Asia were ordained to be his Province, whereas it was thought that C. Laelius for the great credit that he was in with the Senate, should have had that Province given him; took his voyage for to war against Antiochus, and was the first Roman that ever sailed over into Asia, as Captain and Commander of an army. Amylius Regillus fought fortuitously with the aid of the Rhodians before Myonessus, against the royal navy of Antiochus, as son of Africanus taken prisoner by Antiochus, was sent home to his father, M. Acilius Glabrio triumphed over Antiochus, whom he had driven out of Greece, as also over the Rhodians. Afterward, when Antiochus was vanquished by L. Cornelius Scipio (with the assistance of King Eumenes, the son of Attalus King of Pergamus) he had peace granted him, upon condition, that he should quit and give up all the Provinces on this side the mount Taurus. And Eumenes, by whose help Antiochus was overcome, had his Kingdom enlarged. To the Rhodians also, for their helping hand certain Cities were given and granted. One Colony was planted, called Bononia. Amylius Regillus, who vanquished the Captains of Antiochus in a naval battle, obtained also a naval triumph. L. Cornelius Scipio who finished the war with Antiochus, had the like surname given him as his brother, and was called after him.

The seven and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

When L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Laelius were Consuls, after order taken for the service of the Gods, there was no matter created of in the Senate, before the suit of the Etolians; And as their Embassadors were instant and importunate, because the suit of their state was but short, so T. Quintus, who then was censured out of Greece to Rome, seconded them. The Etolians, relying more upon the mercy of the Senate, than the justice of their cause, and ballancing their old good turns done to the Romans, to discharge them of the trespass committed, used humble supplication. But so long as they were to plead before the Senators, they were wearied with their interrogatories of all hands, who sought rather to vex and wring from them confession of a fault, than any other answer; and when they were bidden to hold out of the Senate-house, they could not debate within. For in the handling of their matter it was seen that anger bore more sway than pity; because they were so much offended with them for being enemies, as they blamed them for an unrighteous, and unfriendly nation. And after much hard hold for certain daies together, they resolved at length, neither to fight nor deny their peace. Two conditions were tendered and presented unto them, either to suffer themselves wholly to the pleasure and disposition of the Senate, or else to deliver a town, fortress, and wall to hold throt for friends or foes, whomsoever the Romans reputed them; And when they were desirous to draw from the Senators this much, as to know in what power, and how far forth, they should submit themselves to the discretion of the Senate, they could not end certain answer to build upon. And thus without any peace obtained, they were dismissed, with express commandment to hold the City that very day, and to be gone out of Italy, within five daies following. When they fell to consultation in the Senate about the government of the Consular provinces, both Consuls desired to have the charge of Greece. And Laelius, who was great grace with the Senate, now when the house was divided, and the Consul should authorise his province between them, he took up and said, This is a warlike, dangerous, and lasting, and put the matter to the judgment of that honorable court, than in the blind hand of lot. To this purpose for the present made answer, that he would consider better of it; and after he had conferred secretly with his brother, upon a hard word he had said, he held him up in the Senate, he gave Laelius to understand, that he was content to do as he would have him. When this strange course and manner of proceeding (which was and understood before, or else after so long dispute of the praefecture of the Consuls, and when up again) caused the Senate to turn themselves against a great strife and contention, then P. Scipio Africanus said, That if they would ordain his brother L. Scipio to have the Province of Greece, he would accompany him in that voyage, in quality of his Lieutenant. This good word of his (accepted of them all with a general consent) kind all debate: for a great mind they thought make a rash decision. And as the being vanquished could add little more, than assistance the Lieutenant assist the Consul, and the Roman legions. And all in a manner assigned Greece to Scipio, and Italy to Laelius. But the Praetors had their Provinces, set out to them by lot. L. Annonius obtained the civil jurisdiction of citizens, and L. Fulvius off forainers. L. Amylius Regillus was L. Atilia of the armada; P. Iunius governed Tuscany, M. Tullius Apulia and the rich coast of Asia. These protestants to the Consul as he went forth, to the number of 3000 volunteers, Romans and allies together, who had served their full years in the war, and under the conduct of P. Africanus, and were exempt from soldiery, who all offered to go with him and to be enrolled in great numbers. Much at the time that the Consul took his journey (during the festival Apollinare games in the honour of Apollon, upon the 15th day before the Ides of July) it chanced, that in the day time, when the air was clear and fair, there arose a sudden darkness during the Eclipse of the sun, by reason that the body of the moon was directly under the Circle and middle of the sun. L. Emilius Regillus also Admiral of the war, at the same time went to Sea. L. Aemilius was charged by order from the Senate, to build 30 Gallies with five banks of oars, and 20 Gallies with three banks; because a storm was blown and blazed abroad, that Antiochus upon the late battail at Sea, was about to prepare a much greater armado.

The Ætolians, after their Ambassadors were returned from Rome and had made relation, that there was no hope of peace, albeit all their Sea-coasts (especially toward Peloponnesus) were spoiled and wasted by the Achaïans, yet minding more their peril like to ensue, than remembering their loss received, seized the mountain Corax, intending to impeach and stop the passage of the Romans. For they made no question nor doubt, but that the next spring they would return to besiege and assault Naupactus, which, who with well what they expected, thought it better to go in hand with an enterprise unlooked for, and namely, to assail Lamia; for thus he thought, That seeing they had been already brought to a great strait and extremity by King Philip, now they might be taken suddenly and surprised at unawares, because they stood in fear of nothing less.

Whereupon, removing from Blania, he encamped first in the country of his enemies near to the River Sperchius: from whence by night he dislodged, and advanced forth with his ensigns, and by the day break had invested their walls round about. Great fear and hurly there was, as in an accident unlooked for, yet all that day they defended the City more resolutely, than a man would have believed, and thought they could have done in so sudden a danger; whiles men stood at defence upon the walls, women set up ladders in many places, and brought the men weapons and darts of all sorts, yea, and stones up to the walls unto them. Acilius, after he had sounded the retreats, brought back his men into the camp about noon: and after they had there refreshed their bodies with meat and rest, he gave them warning (before he dismissed the Prætorium) that ere day-light the next morning they should be ready in arms: for that he would not come back again with them into the camp, before they were masters of the Town. At the same time as the day before, he gave assault in many places; and for as much as the Townsmens strength decayed, their darts and weapons failed, and above all, their hearts fainted, within few hours he won the City. After he had made a riddance of the pillage, sold some part, and given away the rest, he fell to take counsel what to do afterwards. There was not one man of opinion to go against Naupactus, considering that the Ætolians held and kept the pass of Corax. Howbeit Acilius, to the end that he would not keep the field in summer without doing some exploit, and that the Ætolians might not enjoy the peace by the slackness of the Roman soldiers, which obtain they could not at the Senates hand, he purposed to besiege Amphissa, and so the army was conducted thither from Heraclea, by the mountain Ossa. When he had encamped himself under the Town walls, he began not to invest it round with men as he did Lamia, but with ordnance and engins to batter it. In many places at once he ran with the ram against the walls: and albeit they were shaken, the Townsmen were not about either to make ready, or to devise and invent any means of defence against that instrument of rage. All their hope was in sturdy armour and hardy valour. And so quick they fell to work, that they disordered and troubled not only the guards of the enemies, but also those that stood about the suburbs and artillery. Howbeit in many places the wall was battered and broken, and even at that very instant new men came unto him; that his successor had landed his army at Apollonia, and was coming by the way of Ægion and Thessaly. Now came the Consul with a power of 6300 foot, and five hundred horse. And by this time was he persuaded for his honour and level of Glory, and having sent curia aforesaid to summon the City Hydruntum, and received answer again, that they would do nothing but by a publick decree of the Ætolians; he made charge of Hydruntum to his brother, and Amphissa not yet won, he led his forces against Amphissa his brother. After 4 days before, the Oppidans had quit the Town, for by this time the wall in many places lay open and naked, and were all fled armed and unarmed like a Cattle which they had impeached. The Consul pitched his camp six miles from the Town. He did so, not that he was afraid, but that he would not be so near to the Town, as he might be surprised by the Ætolians, and that he might be repaired to P. Scipio, who, as we have said, was gone before the main army, and afterwards to the Consul, increasing for the Ætolians. Of the town they received a gentle assault at the hands of Afranius, who seeking some honest excuse to leave the Ætolians over, for his heart was wholly upon Africa and King Antiochus; and to this purpose he willed the Achaïans to go, and made not only with the Romans, but also with the Ætolians, an offer of peace before war. And readily, through the motion and persuasion of the Achaïans, there was a solemn embassy of the Ætolians dispatched from Hydruntum. Induced by they went the rather to hope for peace by the speech of Afranius (for to him they came first) who discoursed unto them, how that many Nations and Cities in Spain first, afterwards in France, had put themselves under his protection, and in them all he had left greater testimonies of his clemency and lenity, than of his warlike valour and martial prowess. Thus they had brought the matter (as they thought) to a good pass, and made it sure: but when they came before the Consul, they had the same answer of him, with which they were sent away from the Senate, and commanded to avoid. The Ætolians wounded therewith anew, seeing they could win nothing neither by the mediation of the Athenian embassy, nor the gracious answer of Philostratus: said, they would make report thereof unto their States and country-men. So, they returned from thence to Hypada, where they were to seek what to do, and could not resolve: for neither had they whereof to raise a thousand talents: and again, if they should absolutely put themselves into their hands, they feared to feel the smart thereof in their bodies. Therefore they commanded the same Embassadors to go again to the Consul and to Africanus, and to exhibit a petition, that if they were minded indeed and verily to grant them peace, and not by vain shew and semblance only to frustrate and delude the hope of poor suppliants, they would either rebate them a quantity of that grand sum of money, or else accept of their absolute surrender, that no free citizen might be touched thereby in his person. But nothing could be gotten at the Consul's hands, for to alter or relent any jot: thus was this embassy also sent away as it came, and nothing done. The Athenians came after them in place, the principal men of whose embassy, Echecdemus, seeing the Ætolians wearied with so many repulses, and lamentably to no purpose bewailing the miserable estate of their country: put them still in some new hope, and gave them counsel to crave truce for six months, that they might address their Embassadors to Rome, and receive an answer from thence: shewing unto them, that this delay could not augment their present calamity; which could not worse be; but contrary-wise, time and space coming between might afford many accidents whereby their present misery might be mitigated and allayed. So by the advice of Echecdemus, the same men were sent once again, who had commured before with P. Scipio, and by his means obtained of the Consul a truce for that term: which was the thing they craved. The siege being raised before Amphissa, M. Acilius, after he had delivered up his army into the hands of the Consul, resigned his government, and departed out of the Province: and the Consul likewise from Amphissa returned into Thessaly, intending through Macedony and Thracia to conduct his army into Asia.

Then Africanus entered into speech with his brother, and said: "The journey which you undertake, L. Scipio, I for my part approve and think well of, but all resteth in the will and pleasure of Philip: who if he be fast and faithful to the State and Empire of Rome, he will grant us passage, he will afford us victuals, he will furnish us with all things, which in so long a voyage are necessary to the help and sustenance of our army: but if he fail and forsake us, you must make account of no safety and security throughout all Thracia: therefore I am of advice, that the King's affection be first sounded. And that will best be done if the messenger who shall be dispatched unto him, may come upon him on a sudden, and take him unprovided, and having no time to put any premeditated plot in practice. T. Sappionius Gracchus, a most nimble and active young Gentleman, was at that time chosen for the fittest person to perform this action: who taking fresh post Horses all the way as he rode, with incredible celerity made such speed, that from Amphissa (for thence he had his dispatch) in three days space, he arrived at Pella. The King was at a feast or banquet when he came, and wine he had taken full liberally. And finding him thus disposed to solace and recreate his spirits, he had no reason to suspect that he was minded and inclined to any change or alteration: and so for that time this guest was bidden to come, and had good cheer made him. The morrow after, he saw the provision of victuals in great store ready for the armies, he beheld the Bridges made over the Rivers, and the high ways mended and prepared, where passage was difficult. With these intelligences he returned to the Consul, with as great speed as he went, and met him at Thessalonica. From whence, the army in much joy, and with greater and more assured hope, entered into Macedony: where all was provided to their hands. The King at their coming received them right graciously, and at their departure conducted them on the way as royally. Very willing, ready and courteous he shewed himself, which Africanus much liked and highly commended, being a man as in all other things singular, so in allowing of elegancy and humanity, if he were without superfluity and excess, nothing more and freight-laced. Thus they held on their journey unto Hellaspontus, passing through Macedony and Thracia, and Philip still accompanied them, and provided all things for their use along the way.

After the battail fought at Sea near Corymbus, Antiochus having had all the winter time free without any impeachment to furnish himself with forces both for Land and Sea, above all things studied and devised how to repair his fleet, for fear he should be quite distressed and dispossessed of the Sea. And evermore this ran in his mind, that he had lost his navy, and yet the Rhodian fleet was away. For thus he said with himself, that if they should be present at the next conflict (and truly the Rhodians thought he will not for any time be behind again) he then should have need of a mighty number of ships to match the Antiochians as well in numbers as in quality. And therefore he had both sent Antiochus to Smyrna to take up the ships of the Phœnicians, and also commanded Polydamas to repair those vessels which he had already, and to mangle and rig others, with so much more diligence as he felt he alone was less fortunate. Antiochus sailed the winter in Phrygia, and seeking for aid out of all places, he sent out as far as into Cilicia. The people there at that time were great warriors, keeping still the courage of Gauls, for that the race of that nation was not yet extinct and worn out. His son Serapion he had left in Asia with

An army to keep the maritime Cities in obedience; which Eumenes from Pergamus of one side, and the Romans from Phocæa and Erythræ on the other side, solicited to rebellion. The Roman fleet, as I said before, wintered at Cænæ. Thither in the midst almost of winter came Eumenes with two thousand foot, and a hundred horse. Who having given out unto Leivius, that great prizes might be raised out of the enemies territory about Thymira, had so periwaded and wrought with him, that he sent with him five thousand souldiers: who being set forth to this rode and expedition, in few dayes drove away a mighty booty. Amid these matters, there hapned a mutiny in Phocæa, by occasion of some that would have withdrawn and turned away the hearts of the multitude unto King Antiochus. The wintering of the fleet was chargeable to that City. The imposition of a tribute was heavy, in regard that they were put to the finding of five hundred side-casocks, and as many coats for liveries: the scarcity of corn also was grievous unto them; for which default the ships and the Roman garrison abandoned the place and departed: whereupon that faction which in all their speeches and assemblies drew the common people to side with Antiochus, was rid of all fear. The Senat and the principal citizens of Phocæa were of opinion to continue to the last, in the association of the Romans: but the perswaders and counsellors of a revolt were of more credit with the multitude.

The Rhodians were not so slow the summer past, but they were as forward now in the spring: for before mid-March, they sent out the same Pausistratus Admiral of a fleet of six and thirty sail. And by this time Livius loosed from Cænæ, and sailed toward Hellepontus, with thirty ships, and seven Gallies of four banks of oars, which King Eumenes had brought with him, to the end that he might prepare things necessary for the passage of the army, which he supposed would come by CLand. And first he fell with the bay or port which they call, The rode of the Achæans, from whence he went up to thum, where, after he had sacrificed to Minerva, he gave gracious audience to the embassages of the neighbors bordering, which came from Eleus, Dandanus, and Rhodium, who committed their Cities unto his protection. From thence he directed his course to the streights of Hellepontus, and leaving ten ships in the rode over-against Abydus, with the rest of the fleet, he passed over into Europe, to assault Sestos. As the armed souldiers approached their walls, the frantick Priests of Cybele called Galli, bereft of their wits, presented themselves first unto them before their gates, in their solemn habit and vestments, laying, That they being the servants and ministers of Dame Cybele the mother of the Gods, were come by the inhibitt and commandment of that goddess to beseech the Roman General to spare the walls and the City. And no one of them had any harm done unto them. Anon the whole body of the Senat with the Magistrats came forth to yeeld the Town. From thence they crossed over to Abydus, where (after many parties, in which they had sounded their minds, and could have no answer tending to peace) they addrested themselves to lay siege to the City, and to assault it.

Whiles these things stood thus about Hellepontus, Polyxenidas a Rhodian born, but banished his country, and a Captain for King Antiochus, hearing that a Rhodian fleet was gone to Sea, and that Pausistratus their Admiral, had in open audience given out certain proud and disdainful speeches against him, entered into a privat quarrel with him toying and devising in his mind might and do nothing else, but how he might by some effectual and worthy deeds, check and confine those brave and glorious words of his. He dispatched therefore unto him a messenger, a man well known unto him, with credence and instruction to give him to understand, that himself would (if he might) stand both Pausistratus and his country in good stead: and that Pausistratus (if it pleased him) had means to restore him again into his native country. When Pausistratus marvelled hereat, and was very inquisitive to know how this might be effected: and gave him his faithful promise (as his request) either to joyne with him in the action, or else to conceal all and keep counsel: then the messenger declared, that Polyxenidas would make over unto him the Kings navy, either entire, or the greater part thereof; and in consideration and recompence of this so great service, he desired no more, but that he might return into his country. The importance of this matter was so great, that he neither belied his words, nor yet neglected and despised the same. So he went to Pamphilius a place in the Land of Samus, and there he abode to view Eand the thing that was offered unto him. Couriers there ran between, and never would Pausistratus give credit to the party, until Polyxenidas wrote a letter with his own hand in the presence of his said messenger, that he would perform what soever he had promised, yet, and sent the same letters sealed with his own signet Manu. By this sure pledge or oath, Pausistratus made full account that he had the traitor fully bound and obliged unto him. For thus he thought, that Polyxenidas living as a subject under the King, would never hazard the danger of such pregnant matter to appear against himself, testified under his own hand-writing: so from that time forward the means of this pretended and counterfeit treason was devised and agreed upon. Polyxenidas gave him to understand, that he would of purpose lay aside and neglect preparation of all furniture, that he would neither have towers nor other mariners in any number about his fleet: moreover, under a colour of calling and calling he would lay up some ships on dry Lands, others he would send away into the havens near at hand, and keep some few riding at anchor before Ephesus in the haven, and those (if he were forced to battail) he would set out to fight. The same negligence that Pausistratus heard say Polyxenidas would use in his fleet, the same himself presently shewed in his own. For some of his ships he sent to Halicarnassus for victuals, and other to Samus the City, to the end that he might be in readiness when the traitor gave the signal of assault.

Poly-

* Where they lay sometimes against Troy.

Polyxenidas still by false semblance entered the stores and vain imaginations of Pausistratus: for some ships indeed he drew aland and hid up dry: and as if he meant to hale up more, he repaired and amended the docks. Oremes and mariners he sent not forth out of their winter harbors to go to Ephesus, but secretly assembled them to Magnesia. Now it fortuned that a certain souldier serving under King Antiochus, who was come to Samos about some private affairs of his own, was apprehended there for a spy, and brought to Panormus before the Admiral Pausistratus. Who being demanded what they did at Ephesus: I know not whether for fear, or upon small loyalty that he bare to his Prince and countrey, discovered all: namely, that the fleet hid in the haven rigged, decked and trimmed in readines: Item, that all the rowers and mariness were sent to Sipylus in Magnesia: Item, that some vessels, and those very few, were drawn up to land, and the docks and harbors were shut up close: and lastly, that never at any time before, the navy was so carefully looked unto, nor Sea-affairs so well managed. But the mind of Pausistratus was so possessed before, with foolish conceits and vain hopes, that he would not believe these informations and intelligences for true. Polyxenidas having set all things forward and in good readines, by night sent for the rowers and mariners from Magnesia: and having in great hast shot to Sea, and set afloat those vessels which lay at one side upon the land, after he had spent the whole day, not so much in making provision, as trifling out the time on set purpose, because he would not have the fleet to be seen when it set forth, weighed anchor and loosed after the sun was gone down: and with 70 sail of covered ships, because he had a contrary wind, entered the Bay of Pygala before day, where resting all the livelong day for the same purpose as before, the next night he sailed to the nearest coasts of Samos. From whence he gave commandment to one Nicanor an Archpirat, to set sail for Palinurus, with five close covered ships, there to land: and from thence to march with his armed souldiers over the fields the nearest way to Panormus, and to come upon the back of the enemies: himself in the mean while divided his fleet into two parts, and made way to Panormus, there to keep the entry and mouth of the haven on both sides. Pausistratus at first was troubled for a while at this unexpected occurrent: but afterwards, as one that was an old beaten souldier, he quickly took heart again, and calling his wits together, supposed that he might more easily repulse the enemies by Land than by Sea: and led his souldiers in two Squadrons unto the promontories: which bearing out into the Sea like two horns, to force the haven: from which two capes or heads he supposed that he might easily set back and put by the enemies with shooting darts from both sides. But Nicanor who was sent by Land, impeached this design of his, so that he was forced suddenly to change his mind and alter that course, and therefore commanded all his men to go a shipboard and away. Hereupon exceeding fear there was both among the souldiers and also the mariners, as if they were to take their flight by Sea and not to fight, seeing themselves environed at once both by Land and Sea. Pausistratus supposing the only way to escape and save themselves, was to make way through the mouth of the haven, and so to recover sea-room: after he had seen all his men embarked, commanded the rest to follow, and himself first plying and labouring hard with oars, scudded a main with his ship to the entrance of the haven. Now when she was once past the freight and come into the open Sea, Polyxenidas was there to welcome him with three Galeaces of five banks of oars and so belet him. The poor ship was wounded with the iron pikes bearing out in the beak heads of the Galeaces, and so banged and sunk withal. The defendants upon the hatches were overwhelmed with shot of darts, and among the rest, Pausistratus saw himself manfully fighting lost his life. The rest of the ships were boarded and taken, some before the haven, others within: and some there were that by Nicanor were seized as they laboured to loose from the land, and to lanch forth. Five ships only of Rhodus, and two of Caulis escaped clear and fled, which made themselves way even among the thickest of their enemies, by the means of a fearful burning flame of fire that they had with them. For they set me two long perches or poles bearing forward at the prow, like two sprig sails, in every ship, carrying iron pots and pans afore them full of light fire. The Gallies of Ephesus, meeting the Rhodian ships not far from Samos, they fled: the which were coming to help them, turned their count backward into Hellasponus, unto the Romans. About the same time Silvius gained the City of Phocis by treason, entering at a gate which the warders set open of purpose for him. And for fear, Cyme and other Towns of that coast revolted unto him.

Whiles these things thus passed in Asia, and that Abydos had endured the siege for certain dayes by the defence of the Kings garrison that manied the walls: now that all were overtired and wearied, the Magistrats of the City (by the permission of Phileas Captain of the garrison) intreated with Livius upon conditions to render the Town. The only point whereupon they stood, and which stayed the conclusion, was this, for that they could not agree whether the Kings souldiers should be sent away armed or disarmed. And whiles they debated hereabout, news came of the Rhodians defeat, and for the opportunity of gaining the Town slipped out of their hands. For Livius fearing, lest Polyxenidas puff'd up with the success of so great an exploit, would surprize the fleet that hid at Caulis, leaving presently the siege before Abydos, and the guarding of Hellasponus, put to Sea afore those ships that lay dry at Caulis. And Eumenes came to Ephesus. But Livius went to Phocis with all his fleet, to which he had adjoynd two extreme gallies of Asiatica. But when he heard say it was kept with a strong garrison of the Kings, so that Silvius was encamped not far off, after he had pill'd the sea-coast, and charged his ships with a good booty, those were prizes of men especially, he stayed no longer there than until Eumenes might overtake him with his fleet, but

A but directed his course straight to Samos. The Rhodians upon the first news of this their overthrow, feared much, and whilst mightily sorrowed: for besides the loss of their Sea-soldiers and ships, they lost also the very flour and strength of their youth forasmuch as many young Gentlemen of their nobility, accompanied Paustrius, among other motives, in regard of his authority, which was right great and for good desert among his country-men. But afterwards considering how treacherously they were over-wrought, and namely, by one of their own citizens, born among them, their melancholy turned into choler, and their sorrow into anger. Whereupon they sent forth ten ships immediately, and few dayes after other ten, under the conduct of Exandrus the Admiral over them all: who albeit he were not for other feats of arms and martial skill equal to Paustrius; yet they supposed verily he would be a leader so much the more wary and circumspect, as he was the leishardy and courageous. The Romans and King Eumenes first fell with the Island Brythia, where they stayed one night and the morrow after gained the point of Corynus, a promontory of the Taurus. From whence when they purposed to cross over to the nearest parts of Samos, not waiting for the sun-rising, by which the Pilots might observe the disposition of the weather, they hoisted up sails against a very doubtful and dangerous tempest: for the wind turned from North-east to full North, as they were in the mids of their course, whereby they began to be mightily tossed among the surging billows of the rough and angry Sea. Polyxenidas supposing that the enemies would take their course directly to Samos, there to joyn with the Rhodian fleet, departed from Ephesus, and first anchored at Myonessus: from thence he sailed to an Island called Ischyria, to the end that as the enemies fleet sailed by, he might take advantage to set upon either some ships singled and severed from the body of the fleet, or play upon the tail and sergard thereof. After that he perceived the whole fleet to be dispersed by force of the tempest, he thought fit to take that occasion to fall upon them: but the wind rising still more and more, and raising greater waves, because he saw he could not possibly come neer to board them, he cut over to the land Ethalia, minding the next day to assail the ships in the main Sea as they passed to Samos. Some small number of the Roman ships in the beginning of the night put into the haven of Samos, which they found void and empty: the rest of the fleet after they had been tossed and tormented all the night long in the deep, at length light upon the same harbor. Where being advertised by the peasants of the country, that the enemies ships lay in the rode of Ethalia, they fell to consult, whether presently to bid battail and put it to the hazard, or expect the arrival of the Rhodian fleet. Desiring therefore that enterprise (for so upon advertisement they were agreed) they travelled to Corynus, from whence they came. Polyxenidas likewise, having staid at anchor in vain, returned to Ephesus: and then the Roman ships, while the Seas were thus cleer of enemies, sailed over to Samos. Thither also arrived the Rhodian fleet few daies after, and that it might appear how long looked for it was, they all presently set sail for Ephesus, with purpose either to try an issue by a battel at Sea, or else if the enemy refused the tryal, to expresse and wing from him a plain confession of cowardise: which was a material point and of great importance to move the minds of the other neighbour-cities. Being arrived to the very haven mouth, they embattailed their ships and stood directly affront opposed unto it. And when they saw none make sail nor set out against them, the one part thereof rode ashore at anchor still in the very haven mouth: the other discharged the soldiers and let them a land. Upon whom (as they were driving a mighty booty which they had raised by foraging all the country over) Andronicus a Macedonian, who lay in garrison at Ephesus, sallied forth, even as they approached the walls of the City: and having cried them off of a great part of their prey, so said he chased them to the sea unto their ships. The morrow after, the Romans having bestowed an ambush about the side way between, marched in order of battail against the City, to see if by adventure they could surpriseth the Macedonian against without the walls: but perceiving that no man durst come abroad for suspicion and fear of an ambush they returned to their ships again: and when they saw their enemies would not abide their neither at Sea nor on Land, in the end the fleet sailed again to Samos from whence it came. Thence the Fleet made out two Gallies of Italian confederates, and as many Rhodians under the conduct of Epicurus the Rhodian Admiral, to defend and keep the straits of Cephallenia, which Hilaspis the Lacedaemonian together with the youth of the Cephallensians infused with his roving and robbing (in so much as there could no ships pass by Sea so and so in the straits between Italy and this coast. As Pyrrhus an Epicurianet with Le Arthius a Regillus coming to succor in the Admiralty: who hearing of the defeat of the Rhodians, and being himselfe one of the Quinquereme Gallies, brought Epicurus back with him to Samos. After this his ships, that he accompanied them all the open ships of the Athenians, and he sailed to the Sea of Thrace. Thence also arrived Thyestes the Rhodian in the dead of the night with two Quinquereme Gallies from Samos. Who being brought unto Eumenes, declared how he was faine to quicken and defend that Sea coast, which the Kings roving ships and men of war by their cleven cut from Hellspont and Aegyptus had made too hot for the Hulse and other ships of burden which used to pass that way. As Eumenes filled from Cibasis to Samos, two Rhodian Quinquereme Gallies were sent by Livius to meet him, and King Eumenes also with two Quinquereme galleaces presented himselfe to him. Being all arrived at Samos, Eumenes when he had received the pavy of Livius and sacrificed orderly as the manner was, called Conseil. At which C. Livius (for his opinion was asked first) spoke and said, That no man hath more loyall and faithful counsellor than he, who hath made another man so to do that which himselfe would do in the same case. As for me, my intent and purpose was, to "go against Ephesus with the whole armado, and either to bring within the walls of burden "charged with heavy ballist of great and small, and so fill them in the very haven mouth, for to "choke it up. And to make this bar against the haven, it was a matter (said he) of little difficulty, "for that the haven and galler of the haven, was in manner of a river long, narrow, and full of "shells and shallows. By which mean I should have cut off the benefit of the sea from the enemy, "and make him lose the use altogether of his navy. But no man there besides himself thought "well of this device. King Eumenes demanded, what they would do then after this chocking up "and stoppage of the haven passage, by sinking the ships? whether they would depart from thence "with their own navy at liberty, to help their allies and terrify and affright their enemies; or "over the later still, keep the haven (as it were) in siege with the whole fleet? For if they departed, "who could make doubt, but that the enemy would pluck up those dams and bars that there lay,

 "drowned? yea, and with less ado and trouble, open the haven again, than it was stopped; and if "they meant to say there never he less, to what purpose then was the haven shut up? But contrary-
 "wise, they within Ephesus (quoth he) being in surety for any danger from their haven, and ha"ving a most rich and wealthy City of their own, furnished with all things of use, would pass
 "the summer season in rest and repose: while the Romans, lying in the open wide Sea, exposed to "the violence of waves and lying at the mercy of tempests, should be day and night kept as continual "guards, disminded of all things, and rather tied up and debarr'd themselves, for being able to "effect those things that were needful to be done, than in case to compass and shut up their ene"mies. Then Eudemus the Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, opined for his part, and spake in the "question saying, That he rather disliked of this counsell, than knew himself a better, or could ad"vise what was to be done. Epiratus the Rhodian was of mind, to leave Ephesus for the present,
 "and to send part of his ships into Elycia, for to afflict and grieve them: Paras, the capital City of that "nation, shewing two things of great consequence, that bent by would accrue. For both the Rhodians
 "might thereby attend wholly, and employ all their forces upon the regard of this only war against "Antiochus; and also the Armado which was prepared in Elycia might be stopped; and not reach "for ever joining with Polyperides. This opinion prevailed, and prevailed much, for the thought
 "good it was and agreed upon, that Agallus should present himself before Ephesus, with the whole "fleet, to strike a terror into the enemies. And G. Livius was sent with some Rhodian gallies
 "Gallies, and two Sarmatimopen ships into Elycia, with this charge to take Paras in the night, and
 "with them these to communicate all his counsell. The Cities which he passed by, namely *Ad-
 "letary*, Almides, Halicarnassus, Onidas and Cos, performed willingly what he ever intreated "and imposed upon them. Being arrived at Paras, he declared unto the Rhodians the effect of his "commission, and withal acquired their advice. They all approved the design, and when he had "taken of them to the fleet that he had of his own, three quadremo gallies more, that he led to "Paras. At the first he had a merry gale of wind, that set them forward directly toward the "City, and good hope they had with their sudden resort to do some good with the inhabitants;
 "but afterwards, the wind being come about the Sea rose, and the surging waves began to make it "troublesome and dangerous: howbeit they laboured so with pain that they got to the shore side.
 "But neither was there about the City any safe bay to ride in, neither were they able to lanch the "Sea with anchor without the haven mouth of the enemies City, the Sea was so rough, and the "night so near. So passing along by the wall side of the City, they sailed so the point of Paras, which "then two miles distant from thence, which was a safe rode for their ships from all danger of sea,
 "but high cliffs and rocks there were over their heads, which commanded them, and the little
 "Townmen quickly fired, with the assistance of the Kings soldiers whom they had intermixed.
 "Against whom Livius sent out the able soldiers of the fleet, and the nimblest and most agile
 "young men of the Sarmatians, notwithstanding the landing place was very difficult and not "ward. These continued the fight at sea, so long as they shot darts, and made pertrye shots, and "profusion of skirmishes, than a direct battle, as being but few in number. But after that they "ran out of the City in great numbers, and that the whole multitude was issued forth, he was "left not only the small as should be expected and enclosed, but also the ships distressed and "dangered from the land, so he brought forth to fight, not the soldiers only, but all the Rhodians "themselves also, and the vessels armed and furnished with whatsoever weapons they could find.
 "And even then also there was doubt and danger on conflict, where in handes certain soldiers
 "Livius performed in the conflict of this sudden and voluntary skirmish. Yet in the end, the Rhodians "were discomfited, put to flight, and chased into their City. The Romans thus were enabled to "show Rhodians carrying away with them the triumphal victory for their pain. From thence they sailed "thence, and came to the place narrow strait of Tolus (which of one side toucheth Cos, and the other
 "the other) having made all hope to show any more, and for the Rhodians were dis"charged, and sent home. Livius after he had coasted along, he crossed over into Greece to the "end, was having remained and confuted with the Boys, who then shod about. The Rhodians
 "might sail directly into Italy, but he was not permitted to do so, for he was given over "to the Romans, when he had intelligence, that the design was intended in Elycia was given over,
 "and that Livius was departed into Italy, being himselfe assured to Rome, for that he was
 "violence of tempest repelled from Ephesus, and so he effected of his own will, though it was shame
 "and dishonour, that the advantage might be upon Rome in Asia, and the good defended in

A proper person to make a voyage thither with his whole fleet, and to assault the City with all the force he could possible. And having passed along Miletus, and all that coast of the associats, they disembarked from the gulf or creek of Bargilla, and came a land neer Iassus. The City was held by a garrison of the Kings: and the Romans waited by way of hostility, the territory about it. Then Emylus sent certain to parle with the chief citizens and the Magistrats, to sound them how they were disposed, and also to sollicite them to revolt: but being answered again that it lay not in their own power to do as they would, he marched forward to give an assault to the City. Now there were certain Iassians, banished persons, in company with the Romans, who in great number besought and importuned the Rhodians, not to suffer a City, so neer a neighbour and linked in bloud unto them, for to perish and come to ruin, especially having no way offended: alledging, that the only cause of their banishment was their loyalty unto the Romans, and by the same violence of the Kings garrison souldiers, were they also held in awe who remained in the City, by which themselves had been expelled. For all the Iassians in general were of one mind, most willing and desirous to avoid and shake off the servitude under the King. The Rhodians were moved in compassion with their prayers, and joining unto them King Eumenes also, partly by shewing the consanguinity and kindred between them, and partly by pitying and lamenting the distressed state of the City (besieged, as it were, already by the Kings garrison) they prevailed so much that they forbore to assault it. So they departed from thence, and because all other parts were peaceable, they sailed along the coast of Asia, until they arrived at Lotyma, a port or haven town even against Rhodes. There in the Principia began first a secret whispering among the Colonels (which afterwards came to the ears of Emylus himself) namely, That the navy was led away far enough off from Ephesus, where by right and of duty he was to war: to the end, that the enemy being left at liberty behind their backs, might attempt to do what he list without controlment, against so many Cities and States of the Roman allies, neer unto him. Emylus was moved herewith, and calling unto him the Rhodians, demanded of them, Whether the whole armado might ride conveniently within the haven of Pasara? And when they answered No, he took that occasion to pass no further, but to give over the voyage, and so brought back his ships to Samos.

In this same time Selenus the son of Antiochus, after he had kept his army all wintertime in Eolia, employing it partly in succouring his associats, and partly in sacking and pillaging those whom he could not draw into association, intended to invade the confines of King Eumenes his realm; while he (together with the Romans) was busied far from home, in assailing the maritime parts of Lycia. And first he approached Elaa in countenance of an enemy, with banner displayed: but afterwards, leaving to besiege the City, after spoil made in hostile manner of the territory, he marched forward to besiege and assault the head City and capital strength of all his Kingdom Pergamus. Attalus at the beginning seemed rather to brave and provoke him unto fight with his strong guards that he had placed without the City, and excursions with his horsemen and light armour, than to stand upon his guard and defence, and to receive the forces of his enemy: but at length, seeing by these light skirmishes that he was in no respect able to match Selenus, he retired himself within his walls, and so the City began to be besieged. And much about the same time, Antiochus also being departed from Apamea, first lay encamped at Sardia, and afterwards, not far from the camp of Selenus, neer to the head or source of the river Caicus, with a mighty army composed of diverse and sundry nations. The greatest shew of terror in this army was a redoubled Regiment of Gauls, to the number of four thousand, hired for wages, whom with some few other among them, he sent out to wait and destroy all parts of the territory about Pergamus. When news hereof came to Samos, Eumenes at the first, being called away by this war, (begun at home, even at his very doors) made haft with his fleet to Elaa, where finding in readiness certain horsemen and footmen both lightly appointed, by their sure convey and safe conduct, he came to Pergamus before the enemies had knowledge thereof, or enterprised anything. Where once again they began to make light skirmishes by way of excursions, for in truth Eumenes lay off, and was not willing to hazard the main chance upon a throw. Few dayes after, both the Roman and Rhodian fleet came from Samos and were arrived at Elaa for to aid the King Eumenes. When Antiochus was advertised that they had landed their forces at Elaa, and that so many armadoes were met together in that one haven, and hearing withal about the same time, that the Consul was already with a power in Macedony making reparation of all things for his passage over Hellaspont: he supposed now it was high time (before that he were pressed at once both by Land and Sea) to treat for peace, and therefore he seized a certain hill over against Elaa, to fortify and encamp in. Where, leaving his whole power of Infantry, he descended into the plains under the very walls of Elaa, with all his Cavalry, to the number of six thousand Horse. And sending an herald to Emylus, he gave him to understand, that he was desirous to have a treaty of peace. Emylus sent for Eumenes from Pergamus, and they both, together with the Rhodians, debated and counselled what to do. The Rhodians refused not the offer. But Eumenes said it was neither honourable to part off peace at that time, nor yet possible to conclude thereof, if they went about it. For being as we are (quoth he) pinned up within our walls and besieged, how can we receive from another, conditions of peace, saving our credit and honour? and who will hold that for a firm and assured peace, which we shall contract without the presence of the Consul, without the authority of the Senate, and without the grant of the people of Rome? For I demand of you, when we have made a peace, whether you will return presently into Italy or no? whether you will

“withdraw your fleet and army? or rather wait and expect to know the Consul his mind and “advise, the Senate pleasure and ordinance, and the general assent of the people in that behalf. It “remaineth then after that is done, that you stay still in Asia, and that your forces being brought “back again into their wintering harbors, (after they have done with warfare) fall to consume “and eat out our allies, by charging them with provision of victuals: and afterwards, if it shall so “please the higher powers, and those that are in authority to ordain, we must begin that war “new, which now we are able (if we slack not the time nor stop the forward course wherein we “are) before winter come, with the favor and power of the Gods, to finish and bring to a final “end. This advice took place: and answer was returned unto Antiochus, that there could be no treaty of peace before the Consul his coming. Antiochus having thus in vain sought for peace, when he had first foraged and wasted the territory of Elaa, and afterwards of Pergamus, left his son Selenus there, and went himself in person to * Adramyttium, pillaging and spoiling all the way as he journeyed, in all kind of hostility. Now this territory is a rich country, called, The champain plains of Thēbe: much renowned by the Poet Homer in his poem; and in no one place besides of all Asia got the Kings souldiers a greater booty and more pillage. Thither arrived also to Adramyttium both Æmylius and Eumenes (having set a compals by sea) for the defence of the said City. During this time, they sent for a thousand foot, and a hundred horse out of Achaia to come unto Elaa: all which forces were commanded by Captain Diophanes. So soon as they were disembarked and landed, there were ready to receive them certain men sent from Attalus of purpose to meet them, who by night conducted them to Pergamus. They were all old souldiers, and well experienched in feats of war: and their leader Diophanes had been brought up and trained under Philotarmenes, the greatest warrior in thoe dayes of all the Greeks, who took but two dayes for to rest his horse and men, and to take view of the enemies guards, namely, in what places and at what time they used customably either to come forward, or to retire. The Kings souldiers were approached almost to the very foot of the hill, where the City is situate. By means whereof they might forage behind at their will, and there was not one issued out of the City so much as to lance a dart aloof against the corps de guard of the enemies. After they were once so near driven for fear, that they were faine to keep themselves close within the walls, the Kings souldiers without began first to contemn, and afterwards to neglect them. Many of them had not their horses so much as saddled and bridled, and some few were left in arms and in ordinance of battail, the rest was gone aside and spent over all parts of the champain: some went to play and took themselves to youthful sports and wanton riot: others fell to feeding pampering their bellies, and making good cheer under covert shade, and many were laid along asleep. Diophanes beheld all the motions hereof aloft from an high turret of the City Pergamus, and presently gave commandment to his souldiers to take arms and to be ready at the gate. Himself went to Attalus, and told him, that he purposed to assail the enemies corps de guard. Attalus (although he were very loth) gave him leave: for he saw full well, that he was to fight with one hundred horse against three hundred and one thousand foot against four thousand. Being out of the gate, he sat him down not far from the enemies corps de guard, waiting when some good opportunity and occasion would offer self. Both they within Pergamus of one side, deemed this to be folly rather than hardiness: and also the enemies on the other side making towards them for a while, and perceiving them not to stir, altered nothing of their usual negligence, and that which more was, made a mockery and scorn of their small number. Diophanes kept his men still a good time, as if he had brought them forth only for a show, to see and to be seen: but after he perceived once the enemies to be disbanded out of their ranks and ranges, he commanded the footmen to make all the hast they could after, whilst himself leading the way first among his horsemen, ran with his whole troop as fast as he could, and setting up a shout and cry aloud on all hands, as well with four as horse, charged suddenly upon the enemies guards, ere they were aware of them. Man and horse both were greatly scared: and the horses especially having broken their collars and halters wherewith they stood tied, made foul work and much trouble among their own party. Some few of the horses kept their standing still unafrighted, and even those they had much ado to die, to bridle, and to mount upon: with so great a terrour came the Achæans, and with much more than to small a number could be thought to make. And as for the footmen in order arrayed and well provided they fell upon those that were negligently dispersed abroad, ere they looked for them, and in manner half asleep. Great execution and butchery was committed upon them all the fields over, and they fled again. Diophanes, having followed the chase as they ran away in scattering wise, so far as he might well with safety of himself returned to the guard and defence of the City, having won great honor to the nation of the Achæans by this exploit: for not only the men, but women also beheld this service, and looked on him from the walls of Pergamus. The next day after, the Kings Corps de guards were better ordered and kept closer together, and retired half a mile farther from the City, where they encamped themselves. The Achæans likewise much about the same time advanced to the very same place. Many hours together they looked one upon another who would begin first in respecting every minute when the charge should be given. But after the sun was neer going down, and that it was time to return unto the camp, they of the Kings part began to ruffle their ensignes and guidons together, and set forward with their bands, lorded in manner of a march for the way, more like than marshalled for to fight a battail. Diophanes sat still so long as they were within sight: but then he charged upon them forward,

A wand, with as great violence and fury, as the day before, and put them again into so great affright and trouble, that they gave them leave to wound them on their backs, and not one would stay to make head and resist, but trembling for fear, and hardly keeping the order of a march, they were bearen into their camp. This boldness of the Achæans forced Salsurus to dislodge and remove out of the territory of Pergamus.

Antiochus after he heard say that the Romans and Enmenes were come to the defence of Adramyttium, medled no more with the town itself, but after he had laid the fields waste, departed from thence, and forced Perga, a Colony of the Mityleneans. As for Cottan and Coryllenus, Aphrodisias and Pyrgus, they were won at the first assault, and so he returned to Sardis by Thyatira. Salsurus remaining still upon the sea-coasts, as he affrighted some, so he defended others. The Roman fleet together with Enmenes and the *Rhodian*s sailed first to Mitylana, and back again from thence, returned to Eles from whence she came. So they held on their course to Phocæa, and fell with an Island called Bacchius, situate above the City of the Phocæans: and after they had pillied and rifled by way of hostility the Temples, which heretofore they had forborn, and taken away the Images (for the Island was magnificently adorned and beautified therewith) they crossed over to the City itself, which they assailed in divers quarters, according as they had divided their forces into three parts: but seeing that it might not be won with bare scaling and strength of arms, without planting engines, of battery and other fabricks: and besides, that three thousand armed men sent from Antiochus for defence, were entered into the City, presently they gave over the siege, and the fleet retired to the Islands, having done no other exploit, but only pillied the territory about the City.

This done, it was thought good that Enmenes should have licence to depart into his own kingdom, that he might provide for the Consul and the army, all necessaries toward the passage over Hælesmontus: also that the Roman and Rhodian fleets should return to Samos, and there remain in guard, and have an eye unto Polyxenidas, lest he removed from Ephesus and made some attempt that way. So, the King returned to Eles, the Romans and *Rhodian*s to Samos, where M. Fulvius the Pretor his brother departed this life. The *Rhodian*s, after his funeral obsequies performed, sailed to Rhodus with thirteen ships of their own, one quinquageme galace of Cos, and the other of Gaidar, there to lie in rode, ready to make head against the fleet, which as the bruit blazed, was aboard and coming out of Synia. Two daies before that Endamius sailed from Samos with the Armado, thirteen ships, sent from Rhodus under the conduct of Admiral Phanphilides to encounter the said Syniac fleet, taking with them four other ships, which were for the guard of Caria, delivered from siege Dadala, and other petty forts which the Kings soldiers assailed. Then it was advised that Endamius should incontinently set forward on his voyage. And so that fleet which he had under his charge, he adjoined also four open ships. Being departed, he made sail in all haste that he possibly could, and arrived at the port called Megiste: where he overtook those that were gone before: from whence they came in one band, and train joyndy together unto Phaselis, and then they judged it the best way, in that place to attend the coming of the enemy. This Phaselis standeth upon the confines between Lycia and Pamphylia. It lieth far within the sea: it is the first land that sheweth itself, to them that sail from Calicut to Rhodus: and from thence a man may ken and discover ships under sail afar off: for which cause especially, this place chosen for a fit and convenient place, wherein they might encounter the enemies fleet. But by reason the summer was holocene, and the season of the year unhealthful (for it was midsummer), and the winds and blowing (as ours say) as they had not been acquainted with: many contagious diseases and maladies which they forewarned began to spread commonly abroad, and especially among the soldiers: for fear of which plague and mortality, they departed from thence, and sailed beyond the gulph of Phanphilus, and being arrived in the river Erymanus, they received advyce from the Aphrodisians, that the enemies were already before Sala. Those of the Kings side had sailed but slowly in regard of the adverse season of the winds named Ætisia, which was their fit and certain name, it becometh so, which they call Ætisia. Now of the *Rhodian*s there were three and thirtie Gallies, and a lesser sort besides. The Kings fleet consisted of twenty and three Gallies, and half: among which were three mighty Gallies of 70 banks of oars, and a few and twenty of 50 banks: the ordinary and some gallees. These were others also that were by a parcel or march over standing on aken in high place, now the enemies were at hand. The next morning by break of day both these fleets set forth of the haven, as if they would have fought that very day. And after that the *Rhodian*s had passed the cape, which from Sala hath a narrow passage to the sea, then suddenly they discovered of the enemies, and the enemies likewise discovered them. The King's side of the Kings fleet, flanked with the main force, was commanded by Antiochus and Andronicus one of his Gallies and contrived the right: so as now they had run and were close head in a row, and the *Rhodian*s advanced forward ordered in length and close.

G The Admiral ship of Endamius was foremost: Coryllenus commanded the second: and Phanphilides had the conduct of the middle ward. Endamius seeing the enemies battle arrayed and made for conflict, ran forth into the open sea, commanding the others to follow him, as he would keep their array, and so directly to assault the enemy, which at the first sight some would say he was not so far advanced into the deep, that all the ships could be far in view along the land side, and besides, himself making too much haste, with five ships of his own, and a few of the allies, for the others would not follow him, because they were bidden to range afront. Now the rereward had no room left them toward the land: and thus willed they hastily were jumbled together, the fight by that time was begun in the right wing against Annibal. But at one instant the Rhodians cast off all fear, as well in regard of the goodness of their ships, as of their own experience and usual practice in service at sea. For their ships with great quickness and agility making sail into the main sea, made room for every one that came after along the land side: and withall, if any one hapned to run upon a ship of the enemies with her piked beak head, either it rent the prow, or wiped away the oars, or passing clear through, between the ranks and files turned again and charged upon the poop. But the thing which terrified the enemy most was this, That a great galleace of the Kings which had seven banks of oars on a side, was binged and took a leak with one only knock, that it received by a Rhodian ship far less: whereupon the right wing of the enemy doubtles enclined to flie away. But Annibal pressed Eudamus very much in the open sea, most of all with multitude of ships: for other wise in all respects Eudamus had the odds and better hand of him by far: and certainly he had compassed and enclosed Eudamus round, but that a flag was put out of the Admirall, (by which signall the dispersed ships are wont to rally themselves together:) whereupon all those that had got the better of the enemy in the right wing, made haste to joyn in one for to succour their fellows. Then Annibal also and the ships about him, took their flight: but the Rhodians were not able to make way after them and to maintain the chase, by reason that the rowers many of them were sick, and therefore the sooner weary. Whereupon they cast anchor in the main sea, and staid to eat and take some refection for to strengthen their bodies. And in this while Eudamus espied and beheld the enemies how they haled and towed by ropes at the tail of the open ships (that went only with oars) certain other which were lame, maimed, sore bruised, and cracked: and might see 20 others not much sounder than they, to leave the rest and depart. Whereupon coming on Oars and silence to be made from an high turret in the fore-castle of the Admirall, Arise my hearts (saith he) and see a pleasant sight yonder and a goodly spectacle. So they all arose at once and beheld how the enemies were afraid and what poor shift they made in haste to flie, and with one voice they all in a manner cried out to follow after and pursue them. Now Eudamus his own ship was shaken in many places and sore bruised: whereupon he commanded Pamphilus and Charicles to make way after them, so far forth as they thought they might without danger. And for a good time they held them in chase: but seeing Annibal approaching near the shore, and fearing lest the wind would lock them within the enemies coast, they returned toward Eudamus, and drew along with them the great galleace which they took, and which at the first encounter was pierced, and with much ado staid it to Phaselis. From thence they retired themselves to Rhodus, not so joyous for this victory, as blaming one another that they had not either sunk or taken the whole fleet of the enemies, having so good means as they had to do so. Annibal daunted with this one unfortunate battell, durst not even then pass along the river of Lycia, but desired to joyn unto the old fleet of the Kings as soon as possibly he could. To impeach him for effecting that, the Rhodians let out Charicles and twenty war ships with piked stems, toward Patara and the Port of Megise, and commanded Eudamus to return unto the Romans to Samos with seven of the tatest ships in all the fleet whereof he had the command: to the end that he might induce the Romans with his counsell and advice, yea, and with all the countenance and authority that he had, for to lay siege unto Patara and to assault it. The Romans took great joy and contentment first at the news and report of this victory, and afterwards at the ruin of the Rhodians. And it seemed, if that one City stood nor in their way to stay them, and that they were once rid of that care, they would without any let and empeachment, make all the sea coast safe enough for any danger and damage from those quarters. But because Amilobar was departed from Samos, the Romans held them back, and would not suffer them to abandon the guard and defence of Samos and Naxos, for fear lest the Cities upon the sea-side might be surpris'd. And so they sent Pamphilus with four covered ships, to the fleet that lay about Patara. Amilobar gathered together not only the garnisons and aids of all the Cities that were about him, but also addressed his Embassadors with letters to Pompey the King of Syria, wherein he gave out hard words of the Romans for their passage into Asia, namely, That after coming only was for this, to demolish put down, and overthrow all kingdoms, and to set up the only Roman Empire that none else might stand in the whole world. But Philip and Antiochus were subdued and deposed, and now himself was to make the third, against whom they were come. Neither would they make an end there but go on still, like a continual fire that burneth forward, and take all afore them, and ever as they vanquished one, proceeded to conquer the next. And no doubt, they would make a bridge of him to pass onward into Syria, now that Antiochus hath gently taken upon his neck the yoke of voluntary servitude. Pompey was somewhat touched with these letters, but when there came others written from Syria the Consul, and his brother Asiaticus especially, he was wholly wonned from entertaining any such suspicion. For Antiochus besides the continual custom that the people of Asia had for to advance and amplify the Majesty of Rome, their allies and confederates with all kind of obsequies, alleged for his part, the domestic examples of their own house and family: in that Pompey their brother, who was dearer to him with his love and friendship, for he discomfited Antiochus that those Paces and petty Rome in Syria, whom he had received into his protection, he left behind him when he went away, mighty monarches also, that he not only had placed & established Antiochus in his fathers realm & throne,

bus seized him in the kingdom also of S. phia; who before had chased & expelled him: so as now he was not only the richest potent area and most wealthy King of all Asiatic, but also for his valour & puissance for a paragon equal to any other King in the whole world. As for Philip and Nabis enemies they were subdued & conquered by Antiochus, howbeit they remained Kings afterwards within their own Realms. And Philip verily the year that is past, had his tribute forgiven him and his son an hostage delivered unto him: yea, and some Cities without the dominion of Macedonia, have received them as their King, and the Roman Generals have winked thereat and been contented. And surely Nabis had been likewise graced and honoured, but for his own peevish folly first, & the treacherous falsehood afterwards of the Ætolians, which was his utter undoing and overthrow. But the chief thing of all that most confirmed the mind of King Prusias, was the coming of Livingus unto him in embassage from Rome; he, who aforesaid in quality of Prætor, had been Admiral of the navy. Who shewed and declared unto him, how the hope of victory was much more assured to the Romans than to King Antiochus; and withall how the Romans would be the faster and surer friend of the twain, yea, and make more conscience of keeping amity.

Antiochus being put besides all hope of the association with Prusias, departed to Ephesus from Sardis, to visit and see the fleet, which for certain months had been rigged and in readiness: and this he did the rather, because he saw that he could not hold out with the Roman army and the two Scipios, the commanders thereof, than for that his sea-service in it self at any time before sped well, or could assure him now of great and certain success. Yet some little dram he had of good hope for the present, in that his intelligence was, that a great part of the Rhodian fleet was about Patara, and King Eumenes also with all his own ships departed into Hellepontus, to meet with the Consul. Besides this, in some measure his spirit was puffed up with the remembrance, how the Rhodian Armado had been defeated at Samos by a cautelous plot and practise contrived beforehand: Having laid these conceits for a ground, he sent Polyxenidas away with his navy, to hazard the fortune of a battel in some sort or other (it made no matter how:) whilst himself in person led his whole army to Notium (a town of the Colophonians, seated upon the sea, and distant about two miles from the ancient City Colophon). The City it self he had a good mind to conquer and bring in subjection unto him: for, being so near unto Ephesus as it was, there could not any thing be done either by sea or land, but it was within the eye of the Colophonians, and by their means notified straightwaies to the Romans. Now he made full account that they would hinder their fleet from Samos to succour that associat City of theirs, and so Polyxenidas might thereby take his time and good opportunity to execute some notable exploit. Whereupon he went in hand to plant fabrieks against Colophon, and having raised his rampiers, and cast trenches on both sides alike, even to the very sea he approached with mantlets and terraces, as well the one part as the other, close unto the wals, and under the roof-works, plaid upon them with the push & force of the ram. The Colophonians much troubled and affrighted with these dangers and distresses, sent their Orators to Samos unto L. Cæcilius, to crave in humble manner the aid and succour of the Prætor and people of Rome. Emilius was much displeased and offended in his heart, that he had made so long abode at Samos and performed no service. Nothing less thought he than that Polyxenidas, whom twice already in war he had challenged and bidden battell, would now come to fight. He repaired it all for a disgrace and shamefull indignity unto him, that Eumenes his fleet assisted the Consul to waite over the legions into Asia, and himself was assigned and enjoined to sit out and aid the City of Colophon besieged, the issue whereof would be so doubtful and uncertain. Emilius the Rhodian, who was the man that had detained and kept him still at Samos, when he was desirous to pass over into Hellepontus; yea, & all he rest were instant with him, shewing and declaring how much better it was, either to deliver his allies from siege, or to defeat the fleet again, which it had before vanquished; and so to put the enemy quite besides the possession of the sea, and with the abandoning of his confederates, and betraying of both sea and land into the hands of Antiochus to depart into Phrygia (where Eumenes with his fleet was sufficient to hold his play) and to quit this part of the war which was committed to his charge. Well they looked from Samos to provide vigils for the all their own provision was spent, & shaped themselves to cross over unto Chios. That was the farther and more remote of the Romans, and the very place into which all the ships of burden, and the hulks and out of Italy, used to set sail and load their countries. So the hopes of conquest about, toward the east of the Island that lay furthest off from the City, opposed on the Northward, in regard of Chios and Erubra. And as they were about to pass by either the Prætor was certified by letters, that great store of corn was come amply to Chios: that the ships which were charged with wine, were kept back by contrary wind and boisterous winds. Antiochus reported it was, that the Teyans had furnished King Antiochus his fleet with victuals plentifully and liberally, and had promised also unto him five thousand men to fight with him. Whereupon he thence forth suddenly in the midst of his dread doubt, and made himself for Chios, intending either with their good wills to recover himself of the provision prepared for the enemy, or else to hold them for no better than enemies. Having directed the bows of their ships toward the land, they might destroy, as it were, fifteen ships near unto Myndus. Antiochus the Prætor supposing at the first to be of the Kings fleet, resolved to make way after them: but which was disappointed, they were but the names of pirates, and certain small barks of rovers and men of prey. These doers having burned and spoiled all the maritime coasts of the Chians, were upon the instant returned with great store of prizes and pilage: but when they discovered a fleet in the deep sea afar off, they made all the sail they could, and fled. Yare of floorage they were and N good of sail, by reason that their vessels were more light, and made of purpose to rid way, and beides nearer they were to land. And therefore they had recovered Myonesus, before the fleet could come any thing near unto them. The Prætor thinking verily to force them out of the haven, made after without direction of a skilfull pilot, and knowledge of the place. Now this Myonesus is a promontory or cape between Teios and Samos, a very mountain made in fashion of a steeple, broad enough at the foot, but rising narrower still, and runneth up to the top sharp pointed. On the main or land side it hath one passage by a straight and narrow path. From the sea it is founded upon rocks, beaten and eaten with the continual surging waves of the sea, in so much, as in some places the cliffs that hang over, bear more into the sea than the vessels that lie under the harbor, take up of the sea. The Prætor with his ships durst not approach near unto those crags, for fear of being within the shot of the pirats, who were perched upon the top of those steep rocks, and so they spent that day and lay off. At the last, a little before night they gave over that vain enterprise without effect, and the morrow after arrived at Teios; and having lodged their ships within the harbor, which themselves call Gerastrion, (and it lieth out at the back side of the City) the Prætor set ashore, and sent out his souldiers to forrage the territory about the City. The Teians seeing how their lands were spoiled even under their very noses, addressed certain Orators to the Roman Admiral, arraied all in white, after the manner of humble suppliants. And as they would have seemed to excuse their City, for having done or said any thing against the Romans tending to hostility; he both charged them directly, that they had relieved the fleet of the enemies with victuals, and also told them what quantity of wine moreover they had promised to Polyxenidas. But and if they K could be content to do the like by the Roman fleet, he would recall his souldiers from pillage, otherwise he would repute them for his enemies. The Embassadors aforesaid made relation of this heavy answer. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City assembled the people together, for to consult, and conclude about this matter what they were best to do. Thither as it hapned, was Polyxenidas arrived with the Kings Armado; who having loosed from Cylophon, when he heard that the Romans were departed from Samos, that they had chased the Pirats as far as Myonesus, and were now waiting and harrying the lands of the Teians, also that their ships anchored in the rode Gerastrion; himself also cast anchor over against Myonesus, hard by an Island which the sai-lers and mariners call Macris, in a secret bay hard by, esconting and espying from this near harbor, what the enemies did and intended. And at the first in good hope he was to discomfit and L defeat the Roman fleet, like as he had beforetime the Rhodian Armado near unto Samos, by seizing the mouth of the haven, and empeaching their issue forth. For this bay was in all respects like unto the other, lying just between two Capes, which meet so near, and in manner enclose the mouth thereof, that hardly two ships at once can go forth together. And to this purpose Polyxenidas intended in the night season to take possession, and make himself sure of the said straights, there to place ten gallies under either Cape, which standing there at a vantage, should from both points flank the broad sides of his enemies ships in their going forth; and withall out of his other vessels to disbarke and land armed souldiers, like as he had done at Panormus, and so at once to assail them both by sea and land, and make an end of them for all. Which designment of his no doubt had taken effect, but that the Romans, after that the Teians had promised them to do M whatsoever they should command, thought it more commodious for the receiving of their provision of victuals, to pass with their ships unto the other harbor which was before the City, to the open sea. Some say that Eudamus the Rhodian, shewed the inconvenience and discomodity of the other harbor; by occasion that two gallies fortuned in that straight to be so intangled, that they brake one anothers oars with mulling together. And among other motives the Prætor was induced to change the harbor, because from the land side there he should lye within danger, considering that Antiochus himself was encamped not far off. Thus the fleet being brought about close to the City side, the souldiers and mariners (without the knowledge of any commanders) J were disbarked for to dispose & dispense the victuals and wine especially to every ship. But about noon side a certain peasant of the country chanced to be brought before the Prætor, who gave N intelligence. That there was a fleet of ships which two daies already rode at anchor under the Island Macris; and that but a while ago, certain vessels of them were seen to weigh anchor, as if they would hoise up sail and be gone. The Prætor moved at this sudden occurrent, commanded the trumpets to sound the alarm, and to give knowledge and warning, that in case any were straggling abroad in the fields they should retire. The Colonels he sent into the City to gather the soul-diers together, and the mariners, that they might repair to ship-board. This alarm caused as great a trouble and confusion, as usually is seen in a sudden scarefire, or when a City is surprized by the enemies. Here was scudding into the City to recall their fellows; there was running out of the City to recover their ships: not knowing who commanded, by reason of the dissonant noise of men and sound of trumpet; howbeit, as hap was, at length they ran all toward the ships, but in such O a hurly-burly and disorder that they scarcely knew their own vessels, or if they did, they could hardly for the croud and press, get thither and embark themselves. Neither had this affright passed clear without danger both by sea and land, but that Emylins gave direction to every one what to do, and put out of the haven first himself with the Admiral ship into the open sea, & there received every vessel as they followed one after another in their order, & ranged them all affront:

and if Eudamus also with the Rhodian fleet had not staid at the shore to see good order, that the souldiers

A soldiers might be set aboard without hurrying in fearfull heeles, and every ship go forth as it was fitted and made ready. By this means both the foremost of the vanguard went arranged in the sight of the Prator, and the Rhodians also kept their order in the rearguard in such sort, as they put themselves into the open sea in as good array, as if they had seen the Kings fleet under sail. But they were between the two promontories, Dopenus and Coryneus, before they descried the enemy. The Kings Armado came forward in long files, two and two in a rank, who displayed and spread themselves all offshoot towards the wing in such wise, that they might be able to compass and enclose the right wing of the enemy. Which Eudemus, the rene-admirall perceiving, and seeing with all that the Romans could not possibly make head alike and extend themselves as broad as the enemy, and were at the point already at the right wing to be environed, made haste with his own vessels (for the Rhodian barks were of all other in the whole fleet swiftest by far) and after he had fronted equally and matched wing for wing, he made head with his own ship against the very admiral of the enemies, wherein Polyxenidas himself was aboard. By this time the battell began between both the main fleets, all at once from every part. Of the Romans side there fought four-score in all, whereof two and twenty were Rhodians. The enemies armado consisted of four-score and nine, all ships of greatest bulk and making, and had among them three galleaces of six banks of oars on a side, and two of seven. For goodness and strength of ships, as also for valour of soldiers, the Romans far surpassed the Rhodians. But for agility and nimbleness of their vessels, for skillfull knowledge of Pilots, and expert cunning and readines of mariners, the Rhodians were as much beyond them. And those above all the rest that carried fire before them in their noses troubled and scared the enemies most: and that stratagem and device which had been their only help and means of safety, when they were surprised and beset at Panormus, was now the thing that stood them in best stead to win the victory. For the Kings ships fearing the fire that threatened their very faces, turned aside, because they would not run ashore with their prows: so as they neither could themselves smite and hurt the enemies with their brazen pikes in the beak head, nor yet avoid them, but expose their own broad sides open to receive all pusses and violence from them. If any one fortun'd to encounter and run upon them, she was sure to be paid and sped with fire that was flung and cast into her: and more running there was to quench the flame, than otherwise to fight. Howbeit, the resolute valour of the Roman soldiers (which ever in war prevailth most) was it that did the deed. For after the Romans by mere force had broken and given the main battaillon of the enemy in the very midst, they turned about again, and presented themselves behind, and plaid upon the backs of the Kings ships whiles they fought afront and made head against the Rhodians: and thus at one instant the battaillon in the midst, and the ships in the left wing that served King Antiochus, were beset round about, and sunk to the bottom of the sea. The right wing as yet entire and sound, was more terrified at the loss and overthrow of their fellows, than for any proper danger of their own. Howbeit, after they saw the other invested, and the Admirall her self with Polyxenidas in her, to abandon her companions and to hoist up sails, they likewise in haste set up all their cloth and small triquet sails (for a good forewind they had for Ephesus) and fled as fast away as they could. Two and forty ships they lost in this fight: of which thirteen were boarded and taken for the use of the Romans, the rest were either consumed with fire, or devoured of the sea. Two Roman ships were shattered and broken in pieces, and some other hurt, bruised and cracked. One Rhodian chanced to be taken by a notable and memorable adventure. For having with her piked beak head stricken a Sidonian ship, with the violence of the blow she shook out her own anchor, which by one of the flouks took fast hold as if it had been a grappling hook by the prow of the other ship. The Rhodians much troubled herewith, gave over sowing streight, as willing and desirous to be loose and parted from the enemy: and whiles they were busie therewith, the cable which the anchor drew with it caught among the oars of her own ship, and swept them clean away, and so left one side of it naked, whereby the ship being much weakened and enfeebled, was taken by the other that was smitten and led fast into her. Much after this manner was the battell fought at sea near Myonessus. Whereupon Antiochus was sore affrighted: for being thus dispossessed of the sea, he distrusted himself that he should not be able to hold and defend the places farther off: and therefore commanded the garrison to retire from Lyfianachia, for fear it shoud be surprised there by the Romans. But this was but a bad piece of counsell as he foretold and issue proved afterwards. For it had been an easie matter not only to defend Lyfianachia against the first assault of the Romans, but also to hold out the siege all winter, yea, and by drawing out the time of length, to bring the very assailants themselves lying in length, to extreme necessity and want of all things: during which space they might have taken some occasion and opportunity, to find a mean and in the way for peace. Neither did he only quit Lyfianachia, and leave it for the enemies after this unfortunate battell, but he raised his siege before Colophon and dislodged yea, and retired himself to Sardis from whence he sent into Cappadocia to Antiochus for aid, and to all other places where he could, to gather more forces, and now was he set upon no design else, but to give battell, and to hazard all upon the fortune of the field.

After this Navall victory, Antiochus sailed directly to Ephesus, where he embattelled his ships in array even before the haven, and when by this bravado he had at last wrung again from the enemies a plain and evident confession that they had abandoned the sea unto him, he set sail for Chios, unto which he had intended to shape his course from Sardis before the last battell upon the sea. There he repaired and calked his ships which were shaken and cracked in the forsaide fight: which done, he sent Lucius Emilius Scaurus with thirty sail toward Phileponia to transport the army. And when he had rewarded the Rhodian ships with part of the pillage, and honoured them with the navall spoils, he gave them the renvoy, and sent them home. But the Rhodians lustily out-failed Scaurus, and prevented his ships to set over the fortes of the Consul: and after they had performed that service also, then they returned to Rhodes.

The Roman Armado sailed from Chios to Phocaa. This City is seated far within the gulph of the sea, builded so, as that it lieth out in length. The wall containeth in compais the space of two miles and an halt: and from both sides it groweth narrow still, and meeteth in the midst, resembling the form of a wedg or coin, which the inhabitants themselves call Lampier, in which place the City is a mile broad and a quarter with the vantage. From which canton or corner there is a bank of firm land running a mile on end into the sea like a tongue, which divideth the haven just in the midst, marked out (as it were) just by a certain line. Where it joyneth to the narrow straights it hath two most sure harbors of both sides, and those lying two contrary waies. That which looketh toward the South, is called according as it is indeed, N.ustakmos [namely, a ship-rode, or harbour] for it is able to receive a great number of ships: the other haven is near unto the very Lampier afore said. When the Roman fleet was once possessed of both these most sure and safe harbours, the Prator thought good before he set in hand either to scale the walls, or to raise any fabricks and plant engines against the City, to send certain of purpose to sound the minds and affections of the principall Citizens and the Magistrates within. But after he perceived they were obstinately bent, and would not come on, he began to lay battery against it in two severall quarters. The one part was not much peopled, and had but few dwelling houles in it; and the Temples of their gods took up a good space thereof: and there began he first to approach with the ram, and therewith to batter the walls, and shake the turrets: and by that time that the multitude ran thirther in great numbers, and presented themselves ready to defend, the ram was pushing also at the other part: So as now the walls were laid along in both places: and upon the fall thereof whiles some of the Roman souldiers presently gave the assault at the very breach, mounting and marching upon the ruines of the stones that were fall: others also assayed to gain the top of the upright walls with scaling ladders. But the townsmen withstood them so stiffly, and with such resolution, that it was well seen they reposed more hope of defence in arms and valour, than in the strength of their walls. Whereupon the Prator seeing in what danger his souldiers stood, and fearing to expose and sacrifice them ere they were aware to the fury of these people so enraged like desperate and mad persons, commanded to sound the retreat. And notwithstanding the assault ceased, and was given over, yet betook not the townsmen themselves to rest and repose, but ran from all parts every one, to raise countermures, fill up the breaches, and repair the ruines where the wall was down. As they were wholly employed about this business, Q. Antonius sent from the Prator, came toward them: who, after he had reproved and rebuked their wilfull obstinacy, and made remonstrance unto them, that the Romans had more care and regard than they themselves of the City, that by continuall assaults and batteries it should not utterly be destroyed: and how if they would be reclaimed and forgo their outrageous folly, he would make them this offer. That they should yield under the same conditions and in those very terms, as aforetime they had submitted to C. Livius when they came under his protection. At the hearing of that, they demanded and had five daies space to consider of the matter: during which time they made means to receive some aid from Antiochus: but after their Embassadors whom they dispatched to the King, had made relation, That there was no succour to be expected from him: then they set open their gates, having articulated and capitulated beforehand, that no outrage by way of hostility should be exercised and committed upon them. As the Romans entered into the City with banners displayed, the Prator declared with a loud voice, That his will and pleasure was they should be spared, inasmuch as they had yielded. Whereat the souldiers on all hands set up a great cry. That it was an intollerable shame that the Phocaeans (who were never true and loyall confederates, but allwaies dogged and malicious enemies) should go away so scotfree, and not suffer for their sins. At which word (as if the Prator had given them a signal of ransacking) they ran into all parts of the City to rife and spoil. Emilius at first staid them what he could, and reclaimed them again, saying, That it was not the manner to sack Cities rendred by composition, but such as were forced and won by assault: and even those also were at the disposition of the Generall and not of the souldiers. But seeing that they in their angry mood of revenge, and covetous desire of goods, were of more power than the respective reverence of his person, his quality and commandment: he sent out beadies and trumpeters throughout the City, charging all persons of free condition whatsoever, to repair before him into the market place, to the end, that no villany and outrage might be done upon their bodies. And so the Prator did his best to perform his word and promise in whatsoever lay in his power: for he restored unto them their City, their lands, and their down laws. And for that the winter approached, he made choice of the two harbours of Phocaa to bestow his ships there for the winter time.

Near about that time, the Consul having passed beyond the borders of the Adriani and Maronitis, received news, that the Kings army was defeated at Myndus, and Eximachus furnished of the garrison: and this latter tidings was more acceptable and pleasing unto him, than the other of the navall victory, and especially, when they came thither, where in very much the City

- A (plentifully stored with all sorts of victuals; as if they had been provided of purpose against the coming of the army) received them courteously; whereas they made no other account, but to endure extremity of want and painfull travell in besieging thereof. There they abode some few daies as it were in camp, untill such time as their carriages and sickly persons of their train might reach unto them: such as they had left behind in all the forts and castles of Thrace, wearied with long journey and enfeebled with divers infirmities. When all were come and well refreshed and recovered, they put themselves again in their journey, and marching through Chersonesus, they came to Hellepont: where finding all things in readines for their transporting (such was the industrious care and diligence of King Eumenes) they passed over without trouble and molestation into the peaceable coasts of their allies and friends, without impeachment of any person, notwithstanding some ships arrived in one place, and some in another. And this was the thing that much contented the Romans, and mightily encouraged them to see they had so free passage into Asia, which they made full reckoning would have been a matter of great difficulty and trouble. After this, they encamped and made their abode a certain time near Hellepont, by occasion of those daies which happned then to be, wherein the Salii used to dance with their scutcheions called Ancilia; during which time they made scruple of conscience to take any journey [untill those Ancilia were bestowed again in the Temple of Mars.] By reason of which daies, P. Scipio also withdrew himself apart from the army upon a more strict regard of conscience & religion, which touched him nearer than other, because he was himself one of the Salii, and was the cause that the army staid behind and came not forward to overtake the camp.
- C And even then there happned to come unto the camp from Antiochus, one Heraclides a Byzantine, having in charge to treat as touching a peace: and good hope he conceived to obtain the same with ease, by reason of the long abode and stay of the Romans in that one place: of whom he had looked for no other, but that as soon as they had set foot in Asia, they would have marched apace straightwaies against the Kings camp. Howbeit this course he took, not to go directly unto the Consul before he had spoken and conferred with Scipio, (and indeed such direction and charge he had from the King himself) in whom he had reposed his greatest hope: for besides his magnanimity and noble courage, as also the satiety of glory and honour, whereof already he had his full (great inducements unto the King that he would be easily wrought and made most pliable to hearken after peace) all the world knew full well how soberly he had carried himself in his victories first in Spain, and afterwards in Affrick: and more than all this, a son of his was captive in the said Kings hands. But where, when, and by what chance he was taken prisoner, writers agree not no more than in many things else. Some say, that in the beginning of the war, he was beset and enclosed round within the Kings ships, at what time as he sailed from Chalcis to Orenum. Others write, that after the Roman army was passed over into Asia: he was sent out in espiall with a troop of Fraggellan horsemen to view and discover the Kings camp: and when the Kings Cavalry made out to charge upon them, he made haste to retire, and in that hurry his horse fell with him and so he and two other men of arms with him, was surprised, taken, and brought to the King. But this one thing is for certain known, that if there had been sure and firm peace between the King and the Romans, nay, if there had been familiar acquaintance and hospitality between him and the Scipios, this young Gentleman could not possibly have had more friendly entertainment, nor been more kindly intreated, liberally used, yea, and honourably regarded than he was. For these causes the Ambassador attended the coming of Scipio: and so soon as he was arrived, presented himself unto the Consul, requesting that he might deliver his message and be heard. Whereupon in a frequent assembly he had audience given him, and thus he spake: "Whereas (quoth he) there have been divers and sundry embassages passed to and fro as touching peace, and no good as yet done: I lay this for a ground and assure my self now to speed, because the former ambassadors hitherto have effected and obtained nothing: for in all those treaties and disputations the question was about Smyrna, Lampsacus, Alexandria, Tyre, and Lyfimachia, which is in Europe. Of which Cities, the King my Master hath already quit Lyfimachia, to the end you should not say that he hath any one City at all within Europe: and as for those other in Asia he is ready to surrender them also; yea, & all the rest whatsoever which the Romans would recover out of the Kings hands and dominions in regard they had sometime sided & taken part with him. And for the charges which the Romans have detained about this war, the King will be willing to disburse and make good the one moiety unto them again. And thus much spake he concerning the articles and conditions of the peace. The rest of his speech behind, was bestowed in advertizing and putting them in mind of the alternative revolution of this world and the affairs thereof: that as they should see their own good fortune and prosperity with measure and moderation so they ought not to press down others in their adversity: but hold themselves contented within the bounds and limits of Europe, and that was a dominion sufficient (as man would think) and exceeding great: considering this, that it is an easier matter to win one thing after another by way of conquest, than to hold and keep them all together when they are won. To conclude, if the Romans were minded to dismember any part from Asia, so they would make an end once, and limit out the same within certain precincts without any further doubt and difference, the King for the love of peace and concord, would suffer the Romans in their innumerable desire and appetite, to surmount and overcome his temperance and moderation. But those matters which the Ambassador supposed were of great importance and effectual to obtain obtain peace, the Romans made a pish at it, and lightly regarded: for they judged it but meer and fit reason; that the King should discharge all the expences they had been at in this war, considering through his default it first arose: also that he ought to withdraw his garrisons not only out of Ionia and Eolia: but also like as all Greece hath been made free and delivered, so the Greek Cities likewise in Asia ought to be enfranchised and set at liberty: which possibly might not betwixt Antiochus were diseized of the possession of all Asia on this side the mountain Taurus. The Embassador perceiving well, that there was no reason to be had in the assembly, assaied privately to sound and to win the heart and good will of Scipio, according as he had in charge from the King. And first this way he went to work and laid, That the King was minded to send him his son again freely without ransom: then (ignorant as he was both of Scipio his nature and the manner of Romans) he promised him a mighty mass of gold, yea, and to be made equal companion in the government of the whole kingdom (the Kings name and royall st yle only reserved) in case he would be an instrument and means to effectuate peace. To these motives and offers Scipio returned this answer, "That you neither know the Romans all in general, nor my self in particular unto whom you were sent, I less marvell, seeing you are altogether ignorant of the state of him who hath sent you hither. For if ye had meant to have sought for peace at our hands, as of men who were in care for the doubtfull event and issue of the war, ye should have held and kept Lysimachia still, for to have impeached our entrance into Chersonesus, or else ye should have made head against us in Hellepontus; and staid our passage into Asia: but now seeing ye have granted passage into Asia, and suffered your selves not only to be bridled and curbed, but also to be yoked, and like beasts to bear and draw too: since I lay there is no remedy but ye must endure to be under our subjection, what equall and indifferent means of treaty is there left for you? Now, as concerning my son, I will accept it as a great present, and beseeching the munificence and liberality of a King, in case he send him to me again. As for the other matters, I pray God I be never driven in regard of mine estate, to have that need: for surely, I carry a mind that will never find the miss and want thereof. And for these great offers that the King maketh unto me, he shall find me thankfull unto him, if it please him for any private benefit unto me done, to require at my hands a private favour and pleasure again: but as touching the State and publike weal, he shall pardon me: I will neither receive ought from him, nor bestow any thing upon him. And all that I can do for him at this present, is to give him good and faithfull counsell. Go your waies therefore and tell him from me, That his best courie is to abstain from war, and not to refuse any condition of peace whatsoever. But all this nothing moved the King, who made reckoning that any hazard and fortune of war would be good and safe for him, since that there were laws imposed upon him already, as if he had been quite vanquished and overcome. Whereupon, without any more parl of peace for this time, he bent his whole mind and employed his study about provision and preparation for war.

The Consul having given order for the execution of all his plots and designs, dislodged from thence, and marched first to Dardanium, and after to Rhaceum: the inhabitants of both which Cities came forth to meet him upon the way in great multitudes. From thence he went forward to Ilum, and encamped in a plain under the very walls: then he entered into the town, and ascended up into the Castle, where he offered sacrifice unto Minerva, the patroness of that City. The Ilans entertained them with all shew of honour, as well in deed as in word, acknowledging that the Romans were descended from them, and the Romans again were as joyous and glad to see the place of their first original and beginning. From thence they removed, and the sixth day after arrived at the head or spring of the river Caicus. Thither also Eumenes the King (who at first assaied to bring his fleet back from Hellepontus, to winter before Ela, and afterwards, when he could not for certain daies double the point of Lebos, by reason of the contrary winds, went a land) because he would not fail but be present at the beginning of these great affairs, made haste the next way with a small power to the camp of the Romans. From the camp he was sent back to Pergamus, to give order for purveyance and provision of victuals: and after he had delivered out corn to those whom the Consul had appointed to receive it, he returned again to the same leaguer. The Consul his purpose and intent was to be provided aforehand of victuals sufficient for many daies, and together in one train to go against the enemy, before the winter surprised them.

Now the Kings camp lay about Thyrra: where Antiochus hearing that P. Scipio was carried sick to Ela, sent certain Embassadors of purpose, to present and deliver his son again unto him. At which present of his, he took not only great contentment in his spirit, as a father might do for receiving his dear son, but much easement also and comfort to his sick body. After he had satisfied himself at length with much embracing of his son, "Ye shall (saith he) recommend me unto the King your Master, and tell him from me, that I thank him most heartily, and that I have no good thing at this time to send to him again, but only this, That I advise him to take heed that he enter not into the field to give battell, before he hath heard for certain, that I my self am returned to the leaguer. Upon relation hereof, Antiochus albeit he was in camp seventy thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse and above strong (which puissant power otherwhile animated, and fed him with the hope of good issue of battell) yet moved with the authority of so great a personage as Scipio was in whom he reposed his whole refuge against all doubtfull events of the fortune in war, he retired back, and passed over the river Phrygius, and pitched his camp about Magister fa near unto Sypalum. And fearing, lest (if he should be minded to make long stay and abode there)

A there) the Romans would assay to force his defences, he cast a trench, six cubits in depth, and twelve in breadth, and this trench he environed with a double bank and course of strong stakes and pales, and upon the inward circuit and enclosure he opposed a more with main towers, for the more easie empeachment of the enemy, when he should pass over the trench. The Consul supposing the King to be about Thyatira, marched continually, and upon the fift day came down into the plains of Hircania. And when he understood, that the King was dislodged and departed thence, he followed him by the tracts, and on this side the river Phrygius encamped four miles from the enemy. Where about a thousand horsemen shewed themselves (for the most part * Gallogrecians, some Dacians, with certain archers on horseback of other nations intermingled among them) who in great battell having passed over the river, charged upon the corps de guard of the

B Romans. At the first they put the Romans to some trouble, finding them out of order and array: but as the skirmish grew hotter and continued longer, and the number of the Romans soon increased, (by reason their camp was so near to yield them succours) they of the Kings side being now wearied and not able to make their part good against so many of them, began to retire: and certain of them before they could take the river, were overtaken by those that followed the chase, and killed outright. For two daies after they stirred of no hand, for neither the one nor the other went over the river. The third day after the Romans all at once passed over, and encamped about a mile and a half from the enemies. But as they were pitching their tents, and busied about fortifications and defences, three thousand chosen horsemen and foot together from the Kings Camp, came upon them with a great trouble and affray. The number of them that were in guard,

C was leisa good deal; howbeit, of themselves alone, without calling to help and aid the souldiers from their work about the fortification and defence of the camp, they not only at first received the charge with equal valour, but also afterwards, as the fight encreased, put the enemies to flight, when they had killed some hundred of them, and taken prisoners almost as many. For the space of four daies next ensuing, both armies stood embattell'd on either side before their Camp. And upon the fifth day the Romans advanced forth into the middle of the plain, Antiochus came not forward with his ensignes, insomuch, as the hindmost were not an hundred foot off from the trench. The Consul perceiving that he fell off and would no battell, called a councill the next day, to be advised and resolved what he were best to do, in case Antiochus would not be fought withall. For considering that the winter approached, the souldiers were either to lie in the

D field under their tents, or else if they minded for the winter season to retire unto their garrison towns, the war must be put off untill the next summer. Now the Romans never made so small reckoning of any enemy as of him. Whereupon, throughout the whole assembly they called upon the Consul with one voice to lead forth to battell out of hand, and take the souldiers while they were in this heart ready if the enemies would not come out into the field to pass over ditch and rampier, and break into the camp amongst them: making account, that they were not to fight with so many thousands of enemies, but rather to make a slaughter and butchery of so many beasts. Whereupon Cn. Domitius was sent to discover the way, and to view the place where was best entering upon the trench and rampier of the enemies. After he had brought certain relation of all things, it was thought good the next morrow to approach near unto their camp: and on the

E third day the ensignes were displayed forth into the midst of the plain, and they began to rage the army in battell array. Antiochus likewise supposed it was not expedient to lie off and stay any longer, for fear lest in refusing still to fight, he should either abate the courage of his own men, or increase the hope of his enemies, and therefore came abroad with all his forces, and advanced so far forward from his camp that it appeared well he meant to fight. The Roman army stood embattell'd in one manner of form, as well for men, as munition and armour; for of Romans there were two legions, and of Larine associates as many, and every legion consisted of five thousand four hundred. The Romans put themselves in the main battell, and the Larines kept both the points. The Hastati were placed with their ensignes foremost in the vanguard. After them the Priapei in the midst, and the Triarii in the rearguard. Without this compleat battell, thus marshalled,

F the Consul set to the right point the auxiliary souldiers of Eumenes, mingled together with the targeteers of the Acheans, to the number almost of three thousand, whom he ranged equally a front, and beyond them more outward he opposed about three thousand men of arms: whereof eight hundred were sent from Eumenes, the rest were the Cavalry of the Romans. With out all these in the outmost place, he put the Traillians and Candians, who in all made up the number of five hundred. As for the left wing, it seemed to need no such succours, by reason it was flanked with the river and high steep banks, howbeit, in that side there were planted four troops of horsemen. Thus you see all the forces that the Romans had besides two thousand Thracians and Macedonians mingled and bleed together, who followed as voluntaries, and were left for the guard of the Camp and sixteen Elephants, which they bestowed in the rearguard for the defence of the

G Trois. For, over and besides that they were not like to hold out against the Kings Elephants, which were in number fifty and four, you must consider that those of Affrick are not able to match them of India, say they were in number equal: either because in height the Indians exceed the other: (as in truth they are much greater by odds) or surpass them in courage and stomach. But the Kings army was composed of divers nations, different as well in arms as in souldiers. He had of Macedonians sixteen thousand footmen, heavily armed after their manner, called Phalangia: these made the main battell, and in the front stood divided in ten called Gelas.

Squadrons,

squadrons parted and severed one from the other by two Elephants placed between. More inward behind the forefront, the battell was disposed in two and thirty ranks of soldiers. This was the strength of the Kings army, and as in other respects, so especially in regard of the Elephants surmounting aloft over all the soldiers, represented to the eyes fearful and terrible fight. For besides that they were high and lofty of themselves, their crested headstalls with plumes upon them; their towers upon their backs, and in every tower four men standing in glittering armour, besides the Master and governor himself made the appearance and shew far greater. On the right wing, he placed close unto the Phalangites, a thousand and five hundred horsemen of the Gallogrecians: unto whom he adjoynd three thousand lances in compleat armour, mounted upon hard horses, and those men of arms they themselves called Campyrati. To these were added another wing of a thousand horsemen, which they named Agema. Medes they were, elect and chosen men, together with more horsemen of the same region, mingled of many nations one with another. Close unto them in the rearguard was set a troop of sixteen Elephants. On which side also in a wing some what farther drawn out stood the King his own cohort, bearing the name of Agathaspides, by occasion of the silvered shields which they bare. After them followed 2200 Dacians, archers on horseback. Then, three thousand footmen lightly armed, and composed partly of Candiors, and partly of Tralleans, in number almost equal, and 2500 Myrians attended upon the archers. And the utmost side and tail of that wing was guarded with four thousand Cyrtan slingers and Elymea marchers sorted together. On the left wing likewise there stood far unto the Phalangites aforesaid 300 horsemen Gallogrecians: and two thousand Cappadocians armed after the same manner, sent from King Artabates. Then the Auxiliaries of all sorts 2700 besides three hundred lances in compleat harness upon barbed horses armed at all pieces, and 1000 other horsemen. As for the Cornet of the Kings, it was more lightly armed, as well themselves as their horses, but their setting out and furniture otherwise, all one. And these were Syrians for the most part, with Phrygians and Lydians together. Before this cavairy went the chariots of four wheels, and drawn by as many horses, armed with sharp and trenchant hooks like fish-blades, and the camels called by them for their swiftness Dromedaries. Upon these were mounted the Arabian archers, who also were armed with keen swords four cubits long, that fitting as they did to aloft, they might notwithstanding reach their enemy. Then after these were set another multitude equal to that in the right wing, whereof the foremost were certain horsemen called Tarentines, and after them 2500 Gallogrecian horse. Likewise of Neocretans 1 thousand and of Carians and Cilicians one with another 500 armed alike. As many Tralleans and Pholish thousand targeteers. These were Pisidians, Pamphylians and Lycians: and last of all, the rearmost in the rearguard of Cirtians and Elymeans, in like number as they that were placed in the right wing, with sixteen Elephants also distant a pretty way asunder. The King himself in person had the conduct of the right point of the battell, and ordained Selenus his son and Antipater his brothers son to command the left. The main battell in the midst was committed to the leading and governance of three Captains, to wit, Mimo, Zenis, and Philip the Master of the Elephants. There was a certain mist arose in the morning and as it waxed farther day gathered aloft into thick clouds, and made the weather dark: besides, by the South wind it reolved into a small drizzling rain, which wet and drenched all. This did little harm to the Romans, but contrariwise was much hurtful to the Kings side. For, albeit the air was dim and dark, yet by reason that the Roman battallions took up so great compass of ground, they could for all the air was overcast, discern from one end to the other: and the moisture that fell, dilled nothing at all (to speak of) either the swords or javelins of them that were heavily armed: whereas the Kings army being embattalled so broad, had much ado, and hardly could see from the middle of the main battell to the wings of each hand, and much less discern from one side and flank of the battallion to the other. Moreover, the dropping weather sogged their bows, soiled their slings and tops of their darts. Their sixed chariots also, wherewith Antiochus made full account to break the arches of his enemies, turned to his disorder and flight of themselves. Now these chariots aforesaid were in this manner armed for the most part. Certain sharp pikes they had upon the spire pole, bearing forward from the spring-tree, ten cubits in length, like unto horns, with which pointed pikes they would pierce through whatsoever they encountered. Also at the end of a half said spring-tree there were two blades fixed, one the one of just the same height with it, the other lower and bearing downward to the ground: the former was devised to run through whatsoever came near the side thereof, the other to reach and tear them that were cast to the earth, or came under the chariot. Likewise at both ends of the axle-tree with one the nave of the wheel there were two such like hooks fastned and bended direct wies. These chariots that served the King had placed in the front of the battell as we said before, because they had been set either in the middle or the rearguard, they should have been driven through their own battallions. While Eumenes perceiving one that knew well enough the manner of that kind of service and how dangerous it was, to a valiant man rather frighted the horses than charged them directly by ordinarie warlike force, he commanded the Candior archers and slingers, with some other horsemen that lanced darts, to run forth in a thick troop, but favouring as far as they could, and at one from all parts to discharge their shot upon them. This unforeseen tempest (as it were) so madded the horses partly by galling, wounding, and peling them with darts, arrows, and stones, discharged from all sides at them, and partly with

A with the strange and uncountable noise which they made, that suddenly as if they had been unbridled and without their goads, they flung out every way, and ran at random: which violence of theirs the light armed souldiers, the nimble fingers, and swift running Candriots avoided easily with a trice. And the horsemen withall following the chase, redoubled the flight and hurry amongst the horses; yea, and the dromedary camels too; which likewise were unruly and set a madding: and this hurly burly, the manifold cries from the multitude all about, helped well forward. Thus were the chariots chased in the middle of the plain between both armies: and when their vain huffs were once rid out of the way, then the alarm and signall was given on both parts, and they charged one another in battell wise. But as for this an occurrent as that was, it caused anon a discomfiture and overthrow indeed. For the auxiliaries and aids behind which were B placed next unto them, terrified with the fear and affright of the chariots, fled, and left all naked and disurnished even to the bard horses: in such sort, that when the rereguard was in disaray, The Roman Cavalry entered upon the foresaid horse, and charged them so hotly, that part of them was not able to endure the first shock and encounter: some were put to flight, others were born down with the poise and weight of their harness and weapons. And presently thereupon the whole left wing of the battell began to retreat. And after that those succours were disbanded and in disaray which were between the Cavalry and the heavy armed footmen called Phalangia, the disorder and fear went as far as to the midst of the main battell: where so soon as the ranks and files were broken and shuffled together, by reason of the enter-course of their own fellows among them, they had no use at all of their long pikes, which the C Macedonians call Sarissa. Then the Roman legions advanced their engines, and lanced their darts against those disordered ranks huddled together. The very Elephants that were placed between, nothing troubled and affrighted the Roman souldiers, as who had been used in the African wars, both to avoid the furious rage of those beasts, and also either with their javelins to flank and hurt them overthwart, or else if they could come near unto them, to hew them and cut their hamstring with their swords. By this time now was the front of the main battell de-leated and beaten down, and the rereguard behind environed and cut in peeces: when as the Romans withall, might perceive their own fellows flying from the other part, and hear the cry of those that were affrighted, even almost as far as to their camp. For Antiochus keeping the right wing, seeing in the left point of the Romans no other defence (by reason that they trusted upon the river) but only four troops of horsemen, and those also by drawing themselves close to their fellows, to leave the bank side void and naked, he charged that point with his Auxiliaries and lances upon hard horses, and not only made head and pressed them as front, but from the river also for a compass and enclosed them: and flanked that wing so long, untill the horsemen were first discomfited, and then the footmen next unto them were put to flight, so as they ran again toward their camp. M. Emilius a Colonell, and son to M. Lepidus, who a few years after was created the High Priest, had the charge of the camp: he with his whole guard came forth, and where as he saw them to flee, there he opposed himself, and first commanded them to stand, and afterwards to return to battell, checking and rebuking them for their beastly fear, and shamefull running away. Moreover, he proceeded to monitory words, saying, That in case they would not be ruled by his direction, they D should run headlong like blind beetles upon their own mischief: and in the end, he gave a sign to his own company, for to lay upon the foremost of them that thus fled, and caused the multitude that followed, with dint of sword and drawing blood of them, to turn their face again upon the enemies. Thus the greater fear overcame the less: for seeing danger before and behind, first they staid their flight, and afterwards returned to the battell. Emilius also with his own regiment (which for the guard of the camp had 2000 tall and valiant men in it) withstood the King's right flank, as he followed hot in chase upon those that fled. Moreover, Antiochus (brother of King Seleucus) in the right point of the battell, who at the first charge had discomfited the left wing of the enemies, perceiving that his fellows fled in their left point, and hearing a great stir about the camp, came to the rescue in good time with 200 horsemen.
 E Antiochus when he saw them turn head again whose backs ere while were toward him, and begin to fight afresh, and perceived withall a number coming against him, both out of the camp and also from the battell, turned his horse head and took himself to flight. By this means the Romans obtained the victory of both the wings, and passed directly to the rising of the camp over the dead bodies, which in the main battell most of all were massacred and lay by heaps: where the strength and flower of the hardest men ranged close together and the weight besides of their heavy armour would not give them leave to flee away. The horsemen of Emilius were the first of all others that pursued the enemies: after them, the rest of the Cavalry followed the chase all over the fields, and ever as they overtook any of the hindmost, killed them outright. But that G which troubled and plagued them in their flight more than all besides, was their chariots, elephants and camels, intermingled among them as they fled: forasmuch as being once disbanded and put out of their ranks, they tumbled one upon another like blind men, and were bruised and crushed under the beasts feet which came running upon them. Great execution also there was committed in the camp, yea, and more in manner than had been in the battell: for the first that fled, and those that fought in the vanguard, took their way most of them to the camp, and upon assured confidence of this multitude, the garrison within fought more valiantly, and held out one longer in the defence of the hold. The Romans being that day in the gates and best of all the rampier which they thought verily to have forced and won at their first assault; when they were once at length broken through and got in, made the most bloody slaughter amongst them, for very anger and despite that they had kept them so long. It is said, that there were slain that day about fifty thousand footmen and 4000 horsemen, 2400 taken prisoners, together with fifteen elephants with their governors. A number of the Romans were hurt and wounded, but there died not in the field above 300 footmen, and 24 horsemen; and of the regiment of King Eumenes not past five and twenty. And for that day verily the conquerors after they had ransacked only the tents and pavilions of their enemies, returned to their own camp with great plenty of pillage: but the next morning they fell to spoiling the bodies of the dead and gathered their prisoners together. And upon this victory, there came Embassadors from Thyatira and Magnesia, unto Sypilus, for to surrender and deliver up their Cities.

Antiochus, who fled accompanied with some few, having gathered unto him many more in the way, who rallied themselves unto him, arrived at Sardis about midnight with a small power of armed men; and hearing that his son Selenus and some other of his friends were gone before to Apamea, himself also at the fourth watch departed thence with his wife and daughter toward Apamea; after he had committed the charge of guarding the City Sardis unto Zeno, and appointed Timon governour of Lydia. But the inhabitants of the said City and the garrison soldiers within the Castle, despised their governors, and by generall consent addressed Embassadors unto the Consul.

Much about the same time also, there arrived Embassadors from Tralles, and Magnesia (which standeth upon the river Meander) and likewise from Ephesus, to yield up their Cities. For Polyxenides (advertised of the issue of this battell) had abandoned Ephesus; and having sailed with the fleet as far as Patara in Lycia, for fear of the Rhodian ships which rid in guard within the harbour of Megiste, disembarked and put himself a shore, and with a small company marched by land into Syria. The Cities of Asia were surrendered into the hands and protection of the Consul, and submitted to the people of Rome. By this time now was the Consul possessed of Sardis, and thither repaired unto him Scipio from Elaa, so soon as ever he could endue the travail of journey.

At the same time there came an herald from Antiochus unto the Consul, who by the mediation of Scipio, made request and obtained thus much, That the King might send his Overtors and Embassadors unto him. And after few daies Zenst (who had been governour of Lydia) together with Antiochus his nephew or brother (son) arrived. Who first dealt with King Eumenes and communed with him, whom they by reason of old jars and quarrels they supposed verily to be the greatest enemy unto peace, and that he would never abide to hear thereof: but him they found more reasonable and enclining to peaceable terms, than either the King their Masters or themselves hoped and looked for. So by the means of Scipio and him together, they had access unto the Consul; who at their earnest petition, granted them a day of audience in a frequent assembly, there to declare their Commission and what they had in charge. "Then (quoth Zenst) "we are not so much to speak and deliver ought of our own selves, as to ask and be advised of you " (Romans) what course to take, and by what means of satisfaction we might expiate and satisfy the trespass of the King our Master, and withall obtain grace and pardon at your hands who are the victors? Your manner alwaies hath been of a magnanimous and haughty spirit, to forgive Kings and nations by you vanquished: How much more then is it decent and becoming you to do the like: yea, and with a greater mind and more generous and bountifull heart, in this victory and conquest, which hath made you LL. of the whole world? For now it behooveth you to lay down all debate and quarrel with mortall men here upon earth, and rather like the immortal gods in heaven, to provide for the good and safety of mankind, and them to pardon and forgive. Now was it agreed upon before the coming of the Embassadors, what answer to make unto them, and likewise thought good it was that Africanius should deliver the same, who spake by report in this wise: "We Romans, of all those things which are in the power of the immortal gods, have that measure which they vouchsafed to give us: as for heart and courage which dependeth upon our own will and mind, we have borne (and ever will) the same without change and alteration in all fortunes: neither hath prosperity raised and lift it up aloft, nor adversity debased and put it down. For proof hereof, I might produce your friend Annibal as witness, to say nothing of others, but that I can report me to your own selves. For after we had passed over Hellaspont, even before we saw the Kings camp and army, when the hazard of war was indifferent, when the issue doubtful and uncertain, look what conditions of peace we then offered on even hand, and whiles we were equall one unto the other, and stood upon terms of advantage, the same and no other we present unto you at this time, now that we are conquerors. Forbear to meddle within Europe depart wholly out of Asia, so much as is on this side Taurus. Moreover, in regard of the expences desired in this war, ye shall pay fifteen thousand Talents of silver according to the computation of Eumenes five hundred in hand, two thousand and five hundred at the assurance and making of the peace, by the Senat and people of Rome; and a thousand talents yearly for twelve years next ensuing. Also ye shall make payment unto Eumenes of four hundred talents, and the remnant behind of the corn and grain which was due unto his father. And when we have considered and concluded these covenants, to the end that we may rest assured that ye will perform the same, we demand for a gage and sufficient pawn " that

A "that ye deliver into our hands twenty hostages, such as we shall like well of and chuse. And "for as much as we can never be persuaded that the people of Rome shall enjoy long peace and
 "where Antiochus is, we demand above all things to have him in our custody: Also you shall deliver "into our hands Antiochus the Arabian, the prince of the Arabians, and his brother of that war with the Sto-
 "lians, who caused you to take arms against us, upon Muretus that he gave you of them: And
 "likewise armed them upon the trust they had in you. Item, together with him you shall deliver "Mnasimachus the Acarnanian, together with Philo and Endochus the Chalcidians. The which shall "now contract peace in worse estate than he was, by reason he made this later than he might "have done. But in case he hold off still and delay, know how well thus much, that the royal majesty
 "and port of Kings is with more difficulty moved & taken down from the highest pitch and degree "unto the middle: then from that mean estate, cast down headlong to the lowest. Now these Em-
 "bassadors were sent from the King with this charge, to accept of any articles of peace which he "would. And therefore it was decreed that Embassadors should be directly sent to Rome. The Consul "divided his army into garrisons for to winter, some in Magnesia upon the river Meander, others in "Tralles and Ephesus. After few daies the hostages above said, were brought to Ephesus from the King, "and Embassadors also came who were to go to Rome. Embassadors likewise went to Rome at the same "time that the Kings Embassadors: and there followed embassies moreover of all the States of Asia.

B While the affairs of Asia passed thus in these terms, there were two pro-consuls returned out "of their severall provinces, both in manner at once, upon hope to obtain triumph, to wit, Q. Min-
 "utius out of Liguria, and M. Acilius out of Asia. When the exploits were heard, as well of "the one as the other, Minutius was flatly denied triumph, but Acilius had it granted with great
 "consent of all men: who rode into the City triumphant over his Amischi and the Etolians, in "which triumph there were carried before him 250 ensignes, 3000 pound weight of masse silver in "bullion; of coin in Attick Tetradrachms 113000; in Eikophors 248000. In plate many vessels en"graved and chased, of great weight. He carried also in pomp the implements of the King's house "all of silver, with rich and sumptuous apparell. Also crowns of gold 47 presented unto him by Ci"ties affociat: besides all sorts of rich spoils, and moreover he led divers noblemen prisoners, and list "of all 36 captains, as well Etolians as those who served under the King. As for Demetrius, a great "commander of the Etolians, who some few daies before had broken prison and escaped by night,
 "he was by his keepers that made fresh suit after him, overtaken upon the bank of Tyberis: but be"fore he could be attached by them, he fell upon his own sword, and ran himself through. Only
 "there wanted those that should have followed after his chariot; otherwise the triumph had been "magnificent and flatly, both for the pompous show and also of the honor and renown of exploits "achieved. But the joy of this triumph was blemished with heavy tidings out of Spain, of a loss
 "and overthrow received of the Portugals, in the countrey of Valecia, near the town Lysa, under "the conduct of L. Amylius where 6100 of the Roman army were left dead in the place, and the "rest discomfited and beaten back into the camp; which they had much ado to defend and hold, and "were forced to retire in manner of flight, and by long journeyes recovered the penneable quarters of "their friends. And this was the news out of Spain.

E From out of France the Embassadors of the Placentins and Cremomians, were brought by the "Pretor L. Aurunculeius into the Senat: where they made much moan and complaints for default
 "and want of inhabitants, whereof some were devoured by the edge of the sword in wars, others
 "consumed by in-lady and sickness, yet, and certain of them departed out of their colonies
 "for weariness they had of the Gauls their neer neighbours. Whereupon the Senat ordained C. La-
 "lius the Consul to enroll, if he thought to good, six thousand families, for to be distributed among "those Colonies aforesaid: L. Aurunculeius the Pretor to create three Commissaries called Trium- "virs, for the conducting of the coloners and inhabitants aforesaid. And created there were M.
 "Attilius Servianus, L. Valerius Flaccus the son of Publius, and L. Valerius Tappus the son of "Caius.

F Not long after, against the time of the Consuls election which approached neer, C. La-
 "lius the Consul returned out of France to Rome, and he not only by vertue of the act of the Senat made in "his absence enrolled certain Coloners to supply the want in Placentia and Cremona, but also pro"posed a bill, and according to it the LL. of the Senat ordained, that two new Colonies should be "conducted into the land that appertained to the Boians. And at the very same time were letters "brought from L. Amylius the Pretor, as touching the vessel at sea fought neer to Myonessus:
 "which letters also gave intelligence, that L. Scipio the Consul had transported his army into Asia.
 "For joy of the said naval victory, there was ordained a solemn procession for one day, and in "regard that the Roman army was then first on foot in Asia, the said procession continued ano"ther day with supplication to the gods, that this voyage might turn to the prosperity and joy of "the Commonwealth. And the Consul was enjoined at each procession and supplication, to sa"crifice twenty head of greater beasts. After this ensued the solemn assembly for the chusing of "Consuls, which was holden with great strife and contention. For M. Amylius Lepidus stood "to be Consul, a man grown into an ill name, and hardly spoken of among the people, in that he had "left his government and charge in Sicily for this occasion and business only, without making suit
 "unto the Senat and craving leave so to do. Together with him were competitors in election, M.
 "Fulvius Nobilior, Cn. Manlius Pulch, and M. Valerius Messius. But Fulvius was chosen alone, "because the said rest not sufficient voices of the Centuries, and he the morrow after nominated Cn.
 "Manlius

M. Aemilius for his colleague, and gave the republic unto Lepidus; for M. Aemilius kept silence and held his tongue. Which done, the Pretors were elected; namely, the two Quintus Fabius the one surnamed Labeo, the other Pictor (who had been consecrated that year for the Flamin Quirinal) M. Sempronius Tuditanus, Sp. Postumius Albinus, Lucius Plautius Hypsilus, and L. Egnatius Dives.

During the time that M. Fulvius Nobilior and Cn. Manlius Volto were Consuls, Valerius Antias writeth that there was a strife tumult raised at Rome, and held for certain, that L. Scipio the Consul, together with P. Africanus, were called forth to a parley with King Antiochus as touching the enlargement and delivery of young Scipio the son of Africanus, and by that means were both of them arrested and taken prisoners: also that when these chief commanders were under arrest, the Kings army incontinently advanced against the Roman camp, the same was surprised and forced and the whole power of the Romans utterly defeated. By occasion whereof, it went current also, that the Etolians began to look aloft, refused to obey, and shook off their allegiance; also that their Princes and chief States were gone into Macedony, Dardany and Thrace, to levy and wage auxiliary forces: moreover, that A. Terentius Varro, and Marcus Claudius Lepidus were sent unto out of Etolia, from A. Cornelius the Propretor, for to report these news at Rome. Last of all, to make up the tale, he addeth and saith, that the Etolian Embassadors among other things, being examined in the Senat about this matter, and demanded of whom they heard and understood that the Roman Generals were taken prisoners in Asia by King Antiochus, and the whole army overthrown? answered directly, that they had advertisement thereof by their own Embassadors, who had been with the Consul. But because I find no other author besides him that maketh mention of this rumor, I dare not for any thing that I can say of my self, report it for a certain truth, nor yet omit it as a meer fable or loud lie.

The Etolian Embassadors were permitted to come into the Senat house; and being induced (in regard of their own cause and present condition) to confesse a truth, and as humble suppliants to crave pardon and forgiveness either for their fault, or misprision and error, began with a bedroll of their favours and good turns done unto the people of Rome, yea and in manner to upbraid the Romans with the valour which they shewed in the war against Philip. But with their arrogant and insolent language they offended the ears of the Senators: and by ripping up old matters done and past (time out of mind and utterly forgotten) they brought in their own cause so, and brought it to this passe, that the LL. of the Senat began to call to mind much more harm and mischief contrived and practised by that nation, then kindnesses and courtesies received at their hands: insomuch as the Etolians having need of their mercy, incurred their heavy displeasure, and provoked them to anger and hatred. Being asked this question by one of the Senators Whether they would refer and submit themselves to the censure and judgment of the people of Rome? and likewise of another, If they could be content to hold them for their friends or enemies whom the Romans so accounted; they answered not a word: and thereupon immediately were commanded out of the Court: and presently all the Senat began to cry out with one voice, that the Etolians were all still for King Antiochus, depending wholly and only upon that hope, and therefore they ought to war against them as undoubted enemies, and to take down and tame the so proud and felonious hearts of their own. Over and besides all this, another thing there was that incited and kindled the stomacks of the LL. against them, because at the very same instant when they seemed to require peace at the Romans hands, they warred against Dolopia and Asbamania. So there passed a decree of the Senat, (and the same was moved by M. Aemilius, who had vanquished and subdued Antiochus and the Etolians) That they shall void that very day out of the City of Rome; and within fifteen daies next ensuing, out of all Italy. Au. Terentius Varro was sent to accompany them on the way: and this warning they took with them, that if ever after there came any Embassadors from the Etolians, without the warrant, licence, and permission of the chief General who governed the province, or not accompanied with a Roman Legat, they should be reputed all of them for no better then enemies. In this manner were the Etolians dismissed & sent away.

After this the Consuls proposed unto the Senat, as touching the government of the provinces. And thought good it was, that they themselves should cast lots for Etolia & Asia. Unto him whole lot it should be to govern Asia, was appointed that army which L. Scipio had. And for to furnish it fully, and make up the decayed bands, he was allowed to have four thousand foot men of Romans with two hundred horsemen of allies that were Latins, eight thousand foot and four thousand men of arms, and with these forces he was to make war against Antiochus. The other Consul had assigned unto him that army which was Etolia: and liberty he had for supply of that broken army to levy the same number of Citizens and allies that his companion in government had enrolled. To the same Consul was granted a commission likewise to set in order, furnish, and take with him those ships which the former year were prepared and rigged, and not only to make war with the Etolians, but also to sail over into the Isle Cephalenia. And withall, the said Consul had in charge to return home to Rome for the election of Magistrats, if he might so do conveniently with the good of the Common-weal. For besides the annual Magistrats (who were to be chosen one under another) it was agreed upon, that Censors also should be created. But in case his affairs detained him, that he might not return in person, then he was to give advertisement, and signifie so much to the Senat, that he could not possibly be present at the time of the aforesaid Election. So Etolia fell by lot to M. Fulvius and Asia to Cn. Manlius. Then the Pretors fell to draw lots for their provinces. Sp. Postumius Albinus had the jurisdiction over Citizens

A citizens and foreiners both: M. Sempronius Tuditanus governed Sicily: and Q. Fabius Pictor the Quirinall Flamin. Sardinia: Q. Fabius Labeo was admiral of the navy at sea: and L. Plantius Hypseus was allotted to the rule of high Spain, and L. Babius Dives of the lower. For Sicily one legion was appointed, together with that fleet which was already in that province. Also there was order given that the new Pretor should impose two tenths of corn upon the Sicilians, and send the one into Afra, and the other into Estolia. The like imposition was laid and exacted upon the Sardinians, and the said corn to be conveyed into the same armies that the Sicilian corn was. A supply was granted unto L. Babius for Spain of a thousand Rom. footmen and fifty horse besides: besides six thousand Latin foot, and two hundred horimen. Unto Plantius Hypseus for the higher Spain were allowed a thousand Roman footmen: with two thousand Latine allies, and two hundred horse. Besides these supplements, both the provinces of Spain were allowed each of them one legion. The Magistrate and governours of the former year continued still in place of command for one other year, to wit, C. Lalius with his army, and P. Inuius also the Propretor in Hetruria with those forces which were in the province M. Tuccius likewise in the Brutians country and Apulia.

But before the Pretors went into their provinces, there hapned a variance between P. Licinius, the Arch-Pontific or chief Prelat, and Q. Fabius Pictor the Quirinall Flamin, like unto that which sometime fell out between L. Metellus and Posthumius Albinus. For at what time as Posthumius the Consul was upon his departure and journey to his fleet in Sicily, together with C. Lullianus his colleague, Metellus the Archbishop for the time being, kept him back upon occasion of certain sacrifices to be celebrated: temblably, when as Fabius the Pretor would have gone into Sardinia, P. Licinius the high Priest, detained him. Much strife and hard hold there was hereabout, as well in the Senat house, as before the people. Inhibitions passed to and fro. Cautions and pledges were distrained: fines they imposed one upon anothers head: the Tribunes were called unto on both sides for to interpose their authority, and they appealed both unto the people. In fine, religion, and the regard of holy rites took place, and carried it clear, and the Flamin was enjoined to obey the chief priest: and by order and expresse commandment from the people, all fines were taken off and forgiven. And when the Pretor for very anger and spire that he was debarred from his province, would have surrendered and resigned up his government, the LL. of the Senat impeached and certified him by their absolute authority, and ordeined that he should minister justice, and exercise civill jurisdiction between aliens.

After that the musters were ended within few dayes (for many fouldiers were not to be levied and enrolled) both Consuls and Pretors took their journey into the provinces. After this, there stode a bruit concerning the occurrents and affairs in Afra, blown and spread abroad I wot not how, nor from what author it proceeded: but after few daies there came certain messengers with letters from the Generall of the Roman army, sent of purpose to the City, which caused not so great joy presently ensuing upon the rest fear aforesaid (for why, they were no more afraid of Estolia by them already conquered) as dashed quite the same and opinion that went on Antiochus, whom in the beginning of this war they supposed would have been a dangerous enemy unto them, as well in regard of his own puissance, as for that he had the direction and conduct of Annibal in the war: howbeit, they thought good to take nothing, either as touching the lending of the Consul into Afra, or diminishing his forces, for fear they should have war with the French.

Not long after M. Anulius Cotta, a lieutenant of Scipio, came to Rome with the Embassadors of King Antiochus, and likewise King Eumenes and the Rhodians. Cotta reported and declared first to the Senat, and afterwards in a full assembly of the people (by order and commandment from the LL. of the Councell) what affairs had passed in Spain. Whereupon ordeined it was, that there should be holden a solemn procession for 3. daies together: and order was given, that 40 head of greater cattle should be killed for sacrifice. This done, the Senat assembled for to give audience to King Babianus first above all other matter: who briefly in few words having rendered thanks to the LL. of the Senat, for that they had delivered him and his brother from siege, and protected his realm against the wrongs and outrages offered by Antiochus: also having testified his joy by way of gratulation for their prosperous and fortunate affairs atchieved both by land and sea: namely, in that they had discomfited and put to flight K. Antiochus, & driven him out of his camp, that he could not keep the field, and withall discomfited and dispossessed him first of Europe and afterwards of all this part of Afra which lieth on this side the mountain Taurus: he concluded and shut up all with this, That as touching his own demerits and employments about their affairs, he had rather than took knowledge by their own generals, captains and lieutenants, than from his mouth: they all approved well of this speech of his, and willed him to speak boldly without bashfull modestie in that case. What he thought in equity and reason the Senat and people of Rome was to yield him by way of justly recompense: assuring him that the Senat would do it more willingly and liberally (if possibly they could) according to the worth of his desert. The King answered this again, that in case any other had made him that offer, and given him the choice of his own rewards, he would gladly have used the counsell of that honorable court of the Roman Senat (if he might have the means and liberty to aske their advice) to this end that he would not be thought, either to exceed measure in covetous desire, or passe the bounds of modesty in craving a recompense. But now considering they are themselves to give that reward, much more reason it is, that their magnificence and bounty to him & his brethren should be re-

"lefted to their own discretion and dilation. The Senate the Senate nothing moved at this language of his, but urged him still to speak himself in his own cause. And after a certain time that they had strived a-while, the LL. in courteous and kindmood, the King in modesty and sweetness, yielding one unto the other reciprocally, in such amiable and mutual manner as hardly can be expressed, Ennius, departed out of the temple. The Senate persisted nevertheless in their resolution saying, it was very absurd and indecent that the King should be ignorant upon what hopes he was come, and what he purposed to make suit and petition for: and himself must needs of all others know best what was meetest and most expedient for his own Kingdom: yea, and was far better acquainted with the estate and affairs of Asia than the Senate was. And therefore no remedy, but he must be called again, and compelled to declare and deliver what his will, desire and mind was to have. Hereupon the King was brought back into the temple by the Pretor, and urged to speak. I Then at last, my LL. (quod he) I would have persisted still in silence, but that I knew that soon ye will call the embassage of the Rhodians in place, and that after audience given unto them, I must neither will nor chuse but make some speech of necessity: and verily with so much more difficulty shall I speak, because their demands will be such, as if they would seem not only to require nothing prejudiciall and hurtfull unto me, but also (which more is) matters like or nothing pertinent to themselves. For plead they will and strive in the cause of the Cities in Greece, saying, they ought to be set free and at liberty: which being once obtained, who can make doubt but rather they will withdraw from our obedience, not only the Cities which shall be freed, but also those which have been homagers and tributaries unto us of old time? yea, and will keep them as subjects in very deed and wholly at their devotion, whom being thus bound and obliged to them by so great a benefit, they call by the name of Associates, and would make the world believe they repute them for no other? Yet forsooth (I was well) in affecting and aspiring to this so great power & puissance, they will carry it so cleanly & make semblant, as though this in no wise touched and concerned them: but it is befitting you alone, correspondent & answerable to other former deeds of yours. But be ye well advised, and let not their glowing words deceive you; take you heed, I say, that ye go not with an uneven hand nor bear your selves equally, whilst you depreesse and abate too much some of your allies, in promoting and advancing others beyond all measure: and above all, beware that they who have lift up their spear and borne arms against you, be not more kindly interested & in better condition, then your loving friends and faithful confederats. For mine own part, in all other things I would gladly be thought of every man rather to keep within my compass; yea, and yeeld somewhat of my right whatsoever it is, then to strive too much in the maintenance and holding thereof. But in the question of your friendship, my affection towards you, and to the honour which shall come from you, I cannot endure with patience that any one should out-go and surmount my self. This I account the greatest inheritance left unto me by my father the first, (of all those that inhabit in Greece and Asia) who was entertained in your amity and continued in the same alwayes most fast, most constant and sure ever to his dying day: who not only shewed sound affection and loyal heart unto you, but also was in person employed in all your wars which ye made in Greece, at well at land as at sea; assisted and aided you with all kind of provisions, in such sort, as none of all your allies besides was any way comparable to come near to him. And finally, as he earnestly exhorted the Scythians to accept of your society, he sunk down, swooned in the very assembly & not long after yeilded up his spirit and dyed. His footsteps have I troden, and followed his good example. For affection verily and studious desire to honour you, I could not have more then he had (for I suppose it was impossible to surpass him therein:) but in kind pleasures, effectual services, offices, courtesies, and favours, to surmount and go beyond him; the goodness of fortune, the occasion of times, King Antiochus and the war of Asia, have ministered ample and sufficient matter unto me. Antiochus King of Asia and part of Europe gave me his daughter in marriage, and with her endowed me with the repossesion of those Cities which had revolted from us. He fed me more over with great hopes of encreasing my dominion in time to come, if I would have sided with him against you. I will glory and vaunt of this, that I have done nothing to offend and displease you: I will rather recheate those pleasures and services which are becoming: the ancient amity and friendship between our house and you. In sores as well for land as sea, I have friended and helped your Generals in such wise, as I forbid all your allies besides to do the like: furnished them I have with victuals on the land, with provisions at sea: in all the battles and conflicts by ships (which were many and in sundry places) I was present in person, I underwent all travells I adventured all perills, and no where favoured my self and thought much of my pains: nay, that which is the greatest calamity and misery that followeth wars, I was besieged, and endured it: enclosed I was and shut up within Permyne, to the utter hazard of my life and of my state and royall dignity. And after I was delivered from that danger and danger, albeit I was on one side and Delium on another, my encampment was the principal overthrow of my Kingdom. I quit mine own affairs and laid all aside, to come with my whole fleet into Hellaspont, to here to meet with L. Scipio your Consul, and to aid him in transporting and waiting his army into Asia. And when your forces were passed over, I never afterwards departed from him: there was not a Roman soldier more resolute or more busy in your camp then my self and my brethren. No expeditions, no rodes, no exploits of horse service was there without me: I bated never I stood not foot & guarded that quarter where the Consul was appointed me to keep. I will not say, my LL. what

- A "one person there is that hath done so good service for you in the last war as I my self, and who "is any way comparable unto me: nay, I dare make comparison with all states and Princes what"soever, whom you esteem and honour so highly? Antiochus before he was your friend, was "your professed enemy: he came not to you with his hands in the time of his upright fortune, and "whiles his Kingdome flourished in good estate; but when he was banished, driven out of his "Kingdom, and turned out of all, he fled into your camp, accompanied only with a small troop
"and cornet of horsemen: Yet nevertheless, because he stood fast to you and bare himself in all "loyalty, and shewed his prowess in your behalf against Syphax, and the Carthaginians in Africa,
"you not only restored him to his fathers Kingdome, and placed him again in the royall throne;
"but you laid unto his dominion the richest part of the realm of Syphax, made him the most puis-B "sant and greatest Prince of all the Kings in Africa: What reward then, nay, what honour are we "worthy to have at your hands; we (I say) who never were enemies, but ever friends? My fa"ther, my self, my brethren, have borne arms in your quarrell by land, by sea; not only in Asia but "far from our own home and native soil, in Peloponnesus, in Beotia, in Ætolia, during the war with "Philip, with Antiochus, with the Ætolians. What recompence demand you then? may some "man say: Forasmuch as (my LL.) you will have it so, and it is your pleasure that I should speak
"my mind; good reason it is that I obey. This shall stand for all; if you have dispossessed Antiochus
"of all on this side Taurus, with this intent, to hold those lands your own selves; none better then
"you, and whom I would rather wish to be my neighbours and to confine upon me: neither can
"I bethinke me, of any means in the world more important to the safety and strength of my King-
"dome. But in case your purpose be to depart and retire your forces from thence, I dare behold C "to say, that of your allies, (and put them all together) there is not one more worthy then my self
"to have and hold that which you have won by conquest. But an honourable deed it is and mag"nificent, to set free and deliver Cities out of thraldome and servitude. True and I my self am of "the same opinion; provided alwaies, that they had attempted nought by way of hostilitie against "you. But in case they had taken part and sided with Antiochus, how much more fit needeth it with "wisdom, nay, with equity and reason, to be respective of your allies who have so well deserved "at your hands, then to regard your enemies. This Oration of the King much pleased the LL. of "the Senat, and soon it was seen by their countenance that they would deal bounteouslie and libe"rally with him: yea, and gratifie him in what they might. Then audience was given to a brief "embassage of the Smynæans, who by occasion that some of the Rhodians were absent, came be-D "tween and delivered their message. Highly were these Smynæans commended, in that they chose "rather to endure all extremities, then to yeild themselves unto King Antiochus. Then the Rhodians
"entred in place: and the chief man of their embassage, after he had declared the first occasion and
"beginning of the amity which they had with the people of Rome, and shewed withall the good "deeds and services which the Rhodians had performed in the wars first against Philip, and then a"gainst Antiochus, went on and spake as followeth. "Right honourable, there is nothing more "difficult and troublesome unto us in all the businesse that we have in hand then this one thing, "that there is some variance and matter to be debated between us and Eumenes, the only K. of all "others, with whom especially every one of us in privat, and (that which toucheth us more) our E "City in publick, doth entertain the bond of friendship and mutuall hospitality. Howbeit no re-
"pugnancy is in our affections (my LL.) but even the course of this world and nature it self (the "mightiest thing of all) which disjoyneth us and causeth difference: this maketh us (being men
"free born) to defend and maintain the freedom also of others: this is it, that moveth KK. to be
"desirous to have all in servitude and subjection under them, and at their command. But how loc-
"ver it is, our modesty and the reverent regard we have of the King person hurteth us more, then
"either the debating of our cause with him is otherwise difficult unto us, or the deciding thereof
"like to be intricate and troublesome unto you. For in case it were so, that you could not honour "and reward a King, your ally and friend for his good service done in this war (for recompence "whereof you sit in consultation) by no other means, unlesse you deliver free Cities into his F "hands, to serve in bondage; then were it hard for you to resolve; for fear lest either ye should "send away a prince (your friend and confederat) without guerdon and honour; or seem to change
"that laudable enterprise of yours which you have begun, to stain and blemish your glory now
"(which you have acquired by the war against Philip) with reducing so many Cities and states "into servitude. But your happy fortune easeth you right well of this difficulty and necessity,
"that you need not fear either to impair your credit and favour with your friends, or to endamage
"your reputation and honour among men. For (the gods be thanked therefore) you have achiev"ed a victory, no lesse rich then glorious, and sufficient (if I may so say) to discharge all your "debts, and set you clear with all the world. For Lycænia, Phrygia both the great and the lesse, "whole Pisidia, Cilicia, and in brief all the confines of Europe are under your dominion. Of G "all which provinces, if you lay but one by (which you will your selves for K. Eumenes, you shal
"mightily enlarge and amplifie his Kingdome: but, give him all, you will make him equall to the "greatest princes and monarchs that are. You see then by this, that you may recompence and en"rich your allies out of the conquest gotten by war; and nevertheless hold out your good custom
"that you have begun, remembering alwaies what side you pretended first in your war with Philip,
"and now lately with Antiochus: considering withal, what you did then after Philip was vanquish'd, &
"what is required and expected at your hands, now: not so much because you have used it alrea-

The oration of the Rhodian Embassadors;

as for that it was meet and decent you should so do. Many causes there be (with their colour-ably just and lawfull) to enter into arms: one pretended this, another that, some in right of lands and territories, other of villages; some lay claim to towns and Cities, others challenge the possession of ports and havens, and one tract or other of the sea-coasts. As for you, before you enjoyed these things, you desired them not: since then ye have now compassed the whole earth, and are LL. of the world, you cannot possibly covet the same any more. Warded you have and fought for honour and glory, in the sight of all the nations of the earth, who now this long time behold and regard your name and empire, no less then they do the gods immortal. And I wot not well, whether those things which we hardly come by, be not with more difficulty holden & kept afterwards, then they were purchased. You undertook to deliver & rid out of the servitude and oppression of Kings, and to maintain in liberty, a most ancient and noble State, renowned for their worthy and famous acts, and right commendable for their singular learning and knowledge in all sciences. For your honour it is, having once received all this nation in your safeguard and protection, to defend and preserve the same for ever. And think not, that those Cities only are more Greek which are built and seated upon the ancient soil of Greece, then their colonies which have been drawn from them, & in times past went from thence into Asia: for the change of air and place hath wrought no alteration, either in the nature and complexion, or the manners and fashions of the people. As for us, endeavoured we have do better and better, and each City hath entered into in honest contention and religious emulation to out-go and surmount their forefathers and first-founders in all good arts and commendable virtues. There be many of you who have been in Greece, many have visited the Cities of Asia, and setting aside this only, That K we are farther distant and remote from you, there is no difference and ods between us and them. The Massilians, whom (if possible it had been, that an imbred temperature might be altered and overcome with the strength and nature, as it were in the soil) so many wild, barbarous, and untamed nations, environing them round about, would have made cruell and savage long before this day; we hear say and understand to be in that request and estimation (by good right, and their desert) among you, as if they dwelt in the very midst and heart of Greece, for not only they retain still the very naturall language of their own, they keep them to their old fashion of apparell and attire, and carry the same port in their gesture and countenance, but also above all things they have kept and observed their customs, their manners, their laws and natural disposition pure and entire, notwithstanding the frequent commerce with those, in the midst L of whom they converse and inhabit. Well, the mountain Taurus at this day is the limit of your empire and signory one way: and therefore whatsoever lieth between you and that bound, you must not think it remote, but look how far your arms have reached, so far let your laws and jurisdiction extend. Let Barbarians, who know no other laws then lords bests, have their Kings, since they take such pleasure in them, and much good may they do their hearts: as for the Greeks, they must do as they may, and are not (we confesse) in so good case as you, howbeit they carry with them as brave a mind as your selves: and the day hath been, when they were Monarchs, when they conquered by their own sword a mighty dominion, and held the same when they had it. Now they are content with that empire where it now is, nay, they wish it may remain and continue there for evermore, where it is setled at this present. They shall be M well apaid, and think they are well, to maintain their liberty by your force of arms, since they have no means of their own to defend the same. But (will some man say) there be certain Cities that held a side and banded with Antiochus answer again, so were some before that took part with Philip, so there were that combined with Pyrrhus, as for example, the Tarentines: and to say nothing of other States, which I could name and rehearse, even Carthage it self enjoyeth freedom and is governed by her own laws. Consider then my LL. what a precedent therein ye have set down to your own selves, and how ye ought to confirm and uphold so good an example. You must resolve to deny that unto the covetous desire of Enneus, which you would not grant to your own ire against the Carthaginians, which they had most justly deserved. And N as for us Rhodians, with what valour and loyalty we have served and aided you, as well in this war, as in all others which ye have had in these parts and quarters, we report us to our own selves, and leave it to your judgment. And now in time of peace, we here present unto you that counsell, which if you will accept and approve, all the world will believe and say, That you have born your selves more honorably in the usage, then in the achievement of your victory.
 This Oration seemed to fit well the greatness and majesty of the Romans. When the Rhodians had done, the Embassadors of Antiochus were called in. Who after the usual and staid manner of those that crave pardon, confessed the King was in fault, and humbly besought the LL. of the Senat to have more regard of their own accustomed gracious clemency, then remember the Kings trespass, who had paid sufficiently for it already, and finally that they would ratifie and con- O firm by their authority, the peace granted by L. Scipio the Lord Generall, according to those conditions, which by him were capitulated and set down. So both the Senat thought good to admit of that peace, and also within few daies after the people gave their assent and established the same. And this accord was solemnly confirmed in the Capitol, with the Kings Procrator or agent, to wit, Antipater, the chief of the embassage, who also was Antiochus his brothers son. This done, the other embassadors of Asia had audience, and were all dispatched with this one answer, that the Senat would send ten deputies or commissioners, according to the ancient

A cient custom of their ancestors, to hear, decide, and compose all their affairs of Asia. But the final conclusion of all should be this, That whatsoever pertained to the dominion of Antiochus on this side the mountain Taurus, should be assigned to King Eumenes, excepting the countries of Lycia and Caria, so far as the river Maander, all which must lie to the signory of the Rhodians. As touching the other Cities of Asia, which had been tributaries to Antiochus, those also were to pay tribute to Eumenes; but such as were sometimes hostages to Antiochus, those should be enfranchised and remain free. The ten commissioners whom they appointed were these, to wit, Q. Minutius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Minutius Thermus, App. Claudius Nero, Cn. Cornelius Merula, M. Iunius Bruns, L. Atrunculeius, L. Emilius Paulus, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Aelius Tubero. These men had plenary power and full commission to take order and determine as they thought good, in all the occurrences that were presented in these affairs. But they had direction from the Senat, as touching the principal points: Imprimis, That all Lycania and Phrygia, both the more and the less, that Myssa, with the Kings chaies and forrests, that the Cities of Lydia and Ionis, except those that were free at the day of the battell fought with Antiochus, and expressly by name Magnesia near Sipylus, together with Caria, which is called Hydris, and all the territories of Hydris lying toward Phrygia; moreover Telmessus and the forts of the Telmessians, reserving only that territory which belonged to Ptolomeus the Telmessian; that all these countries, I say, and Cities above written, should be given and granted to King Eumenes. Item, That the Rhodian should be enfeoffed in Lycia, without the foresaid Telmessus, the forts and territory, appertaining sometime to Ptolomeus Telmessius: which parcels, I say, were reserved as well from Eumenes, as the Rhodians. Item, to the Rhodians was granted that part of Caria, which lieth beyond the river Maander, near to the isle Rhodes, together with the towns, villages, fortresses, and lands bounding upon Pisidia: except those towns which were free the day before the battell with King Antiochus in Asia. The Rhodians, when they had given thanks to the Senat for their graunties, were in hand with them for the City Soli in Cilicia: they alledged, that they likewise as well as themselves, were descended from Argos: by occasion of which confraternity and near alliance, they loved together as brethren by nature: in regard whereof, they made petition that over and besides other donations, they would do them this extraordinary favour, as to exempt that City also from the servitude and subjection of K. Antiochus. Then were the Embassadors of King Antiochus called for, and treated withall about this matter, but to no effect. For Antiochus ter Hood stoutly upon this point, pleaded hard, that the accord was past already, and might not be revoked or altered: and that against the tenour of the articles and covenants therein comprised, it was not the City Soli, but also Cilicia that the Rhodians demanded; and never would they rest till they were gotten over the mountain Taurus. Then were the Rhodians called back again into the Senat, unto whom the L.L. of the Senat, after they had made relation how earnest the Kings Embassador was with them upon the point, added thus much moreover and said, That if the Rhodians deemed in very deed that the matter concerned the honour of their City and State, the Senat would work all possible means to cause the Kings Embassadors to relent, how stiff and obstinate soever they stood. For this courtesie, the Rhodians thanked them much more heartily then for all theret before, and said withall, that they would yeeld and give place to the arrogant spirit of Antiochus, rather then seem to give any cause or occasion of troubling the peace. And so as touching the City Soli, there was no alteration made.

Whiles these matters were thus debated and passed, the Embassadors of the Massilians brought intelligence, that L. Baebius the Pretor, being in his journey towards his province of Spain, was entrapped and enclosed by the Ligurians, and many of his train killed outright in the place, that himself mortally wounded fled without his hectors and sergeants into Massilia, and within three dayes left this life. The Senat upon the advertisement ordered P. Iunius Bruns the Pro-pretor in Hetruria to go in person into the farther Spain, and govern the same as his own province: but first to leave Hetruria and the army there to one of the Lieutenants whom he pleased to make choise of. This decree of the Senat, together with letters from Spurius Posthumus the Pretor of the City, was sent into Hetruria: and so P. Iunius departed as Pro-pretor into Spain. In which province L. Emilius Paulus (who afterwards won a right glorious victory of King Perseus) having the former year fought unfortunately, now a little before the arrival of his successor, gave battell to the Lusitanians with an army raised and assembled in hast, in which the enemies were put to the worle and driven to flie. One thousand eight hundred of them well armed were left dead in the field, 3200 taken prisoners, and their camp forced and ransacked. The bruit that went of this victory let all matters in Spain in greater quietness.

The same year upon the third day before the Calends of January, L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Atilius Serranus, and L. Valerius Tappo, the three Triumvirs, by order from the Senat, planted a Latine Colony at Bolonia; and three thousand people were further sent to dwell. Every gentleman by calling that served on horseback had 70 acres of ground set out unto him, and the rest of the coloners fifty peece. The land divided thus among them had been conquered from the Boians in Gaul: and those Gauls first had dispossessed the Tuscans of the same.

This year there were many men of mark and name that sued to be Censors: and this competition as it had not been of sufficient importance it self to move matter of debate, was the occasion of a contention and variance much greater. The competitors were these, T. Quintus Flaminius, P. Cornel. Scipio, the son of Cnecus: L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Porcius Cato, M. Claudius Marcellus,

ber.

Marcellus, and M. Atilius Glabrio, even he who had vanquished Antiochus and the Ætolians at Hermopyla. To this man last rebered the peoples favour and affection, most inclined by reason of many congiaries and largesses which he had given amongst them in publick, by means whereof many a man was obliged and bound unto him. The rest, being so many and nobly descended withall, took it to the heart, and could not endure that such a person as he newly risen and come up, and a gentleman of the first head, should be preferred before them, whereupon P. Sempronius Gracchus, and C. Sempronius Rutilius, two Tribunes of the commonalty, commended action against him to answer at a day, laying to his charge that there remained a surplussage of the Kings money and other pillage gotten in the camp of Antiochus, over and above all that he either carried and shewed in triumph, or brought in accompt into the City chamber. Many and sundry depofitions there were to prove this inditement, as well of lieutenants as of colonels. But M. Cato above all other witnesses was most noted: whose great authority acquired in the whole course of his life (which he had passed hitherto in all upright conversation and constant gravity) was much impaired and discredited now, with his white rober that he bare on his back. He being produced as a witness, depofed and gave evidence, that he had seen certain plate as well gold as silver, among the rest of the pillage found in the Kings camp, which he never could let eye on in all the triumph above said. In the end, Glabrio, because he would bring some displeasure particularly, and most of all upon Cato, said, he would give over his suit for the Censorship, since that there was another competitor as newly come up as himself, (whereat the Nobles indeed took indignation inwardly, although they said nothing) who pursued the cause so against him, even with incredible and inestimable perjury. Well, a fine was set upon his head of a thousand asses. And twice was the matter traversed, whether the mulct should be taken off or paid. But when the third day was come, and the party in trouble (Atilius) had quite surrendred to sue for the dignity, the people would not give their voyces as touching the payment of the fine aforesaid, and the Tribunes also themselves let fall their action. So T. Quintius Flaminius, and M. Claudius Marcellus were created Censors.

About the same time the Senat sat within the City in the temple of Apollo, in regard of L. Æmilius Regillus, who had vanquished the Admiral of King Antiochus in battell at sea; where he had audience given, and when he had declared what exploits he had done, namely, against how puissant Armados of the enemies he had fought, and how many ships of theirs he had either sunk or taken. The LL. of the Councell with one generall consent and accord, granted unto him a naval triumph. And he triumphed upon the Calends of February. In which triumph there were borne in shew fifty crowns save one, of beaten gold, but nothing that store of coin as such a royal triumph required, only there were carried in pomp 24700 Attick tetradrachms, 112300 cistophori. After this (by decree of the Senat) there were processions celebrated in consideration that L. Æmilius Paulus had brought his affairs in Spain to an happy issue.

Not long after L. Scipio came also into the City, who because he would not be inferior to his brother in the honourable addition of his name, caused himself to be surnamed Asiaticus. He discoursed before the Senat, and in the publick audience of the people, as touching his worthy acts. Divers there were who construed the thing thus and said, That the war was greater in name then difficult unto him in the manning; for with fighting one only memorable battell the matter was achieved and ended, but the glory indeed of that victory was begun unto him and prepared for his hand at Hermopyla. But if a man should judge hereof aright, and according to truth, the battell of Hermopyla may rather be accompted an exploit against the Ætolians then King Antiochus. For what great forces I pray you had Antiochus there in the field of his own? But in the last battell smitten in Asia, the whole power and puissance that he had in all Asia, stood there to be seen, yea, and all the aids and succours which he could levy out of the nations as far as to the utmost parts of the East. Great cause therefore they had both to render much praise and thanksgiving to the immortal gods, in as ample manner as possibly they could devise (for vouchsafing unto them so brave a victory as it was, and the same with such ease and expedition) and also to grant a triumph to the General. He triumphed upon the last of February, even in the very day that maketh the leap year. This triumph of his was much greater then that other of his brothers in regard of the magnificent pomp and shew represented to the eye: but if one call to mind the substance of the things themselves, and compare the dangers, the conflicts and difficulties of the one war with the other: there is no more equality between them, then if a man should in comparison of captain with captain, set Antiochus to match with Annibal. He shewed in triumph two hundred thirty four field ensignes and standards: he carried before him the portraicts of two hundred thirty four towns and Cities: a hundred thirty four teeth of ivory: two hundred thirty four crowns of gold: 237300 pounds weight of silver: 234000 Attick tetradrachms: 337070 cistophori: 110000 Philip-pieces of gold: of silver plate, and that was all graven and chased, a thousand four hundred twenty four pound weight: of golden plate as much as weighed 1204 pound. Moreover there were led before his chariot 32 great commanders; either governors of provinces under the King, or attendant in his court. Every souldier serving on foot, had given unto him 25 deniers: every centurion had double so much, and the gentlemen or knights triple. After the triumph done, the souldiers had their pay double in money, yea, and the portion of corn likewise was doubled. He had moreover given them already a double proportion in Asia, presently upon the end of the battell. A year it was almost after his Consulship expired ere he triumphed.

- A And much about one and the same time, both Cn. Manlius and the Consul entered into Asia and Q. Fabius Labio the Pretor repaired to the fleet. Moreover the Consul had work enough and wanted not matter of war within France. The seas were quiet after that Antiochus was defeated and subdued: Fabius therefore studied which way to take, and how to employ himself and his forces at sea, because he would not be thought and reputed idle in his province: so he resolved at length to put over with his fleet into Cyete. Now they of Cydon warred at that time against the Gortynians and the Gnosians: and the voice went that there was a great number of Romans and Italians, captives, living in slavery and bondage in every quarter of that Iland. He loosed therefore from Ephesus and set sail for Candy, and so soon as he was arrived and let aland, he sent his messengers about to the Cities, willing them to abandon their armor and increase from war, and to search and seek up throughout all the Cities and territories those captives and prisoners aforesaid, to bring them to him: and moreover, to send their Embassadors or agents, with whom he would treat concerning the affairs that in common touched as well the Candians as the Romans. The Ilanders made small regard of these messages: and unless it were the Gortynians, there was not one that delivered the captives. Valerius Antias hath recorded, That out of the whole Iland there were rendered to the number of four thousand: because the inhabitants were frighted with threats of war. And that this was the cause why Fabius, although he performed no other exploit, obtained of the Senat a navall triumph. From Cyete, Fabius returned to Ephesus: from whence he set forth three ships to the coast of Thracia, and commanded that the garrisons of Antiochus should quit Rhodi and Marona, to the end, that those Cities likewise might be let free and enfranchised.

The eight and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the eight and thirtieth Book.

- D Marcus Fulvius the Consul besieged the Ambracians in Epirus, and received them upon composition to mercy. He subdued Cephalonia, vanquished & brought under his subjection the Ætolians, and made peace with them. The Consul Cn. Manlius his colleague, overcame the Gallo-greeks, the Telissibogians, the Telissages, and the Tracmians, who were passed over into Asia under the conduct of Brennius: the only people that within the mountain Taurus yielded a not obedience to the Romans. The first beginning and rising is set down: also the time when at they seized first of those places which they hold. Here is recounted also the example of the rare valour and chastity of a woman, who being the wife of a certain King of the Gallo-greeks, chanced to be taken prisoner; and when a Centurion had forced and abused her body, she killed him with her own hands. The Censors held a selling of the City: in which by computation were numbered 258328 souls of Roman Citizens.
- E Amity was contracted with Antiochus King of Cappadocia. Cn. Manlius triumphed over the Gallo-greeks, notwithstanding the contradiction of those ten Commissioners, by whose advice and assistance he had articulated and engrossed the accord of alliance with Antiochus, and pleaded his own cause himself in the Senat against them. Scipio Africanus was indicted as some say, by Quintus Perilius Aetius a Tribune of the Commons: as others, by Nævius, for that he had defrauded the City Chamber of some part of the Pillage which he got from Antiochus. When the day was come that he should make his answer, he was called up to the publick pulpit and place of audience, and with a loud voice said unto the people, My masters you that are Citizens of Rome, this very day have I won Carthage: and with that he ascended up into the Capitoll, and the people accompanied him thither: and from thence because he would avoid these hard and injurious courses of the Tribunes, and be no more tormented with them, he retired himself to Liternum, as it were into voluntary exile: and whether he ended his days there, or at Rome, it is not well known: for his tomb and monument was to be seen in both places. Scipio Asiaticus (the brother of Africanus) was accused of the same crime of embezzling the publick treasure and robbing the common weal, and thereof condemned: but as he was led to prison, and should have been laid up on bonds and irons, Tib. Sempronius Gracchus Tribune of the Commons (who before-time had been an adversary and enemy unto the Scipios) interposed himself and rescued him: and for that pleasure done, he took to wife the daughter of Africanus. When the Pretor sent the treasurers of the City, so far off they were from finding any remnant or token of the King's riches and money, that they could not more with as much as would satisfy the law wherein he was condemned. And when his kindred and friends had contributed and raised an infinite masse of money for him, he would not receive the same: and he much only was redeemed and bought again, as might serve for his necessities to find and maintain him.

During

During the time of the wars in Asia, the affairs also in Ætolia were in small rest and quietness: which troubles arose first from the Athamanians, who after that Aminander was dispossessed of his Kingdom, were held in obedience by garrisons under the captain of King Philip; and they bare themselves so proud, insolent, and outrageous in their government, that the Athamanians found a great misse of Aminander, and were desirous of him again. Now remained he at that time as a banished person in Ætolia; and upon letters received from his own nation (concerning the state wherein Athamania then stood) he conceived some hope to recover his crown again; whereupon he sent the messengers back to Argithea (the chief City of Athamania) unto the principall men of the countrey, with this credence, That if he might be assured of the affection and love of the people, he would procure the aid of the Ætolians and come into Athamania, accompanied with the elect personages (and those are the counsell of that nation) and Nicander the Pretor. When he understood and perceived that they were prest and ready to do him all service, he advertised them sometimes upon what day he would enter with his army into Athamania. At the first there were but four persons that conspired against the Macedonian garrison, and these took every one six more unto them for to be assistant in the execution of their complot. But afterwards trusting but little in this small number of their adherents and complices (who indeed were fitter to keep counsell and conceal a matter secretly, then to perform any action valiantly) they adjoynd unto them the like number unto the other: so as now they were two and fifty in all; and they divided themselves into four companies. One crew of them went to Heraclea; another to Teiraphylia, where the Kings treasure was usually kept; a third took their way to Theudoria; and the fourth to Argithea. But they all agreed upon this course, to hold themselves quiet and peaceable at their first coming, and to converse in the market place of these Cities, as if they were come about some particular negotiation of their own: and upon a certain day appointed to set to it at once, and to raise the whole multitude for to expell the Macedonian garrisons out of their fortresses. Now when the day was come, and Aminander ready upon the frontiers with his forces of a thousand Ætolians, the garrisons of the Macedonians were at one instant chased out of those four Cities aforesaid, like as it was comploted before hand: and letters were dispatched from all parts into other Cities, advising them to deliver and free themselves from the tyranny of Philip, and restore Aminander into his lawfull kingdom and throne of his father. Thus the Macedonians were expelled in every quarter: only the town Theium made resistance and held out some few daies against the siege, by occasion that Zeno (captain of the garrison there) had intercepted the letters, and they that sided with Philip were possessed of the castle. But in the end surrendered it was likewise unto Aminander, and all Athamania reduced unto his obedience excepting only the fort of Athenæum, situate upon the marches of Macedony.

Philip advertised of the revolt of Athamania, accompanied with a power of six thousand fighting men, put himself in his journey, and with exceeding expedition, marched as far as Gomphi. Where he left the greater part of his forces, (for they had not been able to endure so long a journey) and with two thousand came to Athenæum, the only place held by his garrison to his use. And from thence, after he had sounded the next neighbours, and soon found that there was nothing but hostility among them, he retired to Gomphi, and joined withall his forces together returned into Athamania. Then he sent Zeno before with a thousand footmen, and gave him in charge to seize upon Ethopia, a place that directly for his purpose commandeth Argithea; and seeing that his men were possessed thereof, himself sat him down, and pitched his tents about a certain temple dedicated to the name of Jupiter. There he was forced by reason of the foul and stormy weather to stay one whole day, and the morrow after he went forward with his army to Argithea. As they marched, behold they discovered the Athamanians, running from divers parts to the hill tops, which stood over the way along. They had no sooner espied them, but the foremost ensigns made stay, and all that regiment of the vanguard was surpris'd with fear and fright. Every man began for his part to cast many doubts, and think with himself what should become of them, in case their companies were entred once into the vallies, so checked by those rocks above said. This tumult and trouble caused the King perforce to call back those in the vanguard, and to retire the same way that he came, notwithstanding he was very desirous (if they would have seconded him) to have made quick speed, and gotten through those streights. The Athamanians at first followed after them aloot quietly enough: but when they had once joined with the Ætolians, leaving them behind to come upon the tail of the enemy, they spread themselves all about and flanked them on the sides: some of them also got store their head by the next waies which they were acquainted with, and beset the passages; inso much, as the Macedonians were so greatly troubled, that forced they were (more like men that fled in disarray, then marched in good order) to leave much of their armor, and many of their men behind, to passe over the river; and there the chase ended. From thence the Macedonians returned safely to Gomphi, and so forth into Macedony.

The Athamanians and the Ætolians assembled from all parts to Ethopia for to surpris and defeat Zeno and that regiment of a thousand Macedonians which was with him. But the Macedonians reposing no great trust in that place, retired from Ethopia, to an hill much higher and steeper

A keeper on all sides, and therefore lesse acceptable. The Athamanians having found out diverse passages unto it, enforced them to forgo that hold also. And when they were dispersed among the blind rocks, and unto them unknown, and could not readily find the way out, some of them were taken prisoners, & others slain. Many for fear tumbled down headlong from the pitch of the cliffs, and brake their necks, and very few escaped with Zelus to the King. The next day after they obtained truce, untill they had committed their dead to earth.

Aminander having thus repossessed his realm, sent Embassadors to Rome unto the Senator Lucius wife, unto the Scipios in Asia (who after the great battell with Antiochus, sojourned in Ephesus) He craved peace and pardon, he excused himself in that he had recovered his fathers Kingdome by the means and help of the Ætoliens, and withall laid great fault and blame upon King Philip.

B As for the Ætoliens, they departed out of Athamania, and made an expedition against the Amphilochians, and by consent of the greater part (reduced the whole nation under their puissance and subjection. Having thus regained Amphilochia (for in times past it appertained to their neighbours) upon the same hope they passed over in Aperantia, which yielded also for a great part thereof, and came under their obedience. As for the Dolopians, they never belonged to the Ætoliens, but unto Philip. And at the first they assembled together in arms, but understanding one, that the Amphilochians took part with the Ætoliens, that Philip was fled out of Athamania and that his garrison was put to the sword, they revolted likewise from Philip, and turned to the Ætoliens. Who making now full account that they were sure enough on all sides from the Macedonians, by reason of so many nations which environed them about, they took knowledge (by the common

C bruit) of the defeat of Antiochus by the Romans in Asia, and not long after their own Embassadors returned to Rome without hope of peace, relating withall that Fulvius the Consul had passed the seas already with an army. Upon these news, they were much troubled and afraid: and in this perplexity, they induced and procured first the Rhodian and then the Athenian Embassages, to the end that by the credit and countenance of these two States, their prayers lately rejected, might have more easie access to the Senat: and with them they sent to Rome once again the principall personages of their nation, to try their last hope of obtaining peace; and never to cast to prevent war, before the enemy was come welneer within their sight. Now had M. Fulvius transported his forces to Apollonia, and devised with the princes and states of the Epirots, where to begin war.

D The Epirots advised him to assail Ambracia, which as then was united to the Ætoliens. And why? if either the Ætoliens should come to the defence of the place, they had a goodly large and open plain all about to bid them battell; or if they refused the field, and would not fight, they should find no great difficulty to assault and force the town. For not only there was at hand store enough of timber and other matter to raise mounts, mantelets, and other fabricks; but Arcthon a river navigable, very commodious to transport all necessaries unto them, runneth under the wals of the City; and besides, the summer was a fit season for war-service. With these reasons they perswaded the Consul to conduct his army through Epirus. But when the Consul was come before Ambracia, he found it was no easie peece of work to besiege and assault the town. This Ambracia is situate under the stony and craggy hill, which the inhabitants call Perantia. The City itself looketh unto the West, what way as the wall reacheth toward the fields; and the river: the fort

E and castle thereof standeth upon the hill, and regardeth the East. The river Arcthon running out of Acarnania, dischargeth it self into an arme of the sea, which beareth the name of the City neer adjoyning, and is called Ambracia. This town, besides that it is well guarded with the river of one side, and defended with hills on the other, is fortified also with a strong wall, in circuit somewhat more then three miles about. Fulvius encamped strongly on the fields side, in two holds of a pretty distance asunder, and raised one scence upon an high ground, opposit against the fortresse of the town. All these places he determined to enclose within the compais of a trench and rampier, to the end, that they who were shut up within the town, might have no egress, and that from without there should be no ingress, for any aid and succour whatsoever. The Ætoliens were assembled already at Stratus by an edict from the Pretor Ninander, incontinently upon the rumour that ran

F the siege of Ambracia, intending fully at first to march from thence withall their forces. But afterwards, when they perceived that a greater part of the City was streightly beleaguered already, and blocked with trench and rampier; and withall, that the Epirots were encamped upon a plain on the other side of the river, they were of advise to divide their forces in two parts. Eupolemus accompanied with a regiment of a thousand men lightly appointed, passed through the fortifications of the enemies, before they were joined and united together, and entered Ambracia. Ninander with the rest of the forces purposed at the first by night to assail the camp of the Epirots, considering that the Romans could not easily succour them, by reason of the river running between. But afterwards upon better advise, supposing this to be a dangerous enterprize (for fear lest the Romans should discover their march, and so intercept them that they might not retire again in safety) he altered his mind, and turned to the spoiling and waiving of Acarnania. Now when the Consul had made attend of all his fabricks devised for to invest and enclose the City, and finishing his engines wherewith he meant to shake the wall, he approached neer and gave assault in five places at once. Three batteries he planted in equall distance asunder, and where the easiest passage and access was from the plain, full upon that place of the City which they call Pyrrhaum: one over against the temple of Æsculapian: and another opposit to the Castle. With ramps he hook the wals, with long poles and hooks he fetcht off and plucked down the battlebattlements of the walls. The oppidans as the first were afraid to see these strange engines, and H quaked to hear so terrible noise of their walls battered: but afterwards, seeing that the walls stood upright beyond their expectation, they plucked up their hearts again, and with swipes weighed either great counterpoises and weights of lead, or huge stones, then with a swing they let them fall as in upon the rams of the enemies, or else tumbled mighty big logs of timber aloft, and so either brake them speeces, or bare them down. And as for their hooks aforesaid, they caught hold of them with iron flouks like anchors, and so drew them over the walls to the other side with a winch and brake both them & their poles. Moreover, they sallied out in the night upon the watch that attended their engines, issued forth of themselves in the day time, assailed the corps de guard, and put them great fear. As things stood in these terms before Ambracia, the Etolians by this time were returned to Stratus from their rodes which they made into Acarnania. And then Ni- cander the Pretor conceiving some hope to levy the siege by some audacious and hardy adventure devised that one Nicodamus should put himself within the town of Ambracia with five hundred Etolians; and appointed one certain night, and an hour also of the same night, when both they from out of the town should assail the fabricks and engines of the enemy planted against Pyrrham, and also himself charge upon the camp of the Romans at the same time, and put them in fright:

 supposing by this twofold alarm (especially in the night which maketh every thing more fearfull) there might be some notable act and memorable exploit done. And Nicodamus verily for his part in the dead time of the night, having passed unseen and not descried by some of the sentinels, and by resolute force broken through the rest of the watches, passed over an arm of the river and recovered the City, and in some measure by this means heartned the besieged inhabitants to adventure K anything, and put them in better hope to accomplish it. And when the night appointed was come, all on a sudden he set upon the engines, as it was before accorded between them. The adventure of this enterprise was much more then the effect, because there were no forces without to joyn with him; were it that the Pretor of the Etolians was afraid to be too bold, or that he thought it was a better peece of service to aid the Amphilochians newly recovered, whom Perseus King Philip his son, sent from his father to reconquer Dolopia and Amphilochia, assailed with great force and violence. The Romans had planted their ordnance and artillery, as is aforesaid in three places against Pyrrham, which the Etolians charged all at one time, but not with like preparation of means, nor with the same violence. For some came with burning and flaming firebrands, others carried tow and bundles with pitch, and faggots of dry sticks, and other like matter easy to be L kindled, in such sort as all their companies shone again with a light fire. Many of the warders they killed at the first onset, but when the alarm and tumult was heard within the camp, and the signal given by the Consul, they took arms, and ran apace out of all the gates for to rescue and defend them. In one quarter the Etolians did their deed, and fought with fire and sword: but in the other two places after they had given the attempt, rather than began any skirmish, they retired and went their waies. The heat of the fight inclined wholly to one quarter, where the two captains Eupolemus and Nicodamus, encouraged their men as they fought from two divers parts, and entertained them with an allured hope, that Nicander according to agreement would be there and charge upon the back of the enemies. This for a good while maintained the courages of the souldiers: but perceiving there was no sign appeared of their countrymen, and that they kept not M touch with them, and seeing withall how the number of the enemies increased, and themselves disappointed and destitute, they slackened their fight, and were not so eager upon the enemy, and in the end gave over: and having much ado to retire in safety, were chased into the City, after they had burnt some of the Roman engines, and slain a few more of their enemies then there died of themselves. And surely if the service had been followed in execution according as it was com-plotted and agreed, those devised engines no doubt might have been destroyed, if not wholly, yet in one part at least wise, and that with great murder and slaughter of the enemies. The Ambracia- ans, together with those Etolians which were within the City, not only gave over that night enterprise, but ever after shewed more coldnels to hazard themselves again, as if they had been betrayed by their own fellows. Not a man would fall forth upon the ward and watch of the enemies, but they all from their walls and turrets stood upon their guard only, and with the vantage of the place defended themselves in safety.

Perseus advertised that the Etolians approached Amphilochia, quit the siege of the City which he was about to assault: and after he had only harried and wasted the territory about it, retired from those quarters and returned into Macedony. The Etolians likewise were enforced to depart from thence, by reason that their sea-coasts were spoiled and overrun: for Plinius the King of the Illyrians, was entred into this river of Corinth with a fleet of 60 barks, and with the fleet of the Achazan ships that lay in the rode of Parya invested the maritim tract of Etolia. Against whom were sent a thousand Etolians, who waited upon the fleet at every turn as they doubled any reaches, and with the vantage of the short waies and next passages by the land, were ready to welcome them on the banks and make head against them.

The Romans lying still in siege before Ambracia, by battering and shaking the walls in many places, had dismantled a great part of the City, and laid it open: howbeit, they could not enter with it. For at every breach where the wall was broken down, they were ready to make a new counter-mure, and the souldiers standing upon the very ruins, served in stead of a bulwark. The Consul seeing he could not prevail by open force, determined to undermine, and make a secret way

A way in the ground into the City: but first he covered the place where they wrought with man-lers. For a good while the plowers were not perceived by the enemies; nor withstanding they wrought both night and day, not only digging under the earth, but also casting up the mould as they went. But an huge heap of earth bearing up aloft from the left, was directed, and gave them within the towne to understand, what the enemies were about: and fearing lest they had wrought so far already as under their wall, and that they were at the point to make a way into the towne, they within began likewise to strike another trench just against the place covered with man-lers afore said: and when they had digged to that depth as the bottom might be of the enemies mine, they made no words within, but in great silence laid their ear too in divers places close to the earth, harkning if haply they might hear any noise of the plowers: and when they once had got in ear of them, they countermined dire dily against them. And long they were not about it. For anon they came as far as to the cold hollow ground, whereas the foundation of the wall stood upon stakes and props, which the enemies had set to bear it up. Now when their works were met together, and that there was a continued passage out of this trench into the Mine, the plowers first fell to it, and scuffled with their spades shovels, and mattocks, and such other tools that they had used to work withall: but soon after, armed souldiers entered and encountered within the vane, and closely skirmished under ground. But within a while that manner of dealing grew more cold and slack by reason that they stopped up the Mine between when they list, one while with sacks and haircloth, other whiles with doors and such trash as they could come by in haste to stand next hand. One new invention above the rest was devised against those within the Mine, and the same but a slight matter, and made without any great trouble, and this it was. The towne men took a great tun or dryfat with a hole bored in the bottom, of that capacity as might receive a penny pipe like a faucet within it; and withall they made a pipe indeed of iron to fit it, and an iron lid likewise to cover the other end or mouth thereof, but the same had many holes in divers places of it. Now this vessel they stuffed full of down and soft feathers, and then set it with the head forward against the very Mine. From the lid or cover afore said there stood poking out long sharp pikes, which the Macedonians call Sarissa, set to keep off the enemies. Within the feathers they put a cole or spark of fire, and then with a pair of smiths bellows (the hole whereof went into the pipe afore said) they blowed the cole and set it on a smothering fire within the feathers. By which means there arose not only a mighty deal of smoak, but also it carried with it a stinking favour, by the reason of the feathers burning within; and so filled all the Mine under ground, that scarce durst any man abide within for fear of being choaked.

During these affairs about Ambraeia, Phaenae and Demetrias two Embassadors sent from the Etolians by a generall decree of the whole nation, came with a full and plenary commission unto the Consul. For their Pretor (seeing of the one side Ambraeia besieged, and on the other side the sea coast endamaged with the enemies ships, and in a third quarter the Amphilochians and all Dalopia pitiously waited by the Macedonians; and that the Etolians were not able to oppose themselves and make head at once against three wars in divers parts) had assembled a generall Diet for to consult with the chief of the Etolians what was to be done in this case. All their opinions jumped in this one point, "To seek for peace (if it were possible) under equall and indifferent conditions: if not, yet in as tollerable terms as they might. In confidence and assurance (say they) of Ambracia, the war began; and now that Ambraeia is vanquished both by land and sea, yet, and hunted as it were out of the compass of the world into an angle beyond Tanais, what hope remaineth to maintain and wage the war any longer? and therefore Phaenae and Demetrias were to deal in such a case and time, as they thought best according to their wisdom and fidelity, and the common good of the Etolians: for what other counsell remaineth, what course else can they take, or what choice beside hath fortune left them? With this so large and free commission they were these Embassadors sent: who besought the Consul to spare their City, to have mercy and pity of their nation (sometime linked in amity unto them, and forced through very calamity and misery (for so oft they were so speak of any injuries and wrongs offered) to fall in such follies: neither have the Etolians in this late war of Antiochus deserved to suffer more harm than they were worthy to receive good for their service in the former war against Philip: and when they were not largely rewarded and recompenced then, so they ought not to be punished and chastised extremely now. The Consul made answer again, That the Etolians had indeed long for peace many a time, but sincerely and truly at no time: and since they had followed and drawn Ambracia to war, let them hartly follow his example in craving peace. Like as he therefore hath not quit and rendered some few Cities which were in question about their liberty and freedom, but parted with a rich and wealthy kingdom, even all Achaia between this and the mountain Taurus: so unless the Etolians will simply lay all arms aside and come to treat for peace, he would never give them audience. And to be short, if they will peace have, they must deliver up their armour and all their horses first, yea, and make payment of a thousand talents of silver, and the one moiety thereof to pay down right upon the spot before hand. Over and besides this treaty, I will annex unto the accord and covenant, That they shall hold for their friends and enemies those whom the people of Rome reputed to be theirs, & none other. To this answer the Embassadors said never a word, both for that they were very hard and grievous conditions, and also because they knew the nature and moods of their Countermen and neighbours, who would grow untractable they were and not to be removed if they once took speech whereupon they returned unto them, without doing any thing at all, as know the advantage once again of the Prætor and the principal States, what so resolve upon in every respect, while all stood whole and upright. But they were welcomed with outcries, and well spent for their labour in that they had not dispatched and made an end, and so were sent away, and commanded to bring back with them, one peace or other. As they went again toward Ambracia, they were foretold and surprized in an ambush laid for them near the high way side by the Acarnanians (with whom at that time they warred) and were had so: Tyrreum and there imprisoned. And by this occasion the peace was delayed.

• Ambracia, or Avia.

While the Embassadors of Athens and Rhodes (who were come already to intreat for them) remained with the Consul, Aminander also (the King of the Athamans) presented himself under safe conduct in the Roman camp, and took more care for the City of Ambracia (where he had sojourned the greatest part of his exile) than in the behalf of the Etolians. By them the Cos. was certified of the hard hap of the Etolian Embassadors, and then he gave commandment, that they should be brought from Tyrreum. When they were come, they began to treat of peace. Aminander in the mean while laboured what he could in that enterprise which he especially had undertaken, namely, to induce the Ambracians to submit unto the Romans: but when he saw he did but small good, for all his parling with the principal persons of the City from their wall at length by the Cos. his permission he entered into the town; where, partly by good counsel and partly by prayer and entreaty, he perswaded them in the end, to put themselves into the Roman hands. Now as touching the Etolians, they found much favour by the means of C. Kalerius the son of that Levius, who first contracted amity with that nation; and was besides half brother unto the Cos. by the same mother. And the Ambracians after capitulation made, that the Etolians who came to aid them might go forth without harm, set open their gates. Then articles were made with the Etolians: Inprimis, To pay 500 Enboik talents of silver: two hundred presently, and the other 300 at six payments yearly by even portions. Item, To render all Roman captives and fugitive traitors and runagates that they had into the hands of the Romans. Item, To challenge jurisdiction over no City, which since the time that T. Quintus passed over into Greece, was either forced by the Romans or entered voluntarily into amity and society with them: provided always, that the Isle Cephalonia be not comprised within this capitulation. These articles, albeit they were somewhat easier than they looked for, yet the Etolians requested, that they might acquaint their Council withall: and permitted they were so to do. Some small variance and debate distracted and held them awhile as touching those Cities, which having been in times past within their signory and jurisdiction they hardly could abide to be dismembred (as it were) from their body. But in the end there was not one but agreed to accept of the peace. The Ambracians gave unto the Cos. for a present a coronet of beaten gold, weighing 150 pound. Their statues of brass and marble their painted tables (where with Ambracia was better stored and adorned, than all the other Cities of that region, because it was the royall seat of King Pyrrhus where he kept his court and residence) were all taken down and carried away: nought else was touched nor any hurt done besides.

The Consul dislodged then and removed from Ambracia into the higher and more inland parts of Etolia, and encamped before the City called Argos Amphilochium; two and twenty miles distant from Ambracia: and thither at length repaired the Etolian Embassadors unto him, who marvelled much at them, why they staid so long. When he understood by them that the general council of the Etolians had approved of peace, he willed them to go directly to Rome unto the Senat: and permitted also the Athenians and Rhodians (their mediators and advocates) to go with them and as orators to speak in their behalf: moreover he granted, that his half brother C. Kalerius should accompany them: which order when he had taken, himself crossed over the water to Cephalonia.

When they were arrived at Rome, they found both the ears and hearts of the chief Senators wholly possessed beforehand, with many complaints and imputations that Philip had enformed against them: for he by means of his Embassador and letters (complaining that the Etolians had unjustly taken from him the Dolapians, the Amphilochians, and Athamans; and that his garrisons, yea and last of all his son Persus, were driven out of Amphilochia) had wholly averted the Senat from giving any ear at all to their requests and prayers: howbeit the Rhodians & Athenians had audience given them with patience and silence. The Athenian Embassador Leon (by report) moved and perswaded the Senat with his eloquent tongue: and by a familiar parable and simile under he compared the people of Etolia to the nature of the sea: For like as it, being of itself calm is troubled and made rough by the winds: even so (saith he) the people of that nation all the while they entertained friendship with the Romans, and performed their faithfull promise unto them so long were in their right kind, and continued peaceable and quiet: but after that Theas and Dicaarchus began to blow from out of Asia, as after that, Maverat and Damocritus blundered and puffed from the parts of Europe, then arose a storm and tempest, with the gusts whereof driven they were to Antiochus, and cast (as a man would say) upon a rock. Well the Etolians after they had been much tossed a long time from post to pillar in fine effected that these articles of peace ensuing were freely agreed upon. Inprimis, The nation of Etolia shall maintain faithfully and truly the Empire and Signory of the people of Rome. Then shall suffer to pass through their country and confines no army that shall be conducted against their allies and friends: nor assist them with any aid or maintenance whatsoever. Item, They shall repulse their enemies,

A mics of the Romans for their enemies, and wage war against them. Item, They shall deliver unto the Romans and their confederates, all runagates, all fugitives, and prisoners that are among them, excepting such as having been once taken and returned home, chanced to be caught again the second time: as those, who being Roman enemies, were taken prisoners by them, at what time as the Aetolians served in garrison under the Romans. As for the rest, as many as are forth-coming and may be found, shall be delivered (without fraud or covin) within 100 daies next ensuing, to the Magistrate of Cercyra: but those that appear not within that time, shall belike-wise redred whensoever their fortune is to be met withall. Item, They shall yield forty hostages, such as the Roman Consul in his discretion will approve and like well of: provided, that none of these pledges be under twelve years of age, nor above forty. Neither shall there be taken for hostage any Prator, or Captain over horicemen, nor publike Notary or Secretary to the State, nor yet any one that hath lain in hostage before time. Provided also, that Cephalonia shall be exempt from the articles of this accord. Item, As touching the sum of money which they are to pay, and the manner and terms of the payment, there shall be nothing changed of that which hath been concluded with the Consul: yet, if they had rather pay the same sum in gold than in silver, they may so do; provided then, that they keep the rate and proportion of one for ten, to wit, that one golden peece of coin go for ten times so much in weight of silver, and no more. Item, What Cities, what lands and territories, what persons toever, which having at any time heretofore held tenor of the Aetolians, were by the Consuls T. Quintus and Cn. Domitius, or any time since their Consulship, either subdued and conquered by force of arms, or otherwise of themselves came under the obedience of the people of Rome, the Aetolians shall make no claim nor challenge unto them. Finally, the Aetolians with their City and territory, shall appertain to the Acarnanians. Under these conditions aforesaid, the accord was concluded with the Aetolians.

Not only in the same summer, but also much about those very daies wherein these affairs were managed by M. Fulvius in Aetolia, Cn. Manlius the other Consul maintained war in Gallugracia, whereof at this present I will begin to write. This Consul in the beginning of the spring came to Ephesus, where, after he had received the army of L. Scipio and taken a review and survey thereof, he made an Oration to his souldiers; wherein, first he praised their valour and vertue, in that with one battell they had finished the war against Antiochus: then he exhorted them to enter into a new war with the Gauls who had incouraged King Antiochus with aid, and were beside of nature so rampant, that unless their puissance were abated and their courage taken down, to little or no purpose it was that Antiochus was removed beyond the mountains of Taurus. Last of all, some discourse he made of his own person, which was nothing prolix and long, implying neither vain untruths nor excessive reports. The souldiers gave audience to the Consul with great joy and a general applause, making this account, that since King Antiochus was vanquished, the Gauls alone (who were one part of his forces) would be of no puissance to withstand them. But the Consul supposed that it was much out of his way, that Eumenes should be absent (for then he was at Rome) who knew the countries, was acquainted with the nature of the people, and whom it imported and concerned very much, that the power of the Gauls should be enfeebled and abated. And therefore he sent for Attalus his brother, from Pergamus, and exhorted him to enter into a dition with him and take arms. And when Attalus had made promise to aid him both in his person and with all the power that he could make, he sent him into his country to levy souldiers. After some few daies, when the Consul was departed from Ephesus, Attalus (accompanied with a regiment of a thousand foot and two hundred horse) met him at Magnesia: and had given order to his brother Athenus, to follow after with the rest of the forces; having committed the guard and government of Pergamus and the kingdom to those, whom he knew to be fast and faithfull to his brother and himself. The Consul, after he had praised and commended the young gentleman, marched forward with his whole power as far as Mander, and there encamped, because it was not possible to pass the river at any foord, and therefore boats and barges were to be got together for to ferry and transport the army. When they were set over the river, they went to Hiska Coma, where there was a magnificent and stately Temple of Apollo, and an Oracle in it. And by report the Priests and Prophets there, deliver the responds and answers of the Oracle in verses, and those not rudely composed without rhyme or meter. From hence they removed, and at two daies end arrived at the river Elapesus: thither were embassadors come from the Alabandians, requesting the Consul either by vertue of his authority, or by force of arms to compel one of their fortresses which lately had revolted from them and rebelled, to return again to their former obedience. And thither Athenus also, brother to Eumenes and Attalus, was come together with Leusus the Candian, and Corragus the Macedonian, bringing with them 1000 foot, and 300 horse, of divers nations mingled together. The Consul sent one of his martiall Tribunes or Colonels with a mean company to summon the Castle or fortress aforesaid, and after it was forced and recovered, he delivered it into the hands of the Alabandians. Himself kept on his direct way, and turned on no side until he came unto Antiochia upon the river Mander, where he encamped. This river Mander riseth from Celana, where the first head and source thereof is to be seen. Now this Celana had been in times past the capitall City of all Phrygia. But in proceess of time this old Celana was abandoned by the inhabitants, and not far from it they peopled a new City called Apamea, bearing the name of Apamea the sister of Selucus. The river Mander likewise springing not far from the foresaid sources of Mander, dischargeth it self thereto. And as the common fame goeth at this Calava it was, where Marsyas the Musician gave denance to Apollo; and challenged him to play upon the flute. This Mander abovenamed, issuing out of an high hill at Calava, runneth through the midst of the City and first keeping his course along the country of the Carians, and afterwards of the Ionians, falleth at the last into an arm of the sea, between Priene and Miletus.

* The same that Gordian come or Julian.

Whiles the Cos lay encamped about Antiochia, Solimus the son of Antiochus, presented himself unto him with corn for his army, according to the covenant contracted with Scipio. Some small variance and difference there was as touching the aid demanded of Antiochus: for Solimus pleaded that Antiochus had capitulated only to find corn for the Roman souldiers. But this debate was soon at an end by reason of the stiff resolution of the Cos: who sent a Colonel to warn and charge the souldiers to accept no corn, before the aid souldiers of Antiochus were received. From thence he marched to Gordianichus (a City so called) & so forward the third day to Taba. This City is seated upon the frontiers of the Indians, in that coast which boundeth upon the Pamphylian sea. This quarter was able to yield lusty men for war, when it had not been any way endamaged, but remained entire and whole. For proof whereof, even then also there issued out of the City a cornet of horimen, who charged upon the Romans as they marched, and at the first onset troubled them not a little. But afterward, seeing themselves neither for number, nor yet for prowess comparable unto them, they were driven back into the town, & craved pardon for their trespass, ready to surrender their City into the Cos's hands. The Cos, imposed upon them a payment of 25 talents of silver, and 10000 medimms of wheat, and upon that composition their surrender was accepted. Three daies after, the Romans came to Chius the river & from thence to the City Eliza, which at the first assault they won. After this the army marched as far as to a Castle called Thabustan standing over the river Indus, so called of a certain Indian, whom an Elephant threw and cast into it. Now they were not far from Cybra, & yet no embassage appeared from the tyrant of that country and state, Maugres, a disloyal and treacherous man in all his dealings: and besides, extremely hard and unreasonable. Whereupon the Cos sent out before, C. Helvius, with 4000 foot and 500 horse, to sound his disposition and mind. As these companies entered into his frontiers, there encountered them his Embassadors, giving them to understand that the tyrant their Master was ready to do whatsoever they would command: only his request was unto Helvius to pass peaceably through his country, and to restrain his souldiers from wasting & spoiling the territories: & 15 talents they brought with them for to make a crown of gold. Helvius promised to save his lands for being spoiled and wasted, but he willed the embassadors to go to the Cos. Now when they had related the same unto him, he made them answer in these termes, We cannot gather by any sign (qd. he) that the tyrant beareth good will and affection to us Romans: & again, if he be such an one as the world taketh him for, we are to think rather of his chastisement, than of admitting him into our amity. The embassadors were troubled at this word, requested him for that present no more, but to take the crown of gold, and to permit that the tyrant himself might have access into his presence for to parle with him and clear himself. The morrow after, by permission of the Cos, came the tyrant into the camp bearing no port of a Prince. For a privat person and mean man of small wealth would have gone in better apparel, and carried a greater train about him than he: neither went he so meanly, but he spake as lowly, hacking and hewing his words, as if he had not been able to speak them out. He complained of his own bareness and want & likewise of the poverty of the Cities under his seignory (for besides Cybra he held in possession Sylum & that which is called Alimne). Yet he promised to see what he could do, if haply by undoing himself & spoiling his subjects, he might make up five and twenty talents. Many he mistrusted greatly that he should never effect so much. Are you thereabout? (qd. the Cos.) Now verily I can no longer endure his mockery. Was it not enough, that in your absence you bashed not to delude and disappoint us by your Embassadors, but you must persist still in the same impudency now that you be here your self in person? And would you make us beleieve indeed, that the disbursing of 25 talents will begger you and your whole kingdom? Come on sir, I say: Bring me hither within these three daies, and lay me down in ready money 500 talents, or look for no other favour, but your territory to be wasted, and your City besieged. Greatly affrighted was he at these minatory words, howbeit he continued still obstinately, countering & pretending his neediness and poverty, and after much base hucking, and rising by little and little, one while hasting and wrangling, another while praying and entreating, (and that with whining and putting finger in the eye) he was fetcht over at length, and came off to pay 100 talents of silver, and to deliver 10000 medimms of corn besides. And all this was exacted of him to be performed in six daies. From Cybra the Cos, conducted the army through the country of the Sindenians, and after he had passed over the river Calanrys, he there pitched down his tents. The morrow after they marched by the lake or near Calanrys, and set them down and rested upon the river Mander. As they advanced from thence toward Lagon the next City the inhabitants fled for fear: wherupon the town void of people, but replenished with abundance of all things was ransacked and rifled. This done, they arrived at the head or spring of the river Lyens, and the next day marched toward the river Cobulans. The Termissians at the same time having forced and won the City of the Lyrians, were now upon the point to assault the Castle. They who were within besieged, seeing no other hope of succour, sent their Embassadors to the Consul, beseeching his help, and making pitifull moan, how they with their wives and children were shut up within the fortress, and looked every hour for death, either by famine or the sword.

A sword. This fell out as the Gaul wished; namely, to have so good an occasion presented unto him, of turning his way into Pamphylia. At his first starting he delivered the Lyrians from the siege. To Lar mellus he granted peace upon composition that he should receive first 30 talents. In like sort he dealt by the Apudians and other States of Pamphylia. In his return from thence, the first day he encamped fast by a river called Taurus; and the next day following, near a town which they call Xylinus Camp. From whence he marched and held on his journey continually, untill he came to the City Cormaja. The next City unto it was Darsa, which he found abandoned by the inhabitants for fear howbeit full of all kind of goods. As he was tied still along the marshes, there met him Embassadors from Lagina who came to render their City into his hands. After this, he entered into the territory of Sagelassus, a fertile & plenteous quarter, for all sorts of corn & fruits. The Pisidians inhabit those parts, who are the best warriors in all that country. In regard whereof, as also for that their territory is fruitful and well peopled, and their City strongly situated (as few like unto it) they were grown to be hardy and courageous. The Gaul seeing no embassy presented unto him in the entrance of the frontiers, sent out foragers to fetch in booties. When they perceived once their goods harried and carried away before their faces, their stomachs came down, and then they sent their ambassadors, and upon composition to pay 50 talents, 2000 medimns of wheat, and as many of barley, they obtained peace. From thence he passed to the mountains of Othrimus, untill he came to a village which they name Aperidon Coma, and there he encamped. Thither repaired the next day Salmus from Apamea. And the same day, after he had sent away unto Apamea his sick folk and other baggage, and lest that he had (good for nothing) he took guides of Salmus for the way, and entered into the plains of Metropolis, and the next morrow marched as far as Dion in Phrygia. After this, he entered into Syunda, where he found all the towns about abandoned for fear, and left desert. With the booty and pillage whereof his army was to heavily charged, that hardly he could march five miles a day; and so he came at length to Bendor, named. The old. From thence he passed to Anatura, and the next day to the source of Alander, and the third day pitched down his tents near Abassus. There he lay encamped many daies together, because he was now arrived into the country of the Tolistobogians.

The Gauls in times past being a mighty people in number, were induced to take a voyage, either for want of land to inhabit, or for hope of booty and prizes: and supposing withall, that they could not pass through any nation whatsoever, comparable to themselves in sort of arms, ended under the conduct of Brumnus into the country of the Dardanians. Where they began to mutiny among themselves: by occasion whereof it hapned, that to the number of twenty thousand of them, following two of their Princes Lumnus and Lutarius, departed from Dardanus, and took their way into Thracia where partly by warring with them that made resistance, and partly by imposing tribute upon them that craved peace, they came at length as far as to Bizantium: and after they had held tributary a good time the coast of Propontis, they possessed themselves also of the good towns and Cities of that quarter. After this, they had a mind and desire to invade Asia; for they heard (by being so near, how fertile and plenteous the soil of that country was. And after they had surprised and won Lysimachia by a mile, and by force of arms conquered all Chersonesus, they descended to Hellestus. Where seeing how they were divided from Asiatic only by the straits, and that it was but a small cut thither, their desire was much more inflamed to pass over. And for this purpose they dispatched certain curriers to Asiatic the governor of that coast, to demand passage. But by reason that they effected not this so soon as they hoped, there arose another new sedition between the Princes themselves. Whereupon Lumnus accompanied with the greater part, retired to Byzantium from whence he came. But Lutarius took from the Macedonians (who under colour of an embassy were sent from Antipater in espial) two covered ships, and three brigandines. By means of these vessels, within few daies he had set over all his army, transporting them one after another day and night continually. Not long after Lumnus also sailed over into Asia from Byzantium, by the aid of Nicomachus Kings of Bithynia. After this, the Gauls joined again together in one, and encouraged Nicomachus in his wars against Zyba, who held a part of Bithynia, and by their help and assistance especially, Zyba was vanquished, and all Bithynia became subject to Nicomachus. Then they departed out of Bithynia into Asia. Now of twenty thousand there were of those men thins and armed. Yet to great a terror they struck into all nations on this side the mountain Taurus, that both they to whom they approached not near, and also they whom they came within well the firstest as the nearest, submitted themselves, and yielded under their obedience. At the end, being three nations of them, to wit, the Tolistobogians, the Trocmians, and the Tectosages, they divided Asia likewise into those parts, and parted them so equally among themselves, that each nation of them possessed several tract which paid them tribute. The coast of Hellestus was given to the Trocmians: the Tolistobogians had for their share Asien and Ionis; and unto the Tectosages were allotted the inland parts of the main continent of Asia. And in open trade they demanded tribute of all Asia on this side Taurus. But they planted and sowed themselves about the river Haly. The fruit of their name was so fearful and terrible, and especially after their issue was multiplied and increased in great number, that the XX also of Asien in the end refused not to be their homagers, and give them tribute. The first of all the inhabitants in Asia that denied them homage, was King Antalus the father of Eumenes; and for as much beyond the expectation of all men, favoured his hardy and courageous enterprise: for he vanquished them in battle. Howbeit, he danted not their hearts so much, but still they offered and maintained their sovereign feignory, in such sort, as their puissance continued until the war between Antiochus and the Romans. Yes, and after that Antiochus was vanquished and chased out of part of his Realm, they conceived great hope to hold their own still: by reason they were so remote from the sea, and therefore thought that the Roman army would never pierce so far as to them. The Consul now, for as much as he was to war with this nation, so terrible to all their neighbours in those quarters, assembled his souldiers to a publike audience, and in this manner made speech unto them.

I am not ignorant, my souldiers, that of all the people which inhabit Asia, the Gauls are most renowned for valiance in war. And why? this fierce and cruell nation having run over the world in a manner, and warred with all countries, chose them a place of abode; and to settle themselves in the midst of a generation, of all other most mild and tractable. Big and tall they are of stature, and personage: their hair they wear long in golden crisped and shining locks: they carry bucklers of huge bigness, and handle swords of exceeding length. Besides, when they enter into battell, they use to sing, to hoop, and dance, and with clattering their targets and weapons together, after the guise of their country, they make an horrible noise. And all this is done of purpose by them to terrifie their enemies. But such devices as these be, let the Greeks, the Phrygians, and Carians be afraid of, who are not used and accustomed to hear and see such things: as for the Romans, acquainted, with the Gauls sudden and tumultuous wars, they can skill well enough of their toys and vanities also. Once indeed, and but once, at the first encounter they discomfited the Romans at the river Allia: but since that time our Ancestors for the space of two hundred years have made havock of them; killed, put to flight, and driven them like sheep before them: and oftner, I dare well say, have they triumphed of the Gauls, than of all the world besides. Thus much we know of them by experience, that if a man be able to stand out their first shock and violence (which upon a furious heat of their own by nature, and in blind choler and anger they spend all at once) all the parts of their body run to sweat and become faint: their weapons are ready to fall out of their hands: their bodies are so tender, their courages so feeble (after their cholarick anger is once allayed and passed) that the very heat of the sun the dust and the drought is able without drawing sword, to overthrow them and lay them along. Proof and trial we have had of them: not only legions to legions, but man to man. T. Manlius and M. Valerius have showed plainly how far Roman vertue and prowess surpasseth the furious rage of Gauls. Why? even Marcius Antiochus, one man alone, repulsed and beat down the Gauls as they climbed up by numbers to the Capitol cliff. And those ancestors of ours before named, had then to deal with natural Gauls indeed, born and bred in their own country: whereas these here, by this stalme now are a bastard sort of them, and clean degenerate, mingled they are with others, and in truth as they be called so are they Gallo-greeks. And it fareth with them as with plants, fruits, and living beasts in which we see that the seed is not of that vertue, & so effectual to keep and retain still the own kind and nature, as the property of the soil and the air where they are nourished is, to change the same. Thus the Macedonians who inhabit Alexandria in Egypt, who dwell in Selencia and Babylonia, and other Colonies dispersed over the earth, are grown out of their own kind, and in manners become Syrians, Parthians, and Egyptians. Muscia lested among the Gauls, hath drawn somewhat of the nature of the nations adjoining and bordering upon them. And what have the Tarentins left them of that severe, rough, and hard discipline of the Spartans? For, whatsoever is ingendred and bred in the own proper place, is evermore kindly, and retaineth its own nature better: but look what is transplanted into another soil, doth soon degenerate, and grow into a bastard kind: for nature transformeth her self, and changeth into that wherewith she is nourished. Be sure therefore, that like as ye have defeated these Phrygians (for no better they be) overcharged and loaden with French arms in the battell against Antiochus, even so being now conquerors, ye shall subdue and hew them in pieces once already vanquished. And I fear me more that ye shall win too small glory of them, than I doubt ye by fighting so little with them, that ye shall have their hands too full of war against them.

Why, even King Antiochus many a time and often hath discomfited and put them to flight. Neither would I have you to think, that savage beasts only newly taken, and keeping in the first their fell and wild nature, after a time that they have been fed by mans hand, grown to be tame and gentle: but that the fierceness and cruelty of man is likewise of the same nature to be dulced and made tractable. Are ye perswaded that these Gauls resemble their fathers and grandfathers in conditions? Their forefathers long since left their native country for want of ground and land to possess; and being driven to pass through the most rough and difficult country of Thracia, first came into Paonia & afterwards travelled all over Thracia, fighting ever as they went with most fierce and cruell nations, untill at length they seized upon these parts and settled there. After (I say) they had been hardened and made more fell by so many travels and dangerous adventures, they were received by the end within such a land, as through abundance of all good things, might feed and frank them up. All that the fierceness and savage nature of theirs, which they had when they came first thither, is (no doubt) mollified by the goodness of the most fertile soil, by the sweetness & pleasure of a most temperat air, and last of all by the gentle and debonaire nature of the inhabitants their neighbors. And even you also (in good faith) are to look unto it: (marshall men although you be, and the very off-spring of M. himself) ye are (I say) to take heed and beware of these delights of Asia, and betimes to get you forth from them. So

H^{ow} forceable are these forraie pleasures and delightfull enticements, to quench and corrupt the vigor of your spirits: so powerfull is the common and conversing with strangers: so potent is the contagion (as it were) of their manners and discipline of their bow inhabitants. Yet this one good turn ye shall have: that as against you they have not that courage which in times past they had; so among the Greeks here, they are of as great name as ever they were in ancient time. So that amongst your allies, you shall win as great honour by your victory, as if you should have conquered the Gauls, when they were at the height of their valour and prowels. After the assembly dismissed, and Embassadors sent to Eposognatus (the only Prince in those parts who persisted in amity with Ennienus), and had refused to aid Antiochus against the Romans) the Col. marched forward. The first day he came to the river Alander, and the morrow to a certain village which they call Tylson. Thither repaired unto him the Embassadors of the Oroadians, craving to be accepted as friends: but they were enjoined to pay two hundred talents: and when they requested leave to make relation and report hereof at home, they were permitted. From thence the Col. led his army to Plaudan: and after that he encamped at Thictor. Thither returned they who had been sent to Eposognatus, together with the Embassadors of Prince Compulsus, requesting the Romans not to war upon the Tectosages: for that both himself and Eposognatus also, would go in person to them, and perswade the nation to do whatsoever they should be commanded. The Prince obtained his request: and so from thence the army began to march through the land which they call Axylon, and well it might be so called, for it hath no wood at all in it, nor beareth so much as thorns, or any thing else to burn and maintain fire: cow-dung is all their burning, for want of other fiewell. Whiles the Romans lay in camp before Cuballum, (a fortress of Gallugacia) they discovered the Cavalry of the enemies coming toward them with a great hurrey and tumult: and they charged so fiercely and suddenly upon the corps de guard of the Romans, that they not only troubled and disordered them, but also killed some of them. The alarm being given within the camp, the Roman horsemen at once issued forth of all the gates, discomfited the Gauls, and flew certain of them in the chase. The Consul perceiving now that he was come into his enemies country, marched not from thenceforth without tending out his espials before, and kept his army together in battell array with great heed and carefulness. Thus he held on his journey continually, until he came to the river Sangarius, where he purposed to make a bridge, because there was not passage over at any foord. This Sangarius ariseth out of the mountain Adoreus, and running D through Phrygia is joyneth with the river Thymbria near unto Bithynia, and so growing bigger by receiving a double current, keepeth his course through Bithynia, and dischargeth himself into Propontis, a river, not so famous and noble for the greatness thereof, as because it yieldeth fish abundantly to all the nations bordering and dwelling thereupon. When the bridge was finished and the army passed over, as they marched along the bank side, the Galli or Priests of Cybele (the great mother of the gods) were come from Pessinus, and with streamers, insules, and other ornaments, met them: and in their fantastical veries (as men distracted of their wits) seemed to prophesie and foretell, that the goddels vouchsafed the Romans a fair way to war and victory, yea, and the conquest and feignory of that country. Hereat the Consul said: That he accepted their words for a presage of good fortune, and thereupon in that very place he pitched his Tents. The next day he went as far as Gordium: a town verily it is none of the greatest, but more frequented and resorted unto for traffique and merchandise, then usually such dry towns are that stand far within the land. Three seas there be triangle-wise, of equall distance all from it. On the coast toward Sinope, is the bay Helleffore, and the shores of the other tract, whereas the Cicilians inhabit by the sea-side. Moreover, it bordereth upon the confines of many great nations, who for their mutual need and commodity, have commerce of negotiation, and meet together in that one place. This town at that time they found altogether dispeopled, by reason that the inhabitants were fled for fear: but well stored, and full of wares and goods of all sorts. Whiles the Romans lay there encamped, there came Embassadors from Eposognatus, reporting unto them, that he had made a journey to the Princes of the Gauls, but could obtain no reason at their hands: also, that they were dislodged out of the champaign country, had quit their villages and lands in great numbers, and together with their wives and children drive before them, and carried with them whatsoever they could, and were retired to the mount Olympus, from whence they purposed to defend themselves by force of arms, and the strong situation of the place. The Embassadors likewise of the Oroadians, gave more certain intelligence, to wit, That the whole people in general of the Tolistobogians had seized the hill Olympus: that the Tectosages severally by themselves had taken another mountain called Megara: that the Trocmians had committed their wives and children to the guard of the Tectosages, minding with a main army to aid the Tolistobogians. Now at that time the Princes of those three States were Oryago, Combaldus, and Caubras. And the principal reason and means that these had to enter into war, G was this: That being possessed of the highest hills of that country, and having brought thither provision of all things, so service them for a long space, they supposed to weary and wear out the enemies in process of time. For this account they made, that they would never venture to march against them, through so hard, so difficult, and disadvantageous places: and if they assaied so to do, they might be empeached, repulsed back, and bearendown with a small company: again, if they would sit still in league at the foot of those frozen mountains, and do nothing, they were never able to endure the cold and the scarcity which they should find there.
 And

* Woodlesia

And notwithstanding the very altitude and height of the places defended them, yet out and beyond they cast a trench, and made other defences round about the tops of the mountains which they held. Also for provision of darts and other shot, it was the least of all their care, supposing that the rough places would furnish them with sufficient store of stones to sling. The Consul considering in his mind that he should not deal with these enemies close at hand fight, but at a far off when he was to assail their holds, had made provision aforehand of great store of darts, light military javelins, arrows, bullets of lead, and small stones that might be levelled and sent out of slings. Thus being well appointed and furnished with such kind of shot, he led his army toward the mountain Olympus, and about five miles off he encamped. The next day he together with Attalus advanced forward with 500 men of arms to view the nature, and standing of the mountain, together with the situation of the Gauls camp. But the enemies, horsemen being double in number to them, issued out of their camp, and put them to flight, slew a few of them in the rout, and hurt many. The third day he set forward with all his forces to discover the places, and by reason that there came not one of them out of their defences and fortifications, he rode round about the mountain in safety at his pleasure, and perceived that on the South-side, there were certain little hills, all of of clean earth without stones, and the same rising up with an easie ascent to a certain place but to the North were high rocks, and the same in manner steep upright. And whereas another rest were inaccessible three only waies and adventures he found, the one directly toward the midle of the mountain (where those little mounts of earth stood) the other two were difficult the one lying Southeast, and the other Northwest. After he had considered and viewed these places that day he pitched his camp at the very root and foot of the hill. The morrow after he sacrificed, and finding by the first beasts which he killed, that the gods were pacified and favourable unto him, he divided his army into three battailons, and so advanced against the enemy, and himself in person with the greatest part of his forces mounted up the hill, whereas it yielded the easiest ascent. He commanded his brother L. Marcius, from the Southwest to get up the hill, as the place would permit with safety, giving him in charge that if he met with any dangerous places steep and hard of ascent, that he should not wrestle with the difficulties of the ground, nor strive against those things which to force and overcome were impossible; but rather to traverse the ground, and retire toward him, and so to joyn with his battailon. As for C. Helvius he willed him with a third part of the forces to wheel about by little and little, and fetch a compass at the hill foot, and then from the Northwest to mount up. Likewise the aids of Attalus he divided into three equal parts, and took order that the young Prince himself in person should keep with him. The Cavalry and the Elephants he left in the rear down beneath the hills, and charged the Captains thereof to have a carefull eye and good regard to mark what was done in every place, yea and to make haste to relieve and succour wheresoever need should be. The Gauls making full reckoning that on two sides they were sure enough, and the place that way to be inaccessible; because they would stop the other adventure by force of arms on the South side, sent forth about four thousand armed men to seize upon a certain hill within a mile of their camp, which hill commanded the way, supposing there as from a sconce and fortress to debar them of passage. Which when the Romans perceived they put themselves in readiness to fight. A pretty space before the ensignes, marched the skirmishers, together with the Candiot archers and slingers from Attalus; likewise the Triballians of Thrace. The ensignes of the footmen followed lastly after (as well as they might) against the hill, bearing their targets before them so, as they seemed to cover themselves only to avoid the shot and meant not to enter into any fight hand to hand. The fight at first was equally performed with shot a good distance off; for as the Gauls got the advantage of the ground, so the Romans had the odds for variety and store of darts. But as the skirmish continued and increased, there was no more equality seen. For the shields of the Gauls being made long, and not broad enough for their bodies, and withall flat and plain without, hardly covered and defended them; and by this time all their shot was spent; & weapon had they none but their very swords, whereas there was no use at all considering the enemy came not to close fight. The only help they had was with stones, and those too big for their handling, and not easie to wield by reason they were not provided before, but such as in that haste came next to their hand without any choice. Moreover, being not used, and exercised to slinging, they had neither the artificiall sleight, nor yet sufficient strength to help themselves withall; but contrariwise, from all parts were pelted with bullets of lead and galled with arrows & darts at unawares which they could neither ward nor avoid, and for that with anger & fear together their wits & understandings were blinded; they wist not what to do, seeing themselves surprised and overtaken in a kind of fight whereunto they were less of all fitted. For as in close conflict hand to hand, where blows are dealt, where rips are given and taken interchangeably, choier kindleth courage even so when men are wounded aloof with light darts, & from whence they know not they work upon whom to run, fear whom to make in that blind fit of theirs, but they run upon their own fellows without all reason as a venere, like wild beasts galled with arrows sticking in their sides. Now, they receive not a wound but it is seen by reason that they fight naked, and their bodies are so full of slick and whire, as being never bare but in battells by which means, greater store of blood gushes out of the wounds in their fleshy bodies, the gases appear greater, and their white skin much more stained with black blood. But they pisse not so much for broad & wide fleshes (for otherwhiles, when the skin is cut away & the wound rather broad than deep, they take more pride therein, & think they fight with greater honor, & it happen

It happen at any time, that a parrow head or a bulles sticking within the flesh all hidden, pouthen no pain and torment, notwithstanding the hurt be small in appearance, yet when they seek to pluck out an arrow, and the head will not so love, then they take on and are stark mad, for finding that so small a prick should plague them so, and be ready to kill them, inasmuch as they cast themselves on the ground, and lie mallowing along every where. Qthers there be of them that can fall upon their enemy, and those were sicked with arrows and darts from all parts: & when they came near to hand, were by the skirmishers killed and cut in pieces with their swords. These found it convenient to cover themselves with a shield of three foot long, carrying in their right hand certain spears to use aloof, and wear by their side a Spanish sword. Now in case they come to hand fight, they thrust their spear out of their right hand into the left hand and take them to their swords. By this time there were but four of the Gauls left alive: who perceiving that the light armed skirmishers of the enemies were too good for them: & seeing withall the ensignes of the legions to approach near unto them, took them to their heels on all hands, and began to flee again toward the camp, which now was full of fear and trouble, as where women and children and a multitude of feeble folk (not fit to bear arms) were crowded and thronged together. The Romans following the train of their victory, seized the hills abandoned by the enemies that were fled. About the same time L. Manlius and C. Helvius, having mounted in far as they could find way, traversing the sides of the hill, when they were come to an end, where they could see neither way nor path, they went to that quarter of the hill which only afforded a way, and both of them began to follow the Consul's harcaillon a pretty distance under, as if they had agreed beforehand so to do: and that which at first had been simply the best thing to be done, they were of necessity forced at last to put in execution. For in such difficulties and places of disadvantage, soldiers beheld in a rearward, have often times served in right good stead: that is, those in the vanguard should chance to be beaten back, they in the second place might receive and protect them, and also begin freshly a new fight. After that the foremost eagles of the legions were come to those hills: which the light armed before had seized, the Consul commanded the soldiers to rest them awhile and breathe themselves, and if (as he) the light armed skirmishers have made such a riddance of them, what is to be looked for at the hands of the legionary soldiers, armed all over in compleat harness? What will they do that carry the hearts of most noble warriors? Surely they must needs win the camp, in to which the enemy is chased and driven by the light armed soldiers. Howbeit he commanded the light armed to go a foot, who all the while that the legions rested themselves spent not the time in vain, but employed it in gathering together the darts and javelins that lay about the hills, to the end that they might have sufficient shot. Now the Romans marched forward and approached the camp. The Gauls likewise for their parts, fearing lest their defences would not be able to defend them, stood armed before their trench and sumpier. But afterwards being overcharged with all sorts of darts, they were driven in the turning of an hand, within their hold; (for the most they were in number, and the thicker they stood, the less lighted any dart in vain) only they lost strong guards about the gates and entrance into the camp. Moreover, among the multitude which was driven into the hold, there was discharged a random a mighty number of darts: and thus many of them were hurt thereby, appeared by their cry mingled with the shrieks of women and children. Now against them that warded the gates, and took up the arrows with their guards the legionary soldiers in the forefront let fly their javelins. And altho' these were not wounded in their bodies, yet by reason that their shields & bucklers were pierced through, they were most of them entangled one within another and stuck fast. Long they could not abide the violence of the Romans, in so much as before that the victors could enter into the camp, the Gauls fled forth at all the gates wide open, and ran they wist not whither like blind men, as well through places which had no way as those that were passable. No rocks so steep with downfalls, no cliffs so rough with crags, could stand in their way, and nothing feared they efforts: their enemies only at their heels affrighted them. And therefore most of them either fell headlong down a mighty height and brake their necks, or else for very feebleness lost their breath, were windless, and ready to die. The Consul after he had taken their camp, would not suffer it to be ransacked, but commanded the soldiers every one to follow the chase hand and while the enemies were thus affraid, to assaile them thoroughly. Then came the other regiment with L. Manlius, but the Consul would not suffer them to enter the camp, but sent them forth with to pursue the enemies. Himself also in person accompanied the army: for this reckoning and resolution he made, that the war was at a small end, if in this tumultuous fright of theirs he might either kill or take prisoners a number of them. The Consul was no sooner departed, but C. Helvius came with his third regiment, but he could not hold his soldiers from the pillage of the camp, inasmuch as the booty and prizes were most unparallel, and not of the light, or that their fellows had gotten the victory: but afterwards they altho' sparing the Gauls dispersed about the foot of the mountains, made after them as well as their horses would mount against the hills: some they slew, and others they took prisoners. The just number of those that were slain cannot easily be counted, because they fled far and near among the crags and windings of the mountain, where they were killed in blind corners. Many of them besides, having engaged themselves to the crags and rocks that had no way forward, ward, stumbled down into the valleys of a monstrous depth and darkness: Yes, and some hapned to be belied in the woods amidst the thickets & bushes; Claudius, who writeth of two battles fought upon the mount Olympus, reporteth that there died there forty thousand enemies, with Barbarians Adrian, who otherwise is wont to overreach and exceed in number, hath ordered none above ten thousand. But without all question the prisoners amounted to forty thousand full, because they were with a train of all sorts and ages, more like men of ill breeding and removing out of our country into another, than going to war. The Consul, after he had burned all the riches of his the mine in one heap, commanded his soldiers to bring forth the rest of the pillage and spoils into one place, and either sold and made money of that which was to come into the publique treasury of the City, or else parted it amongst the soldiers indifferently, with great regard, that every one should have a just and even portion. Moreover, he commanded them all to open audience, and rewarded every one besides with gifts according to their several merits. But above the rest, and with the general accord of all, he both praised, and also recompensed Anulus. For seeing that young gentleman shewed not only singular valour and forwardness in all brave and dangerous, but also a special modesty and rare sobriety.

There remained yet entire and whole the war with the Tectosages, against whom the Consul made an expedition; upon the third day arrived at Ancyra, a noble City in those parts, from whence the enemies were little more than ten miles distant. During the time that he lay there encamped, there hapned a memorable act, performed by a captive Lady. Among many more prisoners, there fortune'd to be kept in ward, the wife of Orragon, a woman of surpassing beauty. The Centurion who had her person in safe custody, was lecherous and covetous with all as many of these soldiers as. Her he solicited and tempted, first to commit folly; but seeing her altogether unwilling, and that she abhorred to prostitute her self unto him; he did violence upon that body of hers, which fortune had made bond and thrall unto him. But afterwards to mollifie and atwage the indignity of this villany, he put the woman in good hope, and promised that she should return home again to her friends: many he would not do all for pure love alone, and ready without any ransom, for he bargained to have a certain sum of gold blende. And to the end forsooth that no person belonging to him might take knowledge thereof, he permitted her to send one of the prisoners, whom she would herself as messenger to her friends and kinfolk, and appointed a place near unto a river, whither the next night following should repair two, and no more of the said captive Ladies friends, with the gold above said, for to receive her in his hands. It fell out so that among the rest of the captives, committed to his guard, there was a bondslave of her own; this messenger at the striking in of the evening the Centurion conducted without the wall, and sent. The morrow night after came accordingly to the place appointed, both the two friends, a friend of the gentlewoman, and also the Centurion himself with his prisoner, where they shewed the gold, amounting to the full sum of one Attick talent (according as it was agreed between them) and with that the woman spake unto them in her language and commanded them to draw their swords, and kill outright the Centurion as he was weighing the gold; which done, she caused his head to be stricken off, and wrapped it her self within her garments, and so carried it home to her husband Orragon, who from Olympus had fled and escaped to his own house. But before this she clipped and embraced her husband, she threw down the Centurion his head at his feet. And when he wondered what mans head it was, and what at this night he saw passing a womans deed, she confessed to her husband the injury that her body had suffered, and that with the revenge for the abuse of her chastity by force and violence, and (as it is reported) she was satisfied the honour of this matronlike act ever after even to her dying day, in all simplicity of life and modest carriage of herself like a chaste dame.

Whiles the camp lay at Ancyra, the Orators of the Tectosages shewed themselves unto the Consul, requesting him not to dislodge and remove from thence before he had parted with their Lords and Princes: saying withall, that they would accept any conditions of peace whatsoever, rather than war. The time was set down even the next morrow, and a place likewise appointed, as just in the mid way (as it could be guessed) between the camp and Ancyra. The Consul ther came at the hour assigned, accompanied with a guard of five hundred horse, but perceiving no Gauls all there, he returned into the camp. And thither repaired the same Orators unto him the second time, excusing the default, and saying that their Princes could not come in person by occasion of some scruple of conscience that arose the while; howbeit, the chiefest nobles besides of the whole nation should appear, by whom all matters might be composed as well as with themselves. The Consul made answer, that he likewise would send Anulus in his stead. So they came to this comparing from both parts; Anulus had three hundred men of arms about him for his guard, and certain conditions of peace were drawn and propounded: but forasmuch as they might not grow to any final conclusion in the absence of their chief Commanders, it was that the day following the Consul and their Princes aforesaid should meet in that place together. Now the drift of the Gauls in making these delays and trifling off the time, was this, that first they might gain some convenient space to transport over the river Halys all that ever they had (which they would not hazard with their own persons, together with their wives and children) and afterwards to lay a train of an ambush for the Consul himself, who took small regard, and was not provided for to prevent their villany intended under the colour of this conference. For that purpose, they chose a thousand horsemen out of all their cavalry, of especial valour and approved hardi-

A pass for the execution of this treacherous design. And surely this their stand had taken effect, if fortune had not defended and maintained the law of nations, which to break and violate they had plotted. Certain soldiers of the Romans sent out to purvey forage and fuel, were directed to those very quarters, whereas the party aforesaid should be kept. The Colonels thought it the surest place for them, because they were to have the Gauls guard also opposed for their defence against the enemy: howbeit, they set another corps de garde of their own, consisting of 600 horsemen nearer to the camp. Now by reason that Attalus assured the Consul certainly, that their Princes would come, and that the matter might be soon knit up and dispatched, he departed out of the camp with the same guard of horsemen as before, and when he had marched almost five miles forward, and was not far short of the place appointed, he discovered all of a sudden the Gauls riding in full gallop against them in most furious manner as enemies; whereupon he staid the march and made a stand, commanding the horsemen to make ready their weapons and resolve to fight. The first charge and shock he received right valiantly, and stepped not back one foot: but afterwards, as the multitude pressed still upon him, he began to give ground and retreat, but so as he brake not the ranks of his troops. But in the end, when they found more danger in longer stay, than commodity and help in keeping their armies, they all at once turned their horse heads and fled. When they were disarraid once, the Gauls pursued hard and killed them: and no doubt a great part of them had died for it, but that the forragers guard of 600 horse aforesaid came in to rescue them. For they hearing afar off the fearful cry of their fellows, made ready their armor and horses, and being fresh & in heart, entered upon the fight that was given over by their wearied and discomfited companions: whereupon fortune quickly changed, and the fear turned from the losers to the winners: for at the first encounter the Gauls were put to flight: and withall, the said forragers and jewellers came running out of the fields, and from all parts made head and affronted the Gauls: inasmuch as they could neither flee readily nor escape surely, because the Romans with their fresh horses followed them in chase, and they themselves were already tired: few therefore went away with life, and not one was taken prisoner, for the greater part by Sed paid dearly by the loss of their lives, for violating of this their party under the colour of trade and fidelity. The Romans while their stomachs were inflamed with anger, the very next day came against them with the puissance of all their forces. But the Consul employed two whole daies himself in viewing and discovering the situation and nature of the hill, because he would not be ignorant of any thing regarding it. Upon the third day, after he had first taken the auspices and presages of the birds, and afterwards killed a sacrifice, he led forth his army divided into 4 battailions. Two of them were to mount up the midst of the hill & the other two he set in the sides to flank the wings of the Gauls, and to march up against them. The Tectosages and Trocmions, who were the whole flower and strength of the enemies, made their main battel in the midst, consisting of 5000 men; and because there was no use of horse among those rough & uneven rocks, the cavalry alight on foot to the number of 10000, and those they put in the right wing. The Cappadocians with Arivarus, & the auxiliary Morzians who arose to the number almost of 4000 men, held the left. The Consul (like as before in the mount Olympus) marshalled his light armed for skirmish in the forefront of the vanguard, & gave order to have ready at hand as great store of darts & other shot of all sorts as he had before. When they approached one another, all things answered both of the one side & the other, like as in the former conflict: saving that the courage of the victors increased in regard of their fortunate success, & the hearts of the enemies were much abated and danted. For albeit themselves had not yet been soiled & vanquished, yet they took the overthrow & loss of their countrymen for their own. And therefore as the beginning of the battell was suitable to the issue was likewise. For the Gauls battell was overspread & covered again as it were with a clond of light shot. And not one of them durst run forth out of his range, for fear he should discover his whole body & lay it open to take all that came: and keeping still together as they did, the thicker they stood, the fairer mark they were for the enemies to level at, & the more wounds they received. The Consul perceiving they were already of themselves troubled and supposing that if he set forward & presented unto them the ensigns of the legions, they would immediately all of them flee, received the light armed loose shot, & the rest of the auxiliary soldiers within his own ranks and files, and then advanced his legions. The Gauls affrighted with the fresh remembrance of the late defeat and overthrow of the Tolistobogians, carrying also about themselves the darts sticking in their bodies, weary besides with long standing afoot, and overcharged likewise with many a wound, could not abide so much as the onset and shout of the Roman legions. Then began they to take their heels and flee toward their camp, but few of them recovered it, and got within the rampier and other defences. The greater number fled here and there, on both hands, and dispersed themselves into all parts as it took them in the head, and as every man in this confused flight caught a way by himself. The Conquerors followed them still even hard to the very camp, and all the way charged upon their backs and beat them down. Which done, they staid and stuck still in the camp for desire of pillage, and there was not one that followed one foot after. The Gauls in the wings stood to no longer, by reason that it was later ere they were for upon but able they were not to abide the first charge and shot of the Roman darts. The Consul, who could not possibly pluck those out of the camp that were once entered in for greediness of spoiling and sifting the tents, sent out those immediately that were in the wings to follow the enemies in chase still forward. These pursued them a certain space, howbeit in this flight, for in truth it was no fight at all, there were not above eight thou-

land and left their crosses behind them; all the rest recovered the other side of the river. Many of the Romans remained that night within the enemies camp; the rest the Consul brought back again to his own. The next day he took account and survey of the prisoners and spoils which were so great as a man would conceive that a nation of all others most greedy of pillage and spoiling might possibly take and heap together for so many years, as they held in those parts. In the mountain Taurus by force of arms. The Gauls thus scattered in flight, rallied themselves to one place, as being many of them hurt or disabled; and stripped clean out of all they had, sent their ambassadors unto the Consul to treat for peace. The Consul willed them to give attendance upon him at Ephesus: himself made haste to remove out of those cold quarters, by reason that the mountain Taurus was so near (for now it was the midst of Autumn) and led back his victorious army to pass the winter near the sea side.

While the affairs thus passed in Asia, all was quiet in the rest of the Provinces. At Rome the Consuls T. Quintius Flamininus and M. Claudius Marcellus made a new choice of Senators; and P. Scipio Africanus was chosen the President of the Senate now the third time: four only were left out, and discarded; but not one of them had born office of State, and had the honour to sit in the Curule chair. The Consuls showed themselves likewise passing mind in the review of the Cavalry and order of Knighthood. They put out to framing the foundations and ground-works upon the Aquileum in the Capitol: and likewise they bargained for to pave the street with hard stone or pebble from the gate Capena to the Temple of Mars. The Campanians demanded of the Senate, in what place they should be settled and enrolled: and thereupon a decree passed for their enrolment at Rome. The rivers were out, and great deluges hapned that year. The Tyber overflowed his banks twelve times, and drowned Mars field and all the low parts of the City.

After that C. Atilius the Consul had brought the Gauls war to an end in Asia, the other Consul M. Fulvius having utterly subdued the Ætolians, passed over into Cephalonia, and sent to all the Cities about the Island certain messengers, to sound them whether they would rather yield themselves unto the Romans, or hazard the fortune of war? And so for this was fear among them all, that there was not one person refused to surrender. And being enjoined (according to the ability of the people who were but bare) to give hostages, the Nesiores, Cramiens, Peleusians, and Sameans delivered twenty apiece. This peace no sooner shone upon the Cephalonians beyond all their expectation, but suddenly one City of the Sameans revolted, and upon what cause it is not known; themselves alledged and said: That forasmuch as their City was seated in a commodious place they feared greatly to be dispossessed and turned out of it by the Romans. But whether they only imagined this and put themselves in fright, and so changed their quiet and repose for vain and foolish fear, or whether there had been question hereof among the Romans, and upon much canvassing in men's mouths the rumour of such a matter, ran unto them, it is not certainly known. Only thus much after they had given their hostages, they shut their City gates upon a sudden, and desired they would not from their enterprise, for all the entreaty and prayers that their own hostages made, whom the Consul had sent (on purpose) even under their walls, to move their countermen and parents to pity and compassion. When as therefore they would make no answer sending unto peace, the Consul began to assault the City: and all the ordnance of artillery and engines of battery were under his hand, which had been brought from the siege of Ambracia. And look what works and fabricks were needfull besides to be made, the soldiers with great diligence and forwardness performed. So in two places at once they planted rams against the City, and battered the walls. The Sameans on the other side for their part omitted and neglected nothing, that might either annoy the enemy or impeach the works. But two things there were principally wherewith they made resistance and withstand their violence: the one was, a counter-mine within the City, which they ever raised new instead of the old & full as strong as it was, that was demolished and broken down: the other was their often sudden sallies, one while upon the fortifications and fabricks, other whiles upon the corps de guard of the enemies; and for the most part in these skirmishes they had the better hand. But one mean there was devised, and the same of skill shew to speak of, to restrain and keep them in from falling forth. The Romans sent to the Ætolians, Paras, and Dians, for an hundred slingers. These nations from their childhood used to exercise themselves (after the manner of the country) to discharge one of slings into the open sea, certain round stones, which commonly the shore is overspread with among the sands: by reason of which exercise they have more skill both to sling farther from them, and also to strike more surely and give a smarter rap and stroke than those of the Ætolian Islands: for their sling is not made with one only cord as the Balestians are, and those of other nations: but is back three leather thongs hardened and made stiff with many sinews and leames, lest if the leather were soft and gentle, the bullet and stone within should wag to and fro and roll out in the delivery and hurling of it: but being leered and counterpoised (as it were) it went merrily away, and sent and driven out of the noose of a stone-bow. And so well practised they were in this fashion, that they could a great way off level a bullet through garlands, rings, and hoops of small compass, and miss not: nay, they would be sure to hit, not only the head of an enemy, but any part of his face that they aimed at, point blank, and never fail. These slings (it is to be noted) the Sameans so pluck in their hands, that they durst not fall out neither to one nor to holdy as they did. In the night, as from the walls, they requested the Ætolians for a while to go aside, and repose themselves; and let them know they skirmished with the corps de guard of

A of the Romans. Four months space the Romans endured the siege. Now when of that small number which they had, some or other daily drop away, and were either killed outright or wounded, and they that remained, were both tired in body, and daunted in courage: the Romans one night passed over the wall by the fortress which they call Cynus for the City where if both death upon the Sea, both toward the West, and entered so far as the market place. After that the Samians perceived that one part of the City was taken by the enemies, they fled with their wives and children into a greater fortress, and the next day yielded: the Town was ransacked, and they themselves were all sold in open market, to who would give most.

The Consul having set the State of Cephalonia in good order, and put a garrison within Samus, passed into Poloponnisus, having been called and sent for to come thither a long time, principally by the Agiens and Lacedemonians. Time out of mind, and from the first beginning of the Diets of Achaia, the whole nation used to assemble and meet at Argium ordinarily, were it for to graze or honour the City, or because the place was commodious therefore. This ancient custom Philopomen that year began first to infringe, and went about to make a law and ordinance, That in all the Cities of Achaia, their Councils and Diets shall be holden in course and order at their times. And against the coming of the Consul, when the Demulges of the free Cities and States summoned the Diet to be kept at Argium, Philopomen (Pretor for that time) came with a counter-summons and proclaimed it to be held at Argos. And when it was evident to be seen, that they all in manner minded thither to resort; the Consul also (albeit in affection he favoured the Agiens) came to Argos where, after much debate, seeing the matter growing the other way, he desisted from his design and gave over the cause. After this, the Lacedemonians averted him from thence, and drew him away to the deciding of their controversies and dissensions. Certain banished persons they were who most of all disquieted and troubled that State: and many of them had their abiding place in the Castles coasting along the frontiers of the Laconian territory toward the Sea, which was taken wholly from the City. The Lacedemonians much discontented and offended hereat, entered one night a certain borough called Lus, surprised it unawares to the inhabitants, and kept it to their use: to the end, that if need were at any time to send Embassadors to Rome or else whither, they might have some free access unto the Sea: and withal, be served of a mart-Town for sent, and a place of receipt for all forrain merchandise from strangers to their necessary uses. The Townsmen within, as also the exiles aforesaid (there dwelling) were terrified at the first with this sudden and unexpected occurrence: but afterward (before day-light) which they had, once rallied themselves together, with small ado and skirmish chased forth the Lacedemonians: howbeit, the fear spread over all the Sea coast, so that in one general accord, the Castles and Villages every one, yea, and the exiled persons (as many as there inhabited) dispatched their Embassadors to the Achiens. Philopomen their Pretor (who ever from the beginning sided with the cause of the banished, and had always advised and counselled the Achiens to abate and take down the puissance and reputation of the Lacedemonians) granted them at their suit and seeking, a Diet. In which (upon a motion by him made) there passed a decree in this form: That whereas T. Quintus and the Romans, had committed and delivered to the safeguard and protection of the Achiens, the fortresses, burroughs, and villages, situate along the Sea-coast of the Laconians; and (by virtue of a covenant and accord) the Lacedemonians had nothing to do therein; but ought to forbear them: and yet notwithstanding, the Town Lus was by them forced, and a great massacre there committed: therefore unless the principals and accessories both of that outrage, were yielded to the Achiens; they deemed the covenant and accord in that behalf provided, to be broken. Whereupon immediately were Embassadors addressed to Lacedemonia, to challenge and demand the parties aforesaid: but the Lacedemonians took this for so proud a commandment, and thought it such an indignity, that without all doubt, if they had been in good stead, they would have taken arms. But nothing troubled and disquieted their spirits so much as this, for fear lest if once they received the yoke of subjection upon their necks, in yielding obedience to their first demand, Philopomen would perfect and finish execution that which he long intended and went about: even to deliver the City Lacedemonia into the hands of the banished aforesaid. Enraged therefore with choler and anger, they set upon thirty of that faction who were consorted in council with Philopomen and the exiles, and slew them outright: and withal made a decree, To renounce and reject all society with the Achiens; and forthwith to bid their Embassadors to Cephalonia, with commission, to deliver Lacedemonia unto Antistius and the Romans: and to beseech him to take the same in consideration of Philopomen sake, the next receive the City Lacedemonia under the obedience and protection of the people of Rome. When the Embassadors had made relation hereof to the Achiens, presently were proclaimed against the Lacedemonians by common consent of all the States of that assembly, and indeed of mankind: but the winter impeached them for entering in any action, and stayed the execution. So that it they made small roads into their frontiers, and wasted the same not only by hand, but also by Sea, after the manner of robbery and piracy, rather than of warfare: they also troubled the coast of Poloponnisus, and withal committed a Diet war, published the children as Argos; and thus was the Lacedemonians sent for a long and dangerous journey. When there came not only much reasoning and dispute, but also wrangling and quarrelling. The Consul who in other points bore him out in the behalf, and seemed in doubtful things, was willing to declare both parties determined, and ended the conflict in one only word, word, warning them both to put up their swords, and lay arms aside, until they had sent their Embassadors to the Senate of Rome. So there were embassages addressed both from the one and the other to Rome. In likewise the banished Lacedæmonians joined their cause and embassy with the Achæans, Diophanes and Lycortas, both Megapolitans, were the chief in the embassy of the Achæans, who as they jarred and disagreed in the managing of State-affairs, so they accorded not but varied in the speeches that they delivered. Diophanes referred the decision of all matters unto the Senat, as who were best able to compose all controversies between the Achæans and Lacedæmonians. But Lycortas, instructed by Philopamen, required that the Achæans might do and execute whatsoever they had ordained, according to the covenant, and the conditions therein comprised; and that they would maintain their full liberty without abridging and empaing the same, according as they had received it at their hands. The nation of the Achæans in those daies was in great credit and reputation at Rome, howbeit the Senate thought it not good to make any change and alteration in the State of the Lacedæmonians. In conclusion, they returned such an intricate and doubtful answer, that both the Achæans might construe it, as if they had permission and free liberty to do what they would with Lacedæmon, and the Lacedæmonians again took it, as though they had not so large a scope and absolute power allowed them, as to do their pleasure in every thing. But this authority and liberty whatsoever it was, more or less, the Achæans stretched beyond all measure and compass, and used it too proudly and insolently. Philopamen continued still in place of foreign government, and levied a power to be ready in the beginning of the spring, and so encamped upon the frontiers of the Lacedæmonians. This done, he sent his Embassadors to demand the delivery of them into his hands, who were the authors of the revolt; promising withal, that if they would so do, their City should remain in peace without any molestation, and they suffer and sustain no harm, before they had answered for themselves in open audience. All the rest for fear kept silence and said not a word, only they whom he had challenged by name, made offer of themselves to go, under safe conduct received from the Embassadors, and faithful promise that no violence should be done upon their persons, until they had pleaded their answer. Accompanied they were with divers noble personages of great mark and name, both as advocates unto them in their particular quarrels, and also in regard of the Common-weal, as far as their private cause any way touched and concerned it. Never had the Achæans before time brought the Lacedæmonian exiles with them into the confines of Lacedæmon, because they supposed that nothing might so much alienate and estrange the hearts of the whole City as that. But then the whole head, as it were, of the vanguard, were no other but those banished persons. And as the Lacedæmonians a-hovelayd were coming, who should meet and affront them arranged in order of battle at the very gate of the camp, but they? At the first they welcomed them with chiding and railing; after that they fell to bitter words and brails, and their blood was up on both sides, insomuch as those of the banished crew who were of hottest spirit and sharpest metal, made no more ado but ran upon the Lacedæmonians; whereupon they called the Gods to witness, and cried to the Embassadors for protection; who together with the Pretor himself came between, voided the press, and safeguarded the persons of the Lacedæmonians, enpeaching and staying some of their hands who were already about to bind them and make them sure. But the tumult still increased, and the multitude was all up on a hurray. The Achæans ran first to see only what the matter was, and to be lookers on. But afterwards, when the exiles began with a loud voice to cry out, and report what wrongs and injuries they had sustained, beseeching them of their help, and avouching with all right confidently, that if they let slip this opportunity, they should never have the like again, a wedding moreover, that the league first made in the Capitol, after reaped at Olympia, and last of all confirmed by a sacred oath in the Castle of Athens, had been broken and dissolved by them, and therefore the guilty and culpable parties were to be punished accordingly, before they entered into any bond of new accord. At these words the multitude was incensed, and by occasion of one mans voice, who cried to strike and knock them down, fell to flinging stones at them. And by this means seventeen of them, who during the garboil chanced to be tied in bonds, were stoned to death. The rest, to the number of six and thirty, were the next morrow apprehended; whom the Pretor had shielded and protected from violence, not for any desire he had to save their lives; but because he would not have them miscarry and perish before they were heard. These were presented and exposed as a prey to the unruly and angry multitude; and when they had made some small speech unto them, from which they turned away their ears; they were all condemned and delivered over to be led to execution. When the Lacedæmonians were once put in this fear, then they were commanded, Imprimis, To demolish and break down their walls. Item, That all foreign auxiliary soldiers, who were waged and served for pay under the tyrants, should avoid out of the Lacedæmonian country. Item, That all the slaves whom those tyrants had set free (and of such there was a great number) should depart before a certain day; and that it might be lawful for the Achæans to smite the bodies, to sell and carry away as many as staid and remained behind. Item, That they should abolish the laws, ordinances and customs of Lycorgus, and frame themselves to live as the Achæans, for so they should be incorporated into one civil body and better accord and foregather in all things. They consented to none of all these conditions more willingly and sooner, than to the rasing of their walls; and nothing troubled them so much, and vexed their hearts, as the restoring of the banished persons. Howbeit these passed an act at Tegæ for their institution in a general Council of all the Achæans there held,

A In which assembly, upon request and motion made, that the necessary strangers should be sent, and the new enrolled Lacedæmonians, called Agasips, (so to they were called, in the by the Romans) were enfranchised and endowed with freedom, (had abandoned the City, and were departed further into the country, it was thought good before the Army was dissolved and called, that the Praetor should appoint a company, lightly armed and appointed to lay hold upon all that sort of people, and make sale of them, as of spoils and booty gained from the enemy. Many of them were apprehended and sold. And in the money raised of them, that porch or Gallery at Acropolis, which had been raised by the Lacedæmonians, was by the permission of the Romans razed. Likewise the territory of Ullubis, which the Lacedæmonians unjustly held in possession, was laid again to that City, according to an old decree of the Achæans, which was made during the reign of King Philip, son of Amphion. The City of the Lacedæmonians by this was much enfeebled, continued a long time in subjection and thraldom under the Achæans, but their State received damage by no means so much, as by the abolishing of the discipline of Agasips, to which they had been used and accustomed for the space of 700 years.

Presently after the holding of this Diet, wherein the Achæans and Lacedæmonians debated their cause before the Consul, M. Fulvius repaired to Rome (for that this year was almost expired) against the solemn election of new Magistrates: wherein he created his Consuls, M. Fulvius Messala, and C. Brutus Sabinus, and gave the republic to M. Fulvius Brutus his enemy, who that year made suit also to be Consul. This done, there were Praetors also chosen, Q. Marcius Philippus, M. Claudius Marcellus, C. Serrinius, C. Gaius, P. Claudius Pulcher, and L. Manlius Acidinus. When this election was ended, it was thought expedient, that M. Fulvius should return into his former Province to the army there: and the only he but his colleague, C. Marcius, had their commission revived, and they continued in government another year.

C The same year according to the direction of the Decemvirs, there was brought into the Temple of Neptunus the statue of the same God: and within the Capitol were set up by C. Marcius in gold drawing a chariot with this inscription, That he being Consul gave that person, Allo P. Claudius and S. Sulpicius Galba, Adversus Quos; hung up twelve brazen shields, made of the fines that certain corn-hoorders paid, for hoarding up and keeping in their grain. Moreover, Q. Fabius Pileatus an Edile of the Commons, erected two golden images raised of the money that one guilty person was condemned in (for they commenced their actions privately by themselves). As for A. Cecilius his companion, he condemned none. The Roman great games were for forth all

D throughout, thrice: and the Plebeian plays exhibited likewise full and whole, five times.

After this, M. Fulvius Messala and C. Brutus Sabinus, entered their Consulship upon the 15. day of March, and proposed before the Senat as concerning the affairs of the State, touching their Provinces also, and the armies. As for Ætolia and Asia, there was no charge at all. The Consul, by a decree of the Senat had the charge, one of His, together with the Liguans and the other of Gaul: and they were commanded either to agree between themselves, or to cast lots for their Provinces. They were enjoined also to levy new armies, and each of them to enrol two legions, and either of them to charge the allies of the Latine Nation with 4000 foot, and 1000 horsemen. Unto Messala fell the government of Liguria: and to Sabinus of Gaul. After this, the

E Praetors likewise cast lots for their Provinces: the jurisdiction within Rome of citizens was allotted to M. Claudius, and of strangers to P. Claudius. Sicily to Q. Marcius, Sardinia to C. Serrinius, high Spain to L. Manlius, and the low to C. Acidinus. As for the armies, ordained it was, that the legions under the conduct of C. Lælius (should be withdrawn out of Gaul, and made over to M. Titius the Praetor for to serve in the Brutian country. Item, That the forces which were in Sicily should be discharged: and that M. Sempronius the Vice-prefect there, should bring from thence the fleet to Rome. Ordained likewise it was, that either of the Provinces of Spain should have one legion, which at that time served there: and that both the Praetors should for supply levy of the allies three thousand foot, and two hundred horsemen apiece, and transport the same over with them. Now before that these new Governors went to their Provinces, by order from the whole colleges and society of the Decemvirs, there was published a general procession and supplication to be holden for 9 days in all the quarters or cross streets of the City: for that in the day time between the third hour and the fourth, there arose a general darkness which continued almost all that while. Moreover, a Novendial sacrifice was published to be celebrated for 9 days together, because on the Aventine hill it had rained stones.

The Camps, when as the Censors (by virtue of an act of Senat which passed the former year) compelled them to be enrolled in Rome, (for aforesaid they knew not where to be enrolled) made petition now that they might contract marriages and take Roman citizens to their wives: and that who ever had wedded any of them before, might keep them still: and what children soever they had born before that day, should be reputed legitimate and their rightful heirs. Both suits were granted. As concerning the free burgesses of Fornis, Fundani and Arpinum, C. Papius Mutilus a Tribune of the Com. presented a bill, that they might be privileged to give their voices in Rome: for before that time, citizens in deed they were of Rome, (and that was all) for many of them they had none. This bill was crossed and nipped by four other Tribunes, because it was presented without the warrant and approbation of the Senat. But being afterwards better advised and informed, that it appertained to the people and not to the Senat to give their voices where it pleased them, they gave over their enterprise, and opposed themselves the Galatians and their associates, in the good estate and peace as they were before the war began. And if any money or debts be to them due, they may demand and receive the same. If any of the Romans have been taken from them, they shall have good law, and right to teach, buy, demand, and challenge again. And if any of those Cities will not be ruled, be held by these laws, or whom Antiochus hath committed them, he shall withdraw the garisons from thence, and take order that they be furnished accordingly. And he shall pay within five years by even portions 12000 Attick talents of good and lawful silver, provided, that every talent weigh no less than eight pound after Roman pounds, besides 240000 Modii of wheat. And he shall pay unto King Antiochus 250 talents within five years, and for corn according to the rate and proportion of 25 talents. And he shall send unto the Romans 20 hostages, and change them for 20 others every three years, provided, that they be not under 18 years of age, nor above 45. And if any man of the people of Rome begin of their own motion to make war upon King Antiochus, it shall be lawful for him to revenge himself, and use for that means to withstand their violence, yet so, as he hold no City in right of war, nor receive any into amity: and all controversies which shall arise between them, shall be decided by law and justice: or if both parties be so pleased, they shall use the same by force of arms. And it was comprised also within the covenants of this accord, that he should deliver into the Romans hands, Antioch the Carthaginian, Thous the Etolian, Antiochus the Acarnanian, Eubulus likewise and Philo the Chalcidians. Finally, if ought hereafter happened to be added moreover, or changed otherwise, the same in no case to prejudice any thing contained within the covenants aforesaid. To this accord the Consul Sura, and to receive the Kings oath likewise, there went unto him Q. Minutius Terentius and L. Minutius, he who returned at that time to return from the Crodians. And the Consul wrote his letters to Q. Fabius Labeo Admiral of the fleet, presently to come to Parus, and what ships soever of the Kings were there, to hew them in pieces, and make a light fire of them. So he departed from Ephesus, and either brake into fitters or burnt, so covered ships belonging to the King. In the same voyage and exploit he surprised and won Telmessus, by reason that the Townsmen were so affrighted at the sudden coming of the fleet. Then forthwith he departed out of Lycia, and having given order to those that were left behind at Ephesus to follow after, he crossed the Seas (between the Islands) over into Greece. After he had sojournd some few daies at Athens, until the ships from Ephesus were sent into the harbor of Piræus: from thence he brought back his whole armada to Italy. Q. Minutius having received (among other things which were to be yielded up of Antiochus) the Elephants also, and bestowed them all freely upon Eumenes, gave audience to the controversies of many Cities and States, amongst whom (during these changes and alterations) there arose many troubles and much variance. And Ariarathes the King, who by the means and mediation of Eumenes (unto whom about that time he had affianced his daughter in marriage) was discharged and had acquittance for the one moiety of the money imposed upon him, entered into amity with the people of Rome. When the differences of the Cities aforesaid were debated and known, the ten Commissioners set down an order between them, respectively to their condition. To as many as had been tributaries to King Antiochus, and yet sided with the people of Rome in affection, they granted franchise and immunity: but as many as took part with Antiochus, or were tributaries unto King Antiochus, those were commanded to pay their customs and duties to King Eumenes. Moreover, they freed and exempted from all task and tallage (expressly by name) the Colophonians inhabiting Notium, together with the Cymeans and the Mileians. Unto the Chazomenians (over and besides the same freedom) they gave the land Drynisa. To the Mileians also the territory called Sacer: to the Tlians, they annexed Rhateyns and Gergethus, not so much for any fresh and late deserts, as in memorial of their ancient beginning and foundation, which was the cause also that they let Dardanius free. Semblably the Cnians, Smyrneans, and Erythreans, for their singular loyalty and devot which they shewed in that war they not only indowed with fair lands and territories, but also graced with all kind of honor and reputation above the rest. Moreover, the Phocians had both their own lands restored unto them which they enjoyed before the war, and also liberty to live under their ancient laws. As for the Rhodians, they had those things now continued and established unto them, which by a former decree were granted: and to better their estate, Lycia and Caria were bestowed upon them, as far as the River Meander, all save the City Telmessus. Unto the dominion of King Eumenes, they laid Chersoselas in Europe, and Lysimachus, with all the Castles, Villages, and Lands thereto belonging, in as large terms and ample manner as Antiochus held the same: also within Asia, the one and the other Phrygia, as well that which cometh upon Hellespont, as the other which they call the Greater. Moreover, they restored unto him Mysia, which King Prusias had taken from him: over and besides, Lycania, Mylas and Lydia, together with these Cities by special name, Prallus, Ephesus, and Telmessus. As touching Pamphylia, some debate there was between the Agents of Eumenes and the Embassadors for Antiochus, because one part thereof is situate on this side the mount Taurus, and the other lyeth beyond. The decision of this controversy was wholly referred to the judgement of the Senat. Marcus having set down these covenants and decrees, departed with the ten Legates and all his army toward Syria: and when he had caused the Princes of the Gauls thither to repair before him, he dealt with them in what terms, and under what conditions they should entertain peace with Eumenes: & therewith he gave them warning to leave their manner of roving and roving in hostile wise by force of arms, and to contain themselves within the precincts and bounds of their own territories. After this, having gathered into one place all the vessels from the Sea coasts, together with the entire store of King Enneus, which by his brother Aschimus was brought from Elen, he transported all his forces into Europe. From whence he marched through Chersonesus by short & easy journeys, because his army was heavily charged with prizes and booties of all sorts; and encamped at Lyfimachia, purposing there to rest a while, to the end that his travelling beasts of draught and carriage might be fresh and in good heart to pass through Thracia, which was a voyage and journey commonly feared and abhorred. The same day that he dislodged from Lyfimachia, he came to the River which they call Mela, and from thence the next day to Cypsela. When they were past Cypsela, they had for ten miles almost no other way, but through wild woods, narrow freights, and those rough withal and uneven underfoot. For the difficulty of which passage, the army was divided into two parts. The one he commanded to march before, the other to come behind in the reeward a great distance after, and in the midst between, he bestowed the carriages with bag and baggage, and amongst them were waggons and wains, laden with the publick treasure, and other pillage of great price. As he thus marched through the freight pass, there were about 10000 and not above, railed out of four nations of Asia, to wit, the Asians, Carians, Maduarenes, and Cæletes, who beiet the freights to debar them of passage. It was supposed that King Philip of Macedony his hand was herein, and that they entered not into this action without his priuity and fraudulent practice: who as he knew that the Romans could return no other way but by Thracia, so he was aware and wist well enough what a mass of money they carried with them. The Roman General himself was in the vanguard, careful only and troubled about the difficulty of the way. All this while the Thracians sat still and stirred not, until the armed souldiers were passed by. But when they perceived once, that the vanguard was gotten out of the freights, and that the reeward was far enough behind, they fell in hand with the packs and coffers of the carriages; and after they had killed the guards, some of them ranacked and rifled that which was in the waggons, others led away the pack horses and other lumpier beasts with their load and burden on their backs. Hereupon arose a cry and alarm, and was first heard of those that followed, but afterwards of them also in the foreward, & so from both ends they ran to the midst, and at one time in diverse places, skirmished without all order confusedly. The Thracians heavily charged and encumbered with pillage, and most of them without any weapon at all, because they might have the use of their hands more nimble and agile to snatch & catch unto them their prizes, were by this means more exposed to receive hurt, and soon killed. The Romans again were much distressed and annoied through the disadvantage of the ground and the waies, which the barbarous people were well enough acquainted with, and out of them would issue forth to encounter, and otherwhiles lurk within hollow blind caves, and not be seen. The very packs likewise and the waggons, standing and lying unto wardly in the way, sometime of one, and sometime of other (as it hapned) troubled and hindered them much in their fight. So as here in one place lay the thief dead, there in another the true man that pursued him. And according as the plot of ground was good or bad, as well for the one sort as the other, as their hearts and courages served or failed them, and as the number was more or less, so the skirmish and fight was variable: and in one word, of both sides many a man lay in the dust and lost his life. By which time the night approached, and the Thracians departed out of the conflict, not so much to avoid wounds and for fear of death, as for that they had spied themselves sufficiently of prizes. The Roman vanguard encamped without the Forrest in the open ground about the Temple of  Bendis*. The reeward remained still behind in the midst of the woods to guard their carriage, fortified within a double pallado of strong stakes. The morrow after, when they had well discovered by their espials the way before them, they joined themselves with the vanguard. In this battel (over and besides a great part of their pillage lost, and a number of camp-followers and lackies slain, with some souldiers also, for that there was skirmishing every where throughout the chase) there died Q. Minucius Thermus: and a right great loss there was of him, for he was a man of much valour and execution. That day the army marched as far as to the River Hebrus. From whence they passed through the confines of the Anians, neer unto the Temple of Apollo, whom the inhabitants name Zerynthus. And there they met with another freight passage about a place called Tempyra, as rough and cumbersome underfoot as the former. But forasmuch as there were no woods about it, it yielded no good place for ambushes. Howbeit the Thracians (a people likewise of Thrace) assembled together, hoping also to light upon the like booty. But by reason that the vallies lay naked and open, so as if any beiet the narrow waies they might be discovered a far off, the Romans were less afraid and troubled. For, say that they were to fight in some place of disadvantage, yet they might arrange themselves in battel array in open field, and join in close fight hand to hand. Being therefore embattelled in Squadrons thick and strong they charged the enemy with a great shout and cry, and at the first shock forced them to retreat and lose ground, and afterwards to turn back and flee. And in the rout they were beaten down and killed: for even their own freights which they seized for their vantage, empeached and hindered themselves. The Romans having gotten the victory, encamped neer a village of the Maronits, called Sare. The next day they marched through the champaign open countrey Priaticus, where they so journeyed three daies to take in corn, partly from out of the fields of the Maronits, which willingly of themselves they conferred upon them, and partly out of their own ships, which followed after, well furnished with all kind of provision. From this place they made but one daies journey to Apollonia, and so passing through the territory

A of the Abolition, they came to Miletus. All this way they journeyed peaceably through the Colonies of the Greeks. But the sea behind them was no dangerous unto them for any hostility; yet suspected still it was, all the while that they passed night and day through the middle of the Thracians; until at length they came into Macedonia. The same army conducted sometime before by Scipio that very way, found the Thracians more gentle and credible, for no other cause, but that they had less hope of pillage and booty with them to be their flesh on water, and fingers on fishing. And yet even then also (as Cleodius writeth) there were fifteen thousand Thracians that encountered Manlius the Numidian; as he marched before the vanguard to discover the coast; and he saith, that he had in his company four hundred Numidian horsemen, and some few Elephants: also that his son, with an elect wing of a hundred and fifty more, brake through the middle of the enemies, who also within a while after, (when his father Manlius having placed the Elephants in the midst, and the Horsemen in the flanks, joined in battel with his enemies, charged them upon their backs, and put them in great fear) by means of which storm and tempest (as it were) of the Cavalry, they never came so far, as to deal with the battel of the footmen. Cn. Manlius led his army through Macedonia into Thessaly, and marching on by the way of Epirus, arrived at Apollonia, where he abode all winter. For he made not so light a matter of winter failing, that he durst take the Sea, and hazard the passage at that time of the year. The year almost expired, M. Fulvius the Consul returned out of Liguria to Rome, for the creation of new Magistrates, having achieved no such memorable exploit in his Province during the time of his government, as might have yielded any colourable reason of his long stay, in that he came more tardy (than the usual manner was) to the assembly for an election of Consuls: (for holden it was upon the 12th calends of March) wherein were created, M. Aemilius Lepidus and C. Flaminius. The next day after, these Pretors were elected; namely, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Ser. Sulpicius Galba, Q. Terentius Culleo, L. Terentius M. Sulpicius, Q. Fulvius Placcus, and M. Furius Crassipes. After the election of Magistrates the Consul proposed to the Senat as touching the Provinces and governments of the Pretors. And the LL decreed that two of them should remain at Rome, to minister laws and execute justice: other two should be employed out of Italy, in Sicily and Sardinia: two in Italy, to wit, at Tarentum and in Gaul. Immediately before they entered into office, they were enjoyned to cast lots: and Ser. Sulpicius had the jurisdiction of the citizens, and Q. Terentius of Strangers and aliens: L. Terentius took the charge of Sicily, Q. Fulvius of Sardinia, Ap. Claudius was to govern Tarentum, and M. Furius to rule Gaul. It fortuned the same year that L. Manlius Optimus and L. Manlius were delivered to the Carthaginian Embassadors, by the hands of the Fœdial heralds at the commandment of M. Claudius Pretor of the City for the time being, and transported over to Carthage, so that the voice and speech went, That they had beaten the said Embassadors. A bruit and rumour there was of a great war begun in Liguria, & which encreased every day more than other. Whereupon the Senat ordained to both the new Consuls the Province of Liguria that day on which they propounded unto the Senat to consult about the Provinces and the affairs of the Common weal. But Lepidus the Consul opposed himself against this their act and ordinance alledging, "That it was a shameful indignity, that both the Consuls should be shut up and enclosed within the vallies of Liguria; whereas for two years already M. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius had reigned like Kings, the one in Europe, the other in Asia, in stead of Philip and Antiochus. And if (as he saith) be the pleasure of the Senat that there should be armies maintained in those parts, more meet, I wot, it were, that Consuls should have the command & conduct thereof, than those privat persons. As for them, they range about those nations, terrifying them with threats of war against whom there hath been none proclaimed; making merchandice and selling peace amongst them for sums of mony. Now if it be requisite and needful to keep two armies for the government and defence of those Provinces, like as M. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius Consuls, succeeded M. Atilius and L. Scipio Consuls: so C. Livius and M. Valerius the Consuls ought to have succeeded in place of Fulvius and Manlius. At leastwise now, when the Etolian war is finished and brought to an end, Asia recovered and conquered from Antiochus, and the Gauls vanquished and subdued, either ought Consuls to be sent unto their armies, or else the legions to be brought back from thence, and at length delivered to the Common weal. The Senat notwithstanding they gave him the hearing, persisted still in their resolution, that both Consuls should be imploied in the Province of Liguria. Yet thought good it was, that Manlius and Fulvius should leave their Provinces, withdraw their forces from thence, and return to Rome. An old grudge there was and a rankned enmity between the said M. Fulvius, and M. Aemilius the Consul: and among other matters of discontentment, Aemilius gave out, that by the means of Fulvius, himself was created Consul two years later than otherwise he should have been. And therefore to work him despite and make him odious to the World, he caused the Embassadors of Ambraia (whom he had suborned and set on for to lay matters to his charge) to enter into the Senat-house. These being in place, complained that M. Fulvius had waited upon them, at what time as they were in peace, performed all that other Consuls before had imposed upon them, and were also ready in all duty and allegiance to do the same unto him. "First our lands and territories say they were peaceably spoiled and wasted: then were we terrified with the sacking of our City, and threatened with the killing of our people, that for very fear we were forced to shut our gates. "Afterwards we were beleaguered and assaulted, and against us all kinds of hostility practised, "by sword, by fire, by ruining and ransacking our City. Our wives, our children, have been led "and

and led into captivity and bondage of our goods violently taken from us (and this which I have written is not for our heart) our Temples throughout the whole City, despoiled and stripped of their godly ornaments the images of our Gods, and finally our Gods themselves which were of their shew and place, and to carried away; yea, the very walls and pillars left standing naked; for the Ambracians have no Gods remaining amongst them roads, and so much they might make their prayers and supplications; As they poured out their complaints, the Consul of a mind more aggraved and heap more matter upon his adversary, ceased not to propound unto them many interrogatories (as it was plotted between them before) and drew them on to speak many things; as if with thing and will they would both have altered them; When the right of the Law were moved here with the other Consul, Plautius under took the apology in defence of M. Fulvius, saying: That the Ambracians trod in a well beaten way, and did no otherwise than what we before them had done. For even so was M. Manlius accused by the Syracusians, so was Q. Fulvius charged by the Capuans; And why, by the same means suffered they not Q. Quinctius to be charged by King Philip, M. Acilius and L. Scipio by Antiochus, Cn. Mallius by the Gauls, and the same Fulvius himself by the Argolians and people of Cephallenia? That Antiochus was assailed, battered, and forced in the end; that images and ornaments were taken from thence; that other acts were done and committed, which usually follow upon the winning of Towns, think ye my Law, that either I in the behalf of Fulvius will deny, or Fulvius himself will disavow? who, in regard of these worthy exploits and noble acts, is minded to stand as your hands the honor of a Triumph; who purposeth to carry before his triumphant chariot the portraiture of Ambracia as it was taken; the images which they accuse him to have carried away and other spoils of that City; yea, and to set them upon the posts of his house for a memorial to posterity? No reason there is that the Ambracians should sever themselves from the Argolians, and do more than they for their case and condition is alike. And therefore let my colleague the while stand and make, and bewray a feigned enmity in some other cause; or if he will needs follow and pursue this forward, let him therein and keep still his Ambracians unto the coming of M. Fulvius. And for mine own part, I will suffice me as to pass either of the Ambracians on the Argolians, so long as M. Fulvius is absent. Fulvius accused his enemy for having a crafty head of his own, and for his subtle forgeries, as being notorious and well known to all men; for he never saying that full cunningly he would strive out the time, and make debates all the year long, that he might not come to Rome so long as his adversary was Consul. Thus in this debate between the two Consuls two dayes yet spent and nothing else done. And it appeared evidently, that so long as Plautius was in place and presence, nothing could be concluded and determined. Whereupon time was spied out when Plautius chanced to be sick, and by that occasion he was away. It then upon a motion made by Fulvius there passed an act of the Senat, That the Ambracians should have all their goods restored unto them again; that they should enjoy their freedom and franchise, and live under their own Laws; and finally might take what customs, toll and imposts they would for postage, as well by Land as Sea: provided always that the Romans, and their allies the Latins, should be exempted and free there from. As for the images and other ornaments which they complained were taken out of their sacred Temples, the Senat ordained that when M. Fulvius was returned to Rome, the college of the Pontifics should have the hearing and deciding thereof, and look what they awarded and set down, it should stand and be performed accordingly. And the Consul not content with all this, took the vantage when there were but few Senators in the house, and procured an other act of Senat in this form. That they judged Ambracia not to be reputed a City forced by assault. This done, there was by virtue of an order from the Decemvirs a solemn supplication holden three dayes for the health of the people, in regard of a grievous pestilence that dispeopled both City and Countrey. After that the Latins feast and holy dayes were celebrated. When the Consuls had accomplished these devotions, and rid their consciences of scruple, and with all made all and complete levy to furnish legions (for both of them were desirous to have new soldiers) they departed into their Provinces, and called all the old, as to assist in the coming of M. Fulvius to Rome.

After the Consuls were set forward on their journey, the Pro-consul Cn. Manlius returned home to Rome. For whole sake the Pretor Sevius Sulpicius assembled the Senat in the Temple of Bellona. Where after relation made of his deed achieved, he demanded that in consideration thereof, due honor and thanksgiving should be rendered to the immortal Gods, and withal, that himself might ride triumphant into the City. The most part of the Legats and Commissioners, who had been with him gainst and denied the same, and above all the rest L. Furius Purpureus, and L. Emilius Paulus, who stepped forth, and informed against him in these terms: That they had been sent in commission to assist Cn. Manlius, for the making of a peace with Antiochus, and finishing of that accord and those covenants and conditions, which were commenced and begun between him and L. Scipio. Yet Cn. Manlius, say they, endeavored all that ever he could to trouble that peace, and to have surprised and trapped Antiochus by straits of ambush, if he had ever come in his way, or within his reach. But the King being aware of the Consul's fraud and deceit, albeit there was much great means many a time to have caught him by colour of parley, and conference, yet avoided even and never only to have speech and communication with him, but also to come within his sight, in Antiochus Manlius would needs have passed over Taurus, hardly and with much ado could he be kept back, notwithstanding all the commissioners prayed and brought him to Italy; and not so far from himself and in the danger of a notable loss and and overthrow fore-told by the verses and prophecies of Sibyl, as to fight upon them that would pass beyond the bounds limited by the fatal destinies. All this not without having he advanced forward and approached with his army, yet and accompanied near the high pitch and top of the mountain, where all the water that filled from above, run down contrary way into divers Seas. And when he could find no quarter there for which the night water war (because the Kings people and subjects were ill and cold) he turned the army about to the Gallio Greeks, against which nation there was no way intended, either by warrant and authority from Senat, or by grant and commission from the people. And what man was ever so hardy and bold, as to war upon his own head? The wars against Antiochus, Philip, Annibal, and the Carthaginians are most fresh in each mans remembrance: and of all these the Senat was consulted with, and the people granted their ordinance. Embassadors many a time had often were addressed before, restitution and friends were by order demanded: and last of all, heralds were sent solemnly to denounce and proclaim war. Now tell me, Q. Minutius, which of all these things were done: that we may call this by the name of a publick war, allowed by the State of the people of Rome, and not rather a private brigandage and robbery of your own? But contented you your self with this, and did you no more? marched you directly forward, and took you nothing but that which was in your way, leading your army against those only whom you took to be your enemies? or rather battling all things and windings, nay, at every forked high way leading on both hands, when you were a hard, followed not you like a mercenary and wicked Consul unto Antiochus (Minutius, brother) with the Roman army? what hand soever he turned and marched, there was not a bank and no ditch you victed; there was not a tract that you left unsearched, in all Phrygia, Lycaonia, and Phrygia. There was not a tyrant, Prince nor Potentate, there was not a lord of any borough or castle, how far soever out of the way, but you had a saying to them to pill and spoil them, and to pick peace out of their purses. For what business had you with the Orontid-ans? What need you to do with other nations, as innocents and guiltless as they? Now is coming the war, in regard whereof you demand a triumph? in what sort managed your fought you a battle, either in place commodious or time convenient? Surely, I must needs say, great reason you have and good cause, to require that honor and praise be given to the immortal Gods: first for that their gracious will and pleasure was that the army should not fight for the cemetery and riches of their chief leader, wanting as he did against the law of nations; then in that they presented unto us, not men indeed for enemies, but very beasts and no better.

 For ye must not think, that it is the name only of the Gallio Greeks, which is mingled and compounded for long time before, both their bodies and minds have been mist and corrupted, and the men themselves bawdy and degenerate from their first nature. Had they been the same Gauls with whom we have fought a thousand times in Italy, and with doubt full issue, and lost as much as we won, and every foot received as good as we brought, think ye there would have returned a messenger from thence, to bring us news, for any good at least, wise that our General there did? Twice he came to combat with them; twice he encountered them in place of disadvantage, mounting with his army against the hill, and ranged in the horom of the valley, even under the enemies feet: in such sort, that if they had lacked no darts against us from the higher ground, but only come upon us with their naked and disarmed bodies, they had been able to have overcome us and gone over our bellies. And what hapned hereupon? God-amercy the good fortune of the people of Rome: we may thank (I say) the great and terrible name of the Romans. The fresh renown of the late runs and overthrowes of Annibal, Philip and Antiochus, amazed and astonished (as one would say) these men with their so corpulent and mighty bodies, with flings and arrow, that only were they discomfited and put to flight, so affrighted were they. There was not a word once bloudied in all this Gauls war: at the first twang of the bow and ringing of the arrow, they fled away like swarms of bees with ringing of basons. And yet believe me, even we the same and no other (as if fortune would admonish and shew what had become of us if we had affronted an enemy indeed) in our return, when we forsook to light upon certain petty robbers and thieves of Thrace, were soundly beaten, killed, and put to flight, and spoiled and well strip of our bag and baggage. Q. Minutius Thermus by whose death we have sustained a far greater loss, than Q. Fabius had miscaried, whose rashness was the cause of all this calamity and misfortune, with many a tall and valiant man besides lost his life in this affront. Our host bringing away with them the spoil and pillage of Antiochus, was dismembered and parted into three troops: the vanguard in one place, the rereguard in another, and the carriages in a third were fain to take up their lodging one whole night amongst bushes, bri-ars, and brambles, and lay within the caves and dens of wild beasts. Are these the brave and worthy exploits for which you demand a triumph? But say, that you had received in Thrace, neither damage nor dishonor, which be the enemies over whom you would need triumph in all the world? do they be those whom the Senat & people of Rome destined & assigned to be your enemies for to was triumph granted to this L. Scipio here in place: so likewise to that M. Aemilius before him over Antiochus, to also crownde to T. Quinctius for the victory of Philip, and so to conclude unto P. Africanus for subduing Annibal, the Carthaginians, and K. Syphax. And when the Senat had assigned war, yet before they enterprised and began these high and heavy affairs, they made some doubt and pause in such petty circumstances as these, to war, unto whom they "should should find defence and support the said war should be to strike themselves in their own persons or it were sufficient to give assistance in one person or other within their territories.

 And would ye now (my masters) that all these observations and ceremonies should be publicly thank offered that the rights and laws of the Gauls and Gauls should be abouted. It is that there shall be no more Gauls at all. But let religion and divine service (God forgive me) be (as it is to blaspheme) be under such force: Suppose the Gods were miserly forgotten of you and of their remembrance quite ended one of your hearts: Is it your pleasure, also, and think you more than the Senat has consulted so more for their advice in question of war? or that a bill be not proposed to the people, in this wise: Pleaseth it you or no, to ordain that was be levied against the Gauls? The other day, and no longer since, the Gauls were desirous and earnest to govern Greiceland Asia, yet when they perceived you to be resolute and perfit still in fighting against them both, the Province of Lygia, they were content and obeyed. Great reason shall they have therefore to demand a triumph at your hands, after they have achieved so happy a victory and finished that war, which they first enterprised under your assistance and authority.
 After this manner as ye have heard, spake Furius and Camillus. And Manlius again, as we find in the book answered thus, or much to this effect as followeth: "Right honorable is my very good father the Tribunes of the Commons were ever wont afore-time, to repugn and cross them that demanded triumph: and I take my self much beholden unto them for this favour, that either in their love to my self, or in regard of my great and notable exploits, they have not only by their silence given their consent for my honour, but also seem ready and prest to propound the same unto the people, if need had been. But now forsooth, whom have I (and God will) for mine adversaries, but even some of my neighbours or suffragans, whom our ancestors thought good to give unto their Generals in the war, as a counsel both to assist and aid them, and also to counsel and grace them in their victory? L. Furius and L. Camillus are the men and none but they, who inhibit and debar me for mounting up into the triumphal chariot: they are ready to pinch from my head the glorious and honorable crown that I should wear: even those (I say) whom (if the Tribunes had hindered and impeached my triumph) I would have reported my self unto as witnesses of my worthy acts. Certainly, (say I, L.) far be it from me, that I should envy and repine at the honour of any man: but I remember well, that of late daies when certain Tribunes of the Commons (men of great courage and action) went about to stay and forbid the triumph of Q. Fabius Lubus, yet by your authority diverted and scared them from that intended enterprise: and he triumphed in the end, notwithstanding his adversities gave out and said a-hand, not that he had fought a war unjustly, but in a reprochful manner charged him. That he had lost so much as set eye upon the enemy. And I, who have so often in ranged battel fought with him 100000 most fierce and warlike enemies, slain or taken prisoners more than 40000 of them, forced and won two of their camps: and left all places on this side the ridge of the mountain Taurus more peaceable and quiet than is the Land of Italy, am not only frustrate and put aside my triumph, but also stand here before your honours to defend my self against the challenge of these mine own Councel and Suffragans. Which accusation of theirs consisteth (as ye have heard my L.) of two principal points: for objected they have, first, that I ought not at all to have made war with the Gauls: and secondly, that I conducted and managed the same, rashly and without discretion. The Gauls (say they) were no enemies of ours: but being quiet in peace, and ready to do whatsoever they were charged, were by you abused and wronged. I will not require (my L.) that ye should have the same hard conceits of the Gauls which inhabit in Asia, as touching their cruelty and mortal hatred against the Roman name, which ye know generally to be in the people of the Gauls: Do but consider and judge of these Gauls as they be in themselves simply without respect of the infamous name and odious opinion that goeth of the whole generation: O that King Eumenes were here. Would to God that all the States of Asia were present in place, that ye might hear them rather what complaints they would make, than my self accusing of them. Send but your Embassadors to all the Cities of Asia, and enquire whether servitude were greater and more grievous, that which they were delivered from by the chains of Antiochus beyond the mountain Taurus, or this wherewith they are now eased by the subduing of the Gauls? Let them relate unto you, and make report how often their territories have been wasted by them, how many booties have been driven, and prizes carried away out of them, and how they were brought to so low a pass, that they hardly could find means and make any shift to redeem their prisoners by ransom. Let them tell you what they heard there besides, how they killed men, yea, and their children, to sacrifice, unto their Gods. But know ye now from me, that your allies yielded tribute to the Gauls, yea, and should have paid still at this day, notwithstanding they were by you delivered from their subjection under King Antiochus, if I had not bestirred my self the better. For the farther than Antiochus was removed from them the more proudly and outrageously would these Gauls have ruled like I, over all Asia, and whatsoever lands had lien on this side the top of the mount Taurus, you should have laid to the languish of the Gauls and not annexed to your own Empire & dominion. All this is true will some one say, and what of all that? These Gauls likewise once spoiled the temple at Delfos, reported in times past the common Oracle of the whole world and situate in the very heart and midst of the earth.
 & yet the people of Rome neither denounced nor made war for al that. Certainly, I always would have thought there had been some difference to be made between those daies, when your brethren

- A Greecia nor Asia was under your jurisdiction and obedience (that you should need to take care and regard of what was done in those parts) & this present time, in which ye have set the mountain Taurus to be the bound & limit wherunto your Empire extendeth in which you give freedom and immunity to Cities in which ye enlarge the confines of some, and take in the precincts of others, fining these cities with forfeiture & lots of their territories, punishing those with taxes and tributes: in which I say, you augment and diminish realms, give and take away Kingdoms at your good pleasure; and in one word, in which ye judge it a matter that concerneth you, to provide that there may be a general peace both on land and sea. Were you of opinion indeed, that Asia might not be counted free, unless Antiochus had withdrawn his garrisons, which kept quiet within their fortresses and castles, and stirred not forth; and thought you withal, that your gifts granted unto King Eumenes, might be assured unto him, and the freedom likewise of the Cities, established unto them, if whole armies of Gauls might range all about to and fro in those countries? But why stand I so much arguing and reasoning in this manner, as if I had not found the Gauls enemies, but rather caused them to be our enemies? O L. Scipio I call you here to witness, into whose charge and government I succeeded, whose virtue and felicity withal, I besought the immortal Gods to vouchsafe unto me (and my prayer was not in vain;) and you likewise O P. Scipio, who with the Col, your brother and in the whole army, had the room & place indeed of an adjunct Lieutenant and no more, but carried the Majesty of a Colleague & joint companion; speak frankly both of you upon your knowledge, whether whole legions of Gauls served not in the army of Antiochus? Tell us, whether you saw them not in the field, marshalled in both the points and flanks of the main battel, as the very flower and strength of the whole puissance of Antiochus? Say directly, fought ye not with them, slew you them not, & carried away their spoils, as undoubted and lawful enemies? And yet both Senat decreed and people ordained war with Antiochus by name, and not with the Gauls. But I tro (or else I am much deceived) within this decree and ordinance, they included all those besides that came to aid and assist him. Of whom (excepting Antiochus himself, with whom Scipio had articulated peace and alliance, and ye also had expressly given order therefore) they all were our enemies no doubt, who had born arms against us in the quarrel and behalf of the said Antiochus. Now albeit the Gauls above all others were comprised in this number, together with some petty Kings and Tyrants besides; yet I contracted accord and peace with others, (after I had forced them to suffer due punishment according to their deserts) as far forth as I thought it expedient for the honour of your Empire: yes, and I assayed also to gain and win the hearts of the Gauls, if haply it had been possible to have subdued and reclaimed them from their inbred fierceness and natural cruelty. But when I perceived that they were untractable, untamed, and implacable, then and not before I resolved, that it was high time to bridle and bring them into order by violence and force of arms. Now that I have cleared the former point of my accusation, as touching the enterprise of the war, it remaineth that I yeeld you an account of the conduct thereof. Wherein surely I would make no doubt to approve mine innocence, and justify the goodness of my cause, if I were to plead; I say not in the Senat of Rome, but even at the counsel table of Carthage; where (as men say) they make no more ado, but truss up, hang, and crucify their Generals, if they proceed to execution of any service in war with bad advice and counsel, although the issue and event be never so good. But in that City, which therefore useth the name of the Gods both before they begin, and also when they proceed to the managing of all their affairs, (because no person should come to detract or deprave that milicionally, which the Gods have once approved) and which City in the grant & ordinance either of procession or triumph, useth this solemn form of words: For that he hath well and happily administered and managed the weal publick: In this City, I say, if I were unwilling, nay, if I reputed it an odious matter, and favouring too much of pride and arrogance, to vaunt myself and boast of mine own prowess; yet if in regard of the happy success and felicity of my self and mine army, in that without any loss of soldiers, we vanquished and subdued so great and mighty a nation, I demanded first that due honour and thanksgiving should be rendered unto the immortal Gods, and then, that I might myself ascend and mount up the Capitol in triumph, from whence I descended to take my voyage, after I had conceived and pronounced my vows, and made my prayers after the solemn and religious order: would ye deny both me and the immortal Gods, also? Yes, marry would you; and why? Forsooth I fought in a place of disadvantage. But tell me then, I pray you, in what ground I might have fought with better vantage? considering the enemies were seized of the hill, and kept themselves within their strength and fort. I thought have gone unto them, if I had been willing to have vanquished and overcome them. What? how if they had been there within a strong City? how if they had kept within the walls, and would not have issued forth? You must then have laid siege unto them and given the assault. Must I so indeed? And how I pray? Fought M. Acilius (I beseech you) at Thermopylae in a place of advantage? Why? did not F. Quintius after this manner dispose Philip of the high Mountain, which he held over the River Aous? In faith, I cannot yet devise what kind of enemies they either imagine to themselves they were, or would have you to take and esteem them to be. If degenerate, if effeminate, if enervate with the delights and pleasures of Asia; what danger was it to march up the hill against them with all disadvantage? If redoubted and terrible for fierce courage and bodily strength, deny ye triumph for so noble a victory? Envy (my good L.) is blind, and can skill of nothing but to detract and defame virtues, to falsifie and

and corrupt the honors and rewards due thereto. Pardon me I beseech your Honors and hold me excused, if I have been over long and tedious. It is not, I assure you, any delight and pleasure that I take so put forth and glorify my self, but a necessity imposed upon me (in mine own defence, to confute these crimes objected against me) which hath driven mine Oration out in length. To proceed, was it possible also that in Thrace I could make the passes within the forests large and wide, which naturally were straight and narrow? the ground plain and smooth, which by nature was uneven and rugged? Could I make level downs of steep mountains? open champion and fair fields of woodland overgrown, and rough wylds. Lay it in me, so prevent those Thracian thieves that they should not hide themselves within their lurkingholes and ordinary covert thickets? Was it in my power, to impeach them that they might snatch and carry nothing of our baggage? Was I able to warrant that none of our laboring beasts out of so great a number, should be driven and led away from their company? that no person should be hurt? and finally, that Q. Minucius a brave and hardy knight, should not die of his wound? My adversaries press hard and much upon this misfortune, that it was our unlucky hap to lose so worthy a Gentleman: but they never think that if they would say nothing but suppress and conceal all, yet you should know (since the whole army is here present to testify that which I say) That although the enemy assailed us in a narrow streight, in an inconvenient place of great disadvantage, yet both of our battailions at once, as well the vanguard as reeward, compassed the army of the Barbarians busy and occupied in rifling of our carriage, slew many thousands of them that very day, and within few daies after either killed or took prisoners a greater number of them by far. Well, if I had not drawn a sword in Asia, if I had not seen an enemy there, yet I Pro-consul had deserved a triumph well enough for those two battels in Asia. But enough hath been said of these matters, and I am to request you rather (my Lords all) to forgive me for my boldnes, if I have held you longer than my will and desire was.

The accusation that day had prevailed more than his own defence, but that they continued arguing and debating in the Councel-house until it was late in the evening. Then the Senat arose with this mind (as it should seem) to deny him a triumph. The next morrow, the kinsfolke and friends of Cn. Manlius, laboured all that ever they could. Likewise the authority of the ancients stood him in great stead: who said plainly that the precedent could not be found in any histories, That a General who had vanquished his enemies, accomplished the full time of government in his Province, and brought his army back, returned into the City as a private person, without the honor of the triumphal chariot and the laurel garland. The very indignity and shame of this example, surmounted the malice of his adversaries, in so much as the Senators in a frequent assembly granted his triumph.

The remembrance and memory of this debate, was afterwards drowned in a greater contention that arose with a far mightier and more noble personage. For as Valerius Antias hath recorded, the two QQ. Petillii called P. Scipio Africanus into question, and set him down a day peremptorily to make his appearance, and answer for himself. This action divers men construed diversly, according to their severall disposition and affection. Some blamed not so much the Tribuns of the Commons, as the whole City in general, for suffering such an abuse: discoursing in this wise: That the two chiefest States and Common-wealths in the World were become at one time unthankful, but Rome more ungrateful of the reward. For Carthage being subdued, had banished Annibal likewise vanquished: but Rome a victress was about to expulse Africanus a conqueror. Others again reasoned thus: that in no State there ought to be a citizen so pre-eminent and high above the rest, that he might not be under law, and brought to answer unto interrogatories accordingly. And nothing preserveth ifonomy in a City, and maintaineth equal liberty more, than to have the mightiest man to hold up his hand at the bar. For what may be safely committed to any man (and surely the sovereign rule of the State least of all other things) if he be not to yeeld an accompt of the managing of his affairs? And verily, he that can not abide to be equal unto others, to proceed against such a one by rigor and force, is no injustice at all. Thus men commonly talked and centre, until the judicial day came of his personal appearance, and answer to be made. Never was there man known before that day (no, not Scipio himself when he was at the highest, either Consul or Censor) accompanied with a greater train of men of all degrees and qualities, than he that day was conducted unto the common place and court of Pleas as an accused person, there to plead his cause. Being commanded to speak in his own defence, he began his oration without any mention at all of the imputations and matters with which he was charged, and entred into a discourse of the acts by him achieved: and that with such a Majesty and magnificence as it was well known and confessed, that never man was praised either better or more truly than he. For with what courage and mind he achieved those his brave exploits indeed, with the same spirit he delivered them in words. And no man thought him tedious and was weary to hear his speech, because all that he related was for his own defence in this his danger, and not upon vain glory and ostentation. The Tribuns of the Commons his adversaries, when they had laid open certain supposed crimes committed of old, as touching his wastful excess whiles he wintered in Syracusa: as also the riot and outrage of Pleminius which happened at Lerna: they proceeded to charge him by presumption and suspitions, rather than by direct evidences and proofs, for emberling and averting to his proper use certain treasure gotten from King Antiochus and namely that his son being taken prisoner, was rendered unto him without ransom: and that in all other things, Scipio was respected and regarded

A alone had carried the Roman peace and war under his guide. Also that he bare a strong hand over the Consul, more like, I wot, a Dictator and absolute commander, then a Lievtenant and assistant unto him, all the while he was in the provinces. Neither aimed he and shot at any other mark, when he went that journey, but that the same, which long before was notoriously known to Spain, Gaul, Sicily, and Africa might as evidently appeare to Greece, to Asia, and all to the Kings and nations of the East parts, to wit, that he was the only man, he was the chief, the head and pillar of the Roman Empire, that under the shadow of Scipio his wing, that City which is the lady of the world, was covert and protected; that a beck and nod of his head, was as good as all arrests of Senat and helts of people. Thus when they could not touch him in life, nor fasten upon him any note of infamy, they charged him all that ever they could with matter to kindle rage. Thus with orations they spent the time untill night came, and the business was put over to another day: which being come, the Tribunes, only in the times in the morning were set in their power within the Rostra [or common pleading place] the defendant was called, who guarded with a great company of his friends and followers, passed through the midst of the assembly, approached the Rostra and stood just under it. Then after an opus; and silence made: "My Masters (quoth he) you that are Tribunes of the commons, and ye likewise Quirites, my neighbours and citizens of Rome, upon this very day of the month it was that I fought a pight battell against Annibal and the Carthaginians, with right fortunat and happy successe; meet therefore and good reason since it is, that to day all pleas and actions surcreate: I will go directly and immediately from hence to the Capitol and present my self before Jup. Ops. Max. before Juno and Minerva, with all the rest of other gods and goddesses, presidents and patrons of that temple and portresse, to perform my humble duty unto them to talise and thank them, for that they have vouchsafed me that resolute affection and powerfull means with all, both on such a day as this, and also many times besides, to perform my devoir well and truly unto the Commonwealth. As many of you therefore (Quirites) as well may, go ye with me, and pray the gods to send to you like governors to my self, and no worse. If I say (and not else) as you ever think: I was seventeen years of age, even on these mine old daies, you alwaies advanced me to honours before the ordinary time of mine age, so I again advanced and prevented the said honours with good service and noble deeds. This said he departed from the Rostra and ascended up to the Capitol: whereas the whole audience there assembled turned at once and followed Scipio: in so much as at last the scribes and notaries, ye and the very sergeants left the Tribunes there alone, without any to bear them company but their own bondservants and the common cryer, who still from the Rostra called and cried the defendant. Scipio not only visited the temples upon the Capitol hill, but also made a perambulation with the people of Rome throughout the whole city to all the churches and chapels of their gods and goddesses. This was in manner a more solemn day unto him in regard of the affectionate favour of men, and the estimation of his true greatness indeed, then on which he rode into the City in triumph over King Syphax and the Carthaginians. But it was the last fair day that ever he saw: and never shone the sunne in pleasurable upon P. Scipio. For after this, foreseeing envy growing toward him, and what a life and how full of debates he should have with those Tribunes, upon a longer day granted for the procees of law against him, he retired himself apart to Lavinium, of set purpose to make default and not appear to plead his cause any more. He carried a greater spirit with him, his heart was too big, & used he had been to a higher degree of port & honour then to take knowledg what it was to be accused: he could not skill to vail bones and stoop so low, and to abase himself to the abject condition of those that plead for themselves at the bar. Now when the day was come, and that in his absence his name began to be called, P. Scipio answered for him, and alledged sickness to be the cause why he was away. But the Tribunes his accusers, would not admit of that excuse, replying and saying, That upon the same pride of heart, in which he avoided once before, his judicial trial, and Justice Tribunes and the whole assembly, he now also would not appear to make his answer. Even so triumphed he then over the people of Rome, when accompanied with those whom he had taken for prisoners (after he had once taken from them their power and liberty to give them death and doom of him) he frequented himself that day, by way of an insurrection from the Tribunes of the Commons into the Capitol. Well are ye now served therefore (say they) and justly punished for that dauntlessly and rashness. For lo, how he himself now abandoneth you, who was your motive and leader then, to forsake us. See how every day more then other our courage is fallen and heart abused: and dare not we now send folk to fetch him (a privat person and no more) out out of his farm and house in the country, and make him to appear and plead his answer, unto whom not past 7 years ago, at what time as he was General of an army on land, & Admirall of the Armado by sea, we were so bold as to send Tribunes of the Commons, to fetch him away with them to Rome? In the end, whereof the Tribunes of the Commons being called earnestly unto by P. Scipio for their lawfull favour, set down his order of conclusion, that if sickness were alledged for his excuse, and that there were nothing else but that occasioned his absence, it should be received for good & lawfull, and their colleagues should adjourn the trial to a farther day. It fortuned at that time that Tib. Sempronius Gracchus was one of the Tribunes, between whom & P. Scipio there was some quarrel. He forbade expressly that his own name should be subscribed to the instrument of the aforesaid decree of his colleagues. And when every man looked to hear some heavier sentence denounced against Scipio, he awarded in this manner, "For as much as L. Scipio excuseth the absence of his brother by sickness, it is good "and sufficient in my opinion. And more then that, I will not for my part suffer P. Scipio to be ac"cused before he return again to Rome. Yea, and then also, if he call for my helping, and I will "give him assistance, and stop the course of proceed against him. And as to the main point of "the cause, this is my resolution, that P. Scipio being advanced so highly as he is to that pitch of "honor, by his noble and famous exploits, and by the dignities received at the hands of the peo"ple of Rome, as if both gods and men had consented to let him aloft, for him to come down

 "now and stand pleading below at the bar beneath the Rostra, and there to have his ears glow
 "and ring again with the checks and taunts of certain green heads and busy youths, were a grea"ter shame and disgrace to the people of Rome, then to himself. Nay, he staid not thus with "this bare sword, but sealed and set it on surely with words of indignation, testifying his discon-
 "tentment for this course and manner of proceeding. And shall Scipio (quoth he, my master Ti"burtius) that renounced conqueror of Africa, stand under your feet at your devotion? Defeated
 "he and put to flight in Spain 4 most brave and noble Generals of the Carthaginians, with their 4 "entire armies? Took he Syphax prisoner, vanquished he Annibal, subdued he Carthage and "made it tributary unto us? Chased he Antiochus beyond the mountain Taurus, (for it must be "confessed, that in this glorious conquest L. Scipio had his brother copartner with him) and all
 "for this, to be troden under foot of two Publii? And that ye should seek to triumph over P. A-"fricanus? Will it never be better? Shall great personages (with all the good deserts of their own
 "for all the dignities and honors by you upon them conferred) never reach and attain to a strong
 "fort and sure place of defence, wherein they may make account to be safe and past all danger, K
 "and wherein their old age may rest and repose, if not with worship and honour, yet at least with "insecurity, exempt from abuse and violent outrage? The sentence it self of Gracchus (enforced "with such a speech especially) moved not others only, but also the very accusers themselves; who "made no other rejoinder again but thus, That they would consider better what they might
 "by their place and what they ought of duty to do. When the assembly of the people was
 "was broken up, the LL. of the Senat began to sit in counsell; where, the whole order of the Sena"tors (but principally the ancients and as many as had been Consuls) highly commended and "thanked Tib. Gracchus, for that he had preferred the weal-publick, before private grudges and "particular quarrels. But the Publii were well spent and baited with reproachfull checks and bit"ter rebukes, in that they would seem to rise by the fall of another, and so grace themselves with L
 "the disgrace of Africanus, and seek to triumph over him and be enriched with his spoils. Well af"ter that, there was no more words of Scipio Africanus. The rest of his life he passed at Livornum
 "and never had mind to come to the City: there ended he his daies in a country village; and (as "they say) he charged his executors upon his death-bed, to inter him in that very place. And there
 "his tomb or monument was built, because he would not that so much, as his funeral obsequies "should be performed at Rome, (his native country) to unthankfull, as it was. A rare man he was
 "and worthy to be recommended to the memory of all posterity: howbeit the former part of his "life was more singular and memorable, as well for the conduct of martiall exploits in war, as the "governance of civill affairs in peace; then in his latter daies. For in his youth, he followed the "wars continually; whereas in his old age, as his body decayed and faded, so what (ever he did, M
 "lost much of the wanted beauty and lustre. Besides, there was no matter presented, to employ "that wit and spirit of his. What odds was there between his former Consulship and the second, al"though ye put his Censorship to it in the ballance? What comparison was there, and what
 "semblable thing in that lieutenantancy of his in Africa of so little or no employment was it by reason "of his own sickliness; and blemished withall, by the occasion of the misfortune of his son. And "afterward, his return home again was no lesse unfortunate, for the hard choice whereunto he was "driven, forced of necessity to abide the trial of a doubtfull issue in judgment, to quit withall his "native City for ever. Howbeit he alone went away with the honor above all other, of finishing "the punick war, as great and dangerous to the Romans as any that ever they made.

When Africanus was once dead and his head laid, his adversaries and enemies were aloft: of "whom, M. Porcius Cato was the chief and principall: a man who was wont to bark (as it were)
 "and rail against him during his life in regard of his greatness. And it is thought, that the Publii
 "were set on by him, and procured through his persuasion, both in the life of Africanus to have "drawn out, and after his death to have preferred a bill in this form and manner following: May "it please you to grant and ordein, that true search and diligent enquiry be made, what sums of "mony were taken in prize, carried away, and levied away of King Antiochus and those which "were under his obedience and dominion; and that of as much thereof as came not into the pub"lick treasury and chamber of the City, Serv. Sulpicius (the Pretor of the City) may propose unto "the Senat, to know their advice and pleasure touching it: that whomsoever of all the Pretors, O
 "for the time now being, it shall please the Senat to appoint, he may sit in commission and inqui"sition thereof. This bill was first crossed by Q. and Lucius Mammian, who thought it meet and
 "reason, that the Senat alone (as at all times heretofore) should make due enquiry of the monies so "purloined and embezzled: as is aforesaid, and not brought into the common chest of the City. The "Publii charged the Scipios for being over great and mighty, and as it were KK in the Senat, to cary
 "all before them. L. Furius Purpureo (a man that had been Consul, and one of the ten commission"ers in Africa, was of opinion, that the forsaide enquiry should be granted in more large & ample terms, "namely,

A namely, as touching the money not only taken from Antiochus, but also from other Kings and nations: covertly taxing hereby Cn. Marcius his old enemy. L. Scipio on the other side stood forth to disprove this matter: albeit it was thought he would rather speak in defence of himself, than against the thing. He complained much and shewed his grievance, that such a bill as this should come forth now, and be set on foot after the death of his brother Africanus, the most valiant knight and noblest personage that ever was. As if it were not sufficient, that P. Africanus wanted the solemn Panegyrick oration at the Rostra after his death, but he must be accused also. Why? the very Carthaginians are contented with the exile of Annibal, and seek no more: but the people of Rome is not satisfied even with the death of Scipio, unless both his own good name after he is buried be wounded and mangled, and his brother also (to fill up the measure of mens malice and hatred) be killed and sacrificed upon his tomb. M. Cato spake in the behalf of the bill, and perswaded that it might passe. His oration as touching the treasure of King Antiochus, it extant to be seen: and by the majesty of his authority, he diverted the two Publii Tribunes of the Commons, clean away, from interposing themselves any more. When they once had renounced and given over their negative, all the tribes in general passed their voices affirmatively, Pro rogatio. After this, Sex. Sulpicius proposed unto the Senat, Whom they would appoint for this enquest according to the act Peritia? and the L.L. of the Senat deputed Q. Terentius Calles. This Pretor was so great a friend to the house of the Cornelii, that some authors, namely those, who report how P. Scipio both died and also was carried forth to be entered at Rome (for that bruit also runneth current) have written, How he went at his funeralles before the bier and the mourners, with a cap of liberty on his head, like as he had done before in his triumph, and gave sweet wine or meade to all those that attended the convey, as far as to the gate Capena. This honour he did Scipio at his death, for that among other prisoners in Africa, he was by his means recovered out of the enemies hand. But it should seem rather, that he was such an enemy to that family, that for the cankred rancour and malice which he carried against that name, he was by the adverse faction of the Scipios, chosen especially of purpose to sit upon & execute that inquisition. But certain it is, before this Pretor (all in his extremities, who either in love & friendship, or in hatred and enmity, kept no mean) information was given immediately against L. Scipio. Presentments were made likewise, and the names received of his lieutenants A. Hostilius and L. Hostilius both Cases: and of his treasurer besides, C. Furius Aulus. And so the case that it should appear to the world, that they were all authors of this crime of purloining and robbing the publick treasure of the common-wealth in one complot, there were two secretaries also and one of his sergeants called into question. But these three last mentioned, and L. Hostilius before named, were found unguilty and acquit, before Scipio had his judiciall trial: howbeit Scipio and A. Hostilius his lieutenant, together with C. Furius were condemned. Scipio, for that he (as Plutarchus Antonius writeth) to make a more easie peace to the contentment of Antiochus, received 6000 pound weight of gold, and 480 pound weight of silver more then he brought into the City chamber. A. Hostilius, for that he likewise detained eighty pound weight of gold, and 483 pound of silver: and Furius the Quæstor for keeping back to his own use 130 pound of gold, and two hundred of silver. These sums I set down of gold and silver, as I find them gathered and registred by Valerius Antonius in his Chronicle. As for the sum of gold and silver, which L. Scipio should embezzle, I would rather think that the clerk or secretary faulted with his pen in writing the copies, then the author lied so loud with his tongue in the first printing of the Original. For it is more likely of the twaine, that the weight of the silver was more then of gold. As also for the fine wherein he was condemned, should amount but to forty thousand Sesterces, then arise to two hundred and forty thousand. And I am rather induced thus to calculate, because it is said that P. Scipio himself was required in the Senat to give his account but of such a sum: and when he had bidden his brother L. to fetch him that book of accounts, he took it of him, and there before the Senat, rare and rare in with his own hands, with indignation, that having brought into the Treasury two millions of Sesterces, he was called to his account for forty thousand. In which confident boldness of spirit and courage, when the Quæstors durst not against the order of law take forth money out of the Treasury, he called for the keys, and said he would be so bold as to open the chests of the Treasury since he was the cause that they were locked. Many things besides are diversly reported of Scipio, especially as touching the latter end of his life, his trouble and accusation, his death, his funeral, and last of all, of his sepulchre and tomb, which distract me so, that I wot not what report to cleave unto, nor which records to believe. For they accord not as concerning his accuser. Some write it was M. Nevius, others affirm that they were the Publii, that called him to answer. Neither agree they in the time when he was troubled, nor in the year, no, nor the place wherein he died, nor yet where he was entered. Some affirm he ended his daies and was buried at Ardea, others at Lutetia. And in both places there are monuments and Statues of him to be seen. For of Lutetia there stood a tomb, and over the same tomb an image of his sepulchre erected, which of late time we our selves saw overthrow in a tempest. At Rome likewise without the gate Capena, there be three images upon the monument of the Scipios, whereof two are said to be of P. and L. Scipio, and the third of Q. Emilius the Poet. And this difference among authors is not touching his facts and actions only, but also about the very Orations (if so be they were the orations indeed of P. Scipio & Tiberius Gracchus, which are commonly so taken and carried about, which disagree so much as they do. For the title of the oration that goeth for P. Scipio, hath the name of M. Nevius, a Tribune of the Commons: but through the whole

* Sesteris, is the fourth part of a Roman denarius, three halfpence farthing cue.

Orators it self there is no mention at all of that accusers. He termeth him one while Nebulo [Knave] and another while Nugator [Confiner.] In like sort the oration of Gracchus maketh no mention at all either of the Perulis, the accusers of Africanus, or of the day assigned unto him for his answer. And we must devise to tell the whole tale otherwise, it would have it to agree with the oration of Gracchus; and follow we must those authors; who write, that when L. Scipio was accused and condemned for taking bribes of King Antiochus, his brother Africanus was Ambassador in Taicany; and upon the news of his brothers misfortune, left his embassy and made hast to Rome. Where he took his way directly from the gate to the common place (for that it was told him how his brother was going to prison) and thrust the sergeant from his body, yea, and when the Tribunes themselves would have restrained him, he used violence against them, and carried himself in this action so, as he shewed more kindness and love to his brother, then manners and civility otherwise. For thus complaineth Gracchus in his oration, that the Tribunes authority and power was infringed and broken by a privat person. And in the latter end, when he promised to visit L. Scipio, he knit up his speech with these words, that it was a thing more tolerable that both the Tribunitian puissance and the Common-weal should seem overcome and surmounted by Tribunes themselves, then by a privat man. But he aggravated and enforced this one violence and excessive outrage against him, and made it odious in such sort, that in blaming him for so much overshooting himself and degenerating as it were from his own nature, he rehearsed the commendable parts of his moderation and temperat carriage of himself aforetime, and that in so good terms and ample manner, that thereby he made him some part of amends for the sharp reprehension he used for the present. For he said, that in times past he had rebuked and reproved the people, when they would have made him a perpetuall Consul and Dictator; that he had forbidden expressly, that any of his Statues in triumphant habit, should be set up and erected in the publick places of assemblies, as in the Comitium and Curia, in the Capitoll and chappell of Jupiter Op. Max. These commendable reports of him, if they were uttered in an oration penned of purpose for his praise, must needs testifie and shew a wonderful magnanimity of his, in the moderate use of high honours according to a civil port; which an enemy by way of reproach and upbraiding him, acknowledgeth and confesseth. But all writers accord, that Gracchus, took to wife the younger of his two daughters (for the elder without all question was affianced and given in marriage by his father to P. Cornelius Nasica. But it is not so certainly agreed upon, whether she was both betrothed and wedded alownto him, after her fathers death or no. As also, whether it be true (as it is reported) that when L. Scipio was a leading to prison, Gracchus, seeing none of his own fellow Tribunes to succour and release him, swore a great oath and protested that he was an enemy still to the Scipios as much as ever he was, and would not do any thing to curry favour with them, or to come into their grace, yet could he never endure that he should be carried to that prison, into which he had seen his brother Africanus lead Kings, great generals and commanders of armies, captive. Moreover, that the same day the Senat fortified to be at supper together in the Capitoll, and arose up all at once, and requested Africanus to affiance his daughter to Gracchus, before the supper and banquet was ended. Which espousals being performed with all due complements accordingly, during the time of that solemn feast, Scipio, when he was returned home to his house, said unto his wife Emilia, that he had fianced and bestowed his daughter upon an husband. She then falling into a fit of choler like a woman, and chafing that he had not made her acquainted with the matter, and taken her advice touching the maiden, who was as much her child as his, brake out into these words withall, that if he had given her in marriage to Tiberius Gracchus, yet good reason it was that the mother should have been at the making of the bargain. Whereupon Scipio took great contentment and joy at this conformity of judgment in the choice, and inferred straightwaies, that he was the man to whom she was espoused. Thus much I thought good to relate of this worthy and noble person, albeit there is great variety of opinions, and diversity of writings in that behalf.

After the Pretor Q. Terentius, had finished the inquisition and whole process thereof, Hastilius and Furius, who were attaint and condemned, that very day put in sufficient sureties to be bound in recognisance to the treasurers of the City, for the payment of their fines. But Scipio debating the matter still, & pleading that all the money which he had received was in the City chamber, & that he had perloined none of the publick treasure, was laid hold on to be had away and committed to prison. P. Scipio Nasica called unto the Tribunes for their help, and made a speech full of true praises and commendations, not in generall only of the whole name and family of the Cornelii, but in particular also of his own house. And namely he alledged and said, That himself and P. Africanus, together with L. Scipio (who now was going to prison) had to their fathers C. Scipio and P. Scipio, most noble and famous personages; those who for certain yeers in the land of Spain, advanced the renown and glory of the Roman name, manere the heads of many captains & armies, as well of Carthaginians as Spaniards, not only in martial feats of war, but also in this especially, that they had given testimony and proof unto those nations, of the temperate government, & faithful dealing of the Romans: and in the end both of them spent their blood and lost their lives in the quarrel of the people of Rome. And albeit it had been sufficient for all their posterity to maintein only & uphold the glory from them received, yet P. Africanus so far surpassed the praise worthy acts of his father, that it was verily beleaved he was not born of human blood, but descended from some divine and heavenly race of the gods. As for L. Scipio, who now is in trouble, to say nothing of his worthy acts which he achieved in Spain and in Africa, when he

- A "was lieutenant there to his brother Consul) he was both repaid by the Senat sufficient, with
 "out any calling of lots, to undertake the province of Africa, and the same year King Antiochus,
 "and also esteemed by his brother Scipio as to worthy a person, that himself who had been Con"sul twice, Censor once, and had ridden in triumph, thought it no scorn to accompany him into "Africa in quality of his lieutenant. In which province to the end that the greatest respect of "glory of the lieutenant should not dim the brightness of the Consul, and to give him his virtues and "good parts) it so fell out, that the very same day, on which L. Scipio was quitted, Antiochus
 "near Magnesia, P. Scipio lay sick at Elaea, a City distant certain daies journey. He defeated I say "an army there, nothing inferior to that of Antiochus, with whom his brother had encountered be"fore in Africa. In which battell among other great commanders and captains under the King, B "Antiochus was himself imployed in person, even he who had been the grand General in the Pu-"nick war. Which service was so well conducted and managed, that a man possibly could not "find fault so much as with fortune, or any accident that hapned there. And now when the war "is unblamable, there is picked matter of crimination in the peace: and it (they say) was bought "and sold for money. In which challenge the ten deputies and assistance in council, are also touch"ed and noted with corruption, by whose advice the said peace was granted and concluded. Well,
 "of those ten, there were some that stepped forth and accused Cn. Manlius: yet to far off was "that accusation of theirs from being credited, that it did not so much as hinder and delay the ve"ry time of his triumph. But (believe me) in Scipio his case, the very conditions of peace favour "strongly of bribery and indirect dealing, for that they are advantageous, respective & favorable on C "part of Antiochus. For his kingdom is left entire and whole unto him: and that he is vanquish-
 "ed, he possesseth as much as before the war began; and Scipio having received from him a mighty "masse of gold and silver, hath brought nothing into the common treasury, but averted all from "thence, and converted it to his proper use. Why? was there not carried in pomp at the triumph of
 "L. Scipio (in the very sight of all men) as much gold and silver, as in ten triumphs before (and put "them all together) could not be shewed. For what should I speak of the confines and frontiers of "his realm? Namely, that Antiochus beforetime held under his dominion all Africa, and the marches
 "also of Europe adjoining? & great a part of the world that is, which extendeth from the hill Tan-
 "nus, and lyeth out so far as the Egean sea; how many nor Cities only, but spacious countries "and populous nations it containeth, all men know right well: as also that this contrary bearing D "out in length more then 30 daies journey, and in breadth between two seas ten daies journey, "even as far as to the top of the mountain Taurus, is taken from Antiochus; & he driven into the "utmost angle and corner of the globe of the earth? What could he have been diseized of more
 "in case his peace had cost him never a penny of money? When Philip was conquered, he had
 "Macedony left unto him; when Nabis was subdued, he enjoyed still Dardaniens: and no man "ever went about to call Quintus in question for it. And why? may he had not to his brother
 "Scipio Africanus, for whole sake the envy and malice of men hath defiled and hurt L. Scipio, "whereas his brother's glory ought to have graced and helped him. Would any man of sense and "reason judg, that so much gold and silver was brought into the house of L. Scipio, as may not "not possibly be raised, if all the goods he hath were sold to the world? What should become of E "all that gold of the Kings? Where be those great purchases of lordships and inheritances that "he hath made therewith? Certainly it cannot be, but in that house that hath not exceeded in "superfluous expence, there should be seen some heap and mount of this new treasure. But what "care his enemies for this? That which cannot be made of the substance and goods of L. Scipio
 "they will make good on his body and back; which they mean to torture (belike) and expose
 "to contumely & villany, to the end that a man of the best mark and quality that ever was, should "be shut up in a dungeon among robbers, by the high way side, amongst night thieves and cut"purses, and there in the hard stocks and balefull darkness render his last breath; and when he is "dead, to have his body cast out naked at the prison door. But be it what it will, this will "be no greater blot to the house Cornelia, then a shamefull reproach for ever to the City of F Rome. Against all these remonstrances, the Pretor Terentius opposed and read the law Porcia, the "decree of the Senat, and the sentence given of L. Scipio, and he for his own part said, he could not "do withall, but if the sum wherein he was condemned, were not brought into the common "Treasurehouse, he knew no other remedy, nor what else to do, but to condemn him (a condemned "person) to be apprehended again, and led away to prison. Then the Tribunes went apart to con"sult and lay their heads together. And within a while after C. Plautius pronounced aloud, ac"cording to his own advice and the opinion of all his Collegues (excepting only Gracchus) that the "Tribunes would not interpose themselves, but that the Pretor might do and execute his office and "his authority to the full. But T. Gracchus did so, he did decree in this form, That to touch-G "ing the sum wherein L. Scipio was condemned, he would not be against it, nor impeach the Pre-
 "tor, but that he might use his power according to his place, and take out of his goods as far as "they would extend. But that L. Scipio who hath subdued the mightiest and most puissant monarch
 "in all the world, who hath drawn out and extended the bounds of the Roman Empire, as far as the "farthest frontiers of the earth; who hath obliged and bound King Antiochus, the Rodians & so ma"ny Cities and States besides of Africa, and made them belonging to the people of Rome for favours
 "and benefits bestowed upon them; finally, who hath himself laid up full in prison many a General
 "captain over the enemies, after he led them in triumph, that he L. Scipio should lie in prison or iron among the enemies of the people of Rome he would never suffer: and therefore he commanded him to be released and set at large. This decree was heard with so great applause, and all men were so jealous to see L. Scipio delivered, that hardly a man would have believed (unless he had seen it) that there had been such a judgement passed in the same City. Then the Pretors sent the Quæstors or Treasurers to enter and seize upon all the goods of L. Scipio, in the name and to the use of the City: whereof there was not to be found, so much as any one token or mention of the Kings money, no, nor so great a sum could be raised, as the time came to wherein he was condemned. The friends, kinsfolks, followers, and wellwillers of L. Scipio, made such a contribution of money for him, that if he would have accepted of it, he had been a richer man by odds, than before this cross and calamitie fell upon him. But he took never a denier. His nearest kinsmen in blood bought again and redeemed as much of his own goods, as served for his necessary maintenance and so more. And the envy and hatred of men intended against the Scipios, turned upon the heads of the Pretor and his counsell, together with the accusers themselves.

Marcus Emilius the Consul after he had subdued the Ligurians, made the street or high way from Pleisance to Ariminum, untill it met with the way Flaminia. In this book are recounted the beginnings of virtue and dissolute life brought in by the Asian army. All the Ligurians on this side Appennine were tamed and brought under. The Bacchanales (a Greekish feast and celebrated in the night seasons, the very seminary and nurse-garden of all wickedness, being grown to this enormity, that therein was contrived a conspiracy and compact of a mighty multitude) were now visited and searched out by the Consul, and put down with the punishment of many persons. L. Quinctius Flamininus, the brother of T. Quinctius, was deprived of his Senators dignity by the Censors, so was L. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Porcius Cato, a right excellent man, as well for feats of arms as peace. The cause was this, for that whilst he was Consul and governor in Gaul, at the request of one Philippus Ptolemy, a certain nation Garmade whom he taught, he slew a certain Gaul with his own hand: or, as some have written, because as the entry of an host, upon whom he was encountered, he beheaded one of them that were enemies. The invective oration of L. Cato against him is extant. Scipio departed this life at Lintorum, and (as fortune would have his funeral accompanied with the death at the same time of two best renowned and great personages) Annibal poisoned himself, by occasion that Brutius King of Bithynia (unto whom he was fled for succour, after the defeat of King Antiochus) would have yielded him into the hands of the Romans, who had sent of purpose T. Quinctius Flamininus to demand him. Likewise Philip athen the General of the Achæans, an excellent man, was poisoned by the Assenians, who took him prisoner in war. Colonies were sent to Pollentia, Pisaurum, Munia and Batuna. Over and besides, this book containeth the prosperous affairs against the Celtiberians, also the beginning and cause of the Macedonian war, whereof the original spring arose from Philip, much discontented, that his Kingdom was impaired by the Romans, in regard that he was forced by them to withdraw his garrisons out of Thracia, and other parts.

The nine and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

During the time that these affairs passed at Rome (it was the year wherein they begun) both Consuls made war against the Ligurians, a nation born as it were, to maintain the military discipline of the Romans, and to find them occupied in all times of respite and rest from greater wars: neither was there any other province that gave a sharper edge to the valour of the soldiers. For, As with the beauty of their Cities, the abundance of all commodities as well by sea as land, the affeminate tenderness of the enemies, and the robbry of the Kings riches, had made their armies more wealthy then valiant: and especially under the government of Cannus. Maximus noted they were in much looseness and negligence. And therefore on it was that finding the way in Thracia more rough and difficult then ordinary to travel in, and an enemy better practised and exercised to deal withall, they received a greater and loss amongst them. Now in Liguria, they met with all things that might rouse and awake sleepy soldiers: the country rough and full of mountains, that much add they had themselves to seize the same, and against a labour they found to discomfit the enemies, that were before possessed of them: the waies steep up hill, narrow, and dangerous for ambushes: the enemy light, swift, nimble, and suddenly falling upon them, giving no time of rest, no place of repose and security. Therefore they were of necessity to assault strong and fortified Castles, with great difficulty and danger both: the country poor and needy, which caused the soldiers to spare and live hardily, and afforded them an opportunity of prey and prizes: and therefore no victuals, less horse, could be bought and lacked followed the camp: neither the labouring beasts for carriage took up a length in their march: nothing there, but armour and men, reposing all hope in their

their arms, and nothing else. And never wanted they more than to be privately and some occasion or other to make war: for by occasion of their barrenness and poverty they made roades into the lands of their neighbours, but so, as they never ventured all at once; nor put the main chance in hazard.

C. Flaminius the Consul having fought sundry times with the Frisii Ligurians, and in many battels gotten the better hand over them, even at home in their own country, brought the whole nation by composition under the obedience, and disarmed them: but because in the delivery of their armor, they dealt not soundly and faithfully, and should have been chastised therefore, they abandoned their villages, & fled to the mountain Apenninus; whither the Consul pursued them hard at heels: now best, being disbanded and scattered again, and most of them disarmed, they fled into the valley through places where no wayes led, and over broken and cragged steep rocks, whereas the enemies could not possibly follow after, and so passed the other side of Apenninus. But as in by is kept still within their hold, were beset round about and overthrown. Then were the legions led to the further side of Apenninus, where the enemies for a small while, defended themselves by the height of the place, but anon they yielded. Then was their armor sought for with more care and diligence then before, and they were disarmed and stripped out of all. After this, was the war diverted and before turned wholly upon the Apean Ligurians, who had so overrun the territories of Pise and Bolonia, that they could not be manured and tilled: The Consul having subdued them also, granted peace unto the borderers: and now that he had brought the province into quietness and rest, to the end that hisouldiers should not be idle and do nothing, he made a causey or street-way from Bononia to Arretium.

The other Consul M. Emilius, set on fire the villages, and wasted the lands of the Ligurians, as well in the campain fields as the valleys, when the inhabitants themselves were retired into the two mountains Balista & Snismontium, which they held. Afterwards he assailed them also who had taken the hills aforesaid: and first wearied them with light skirmishes; after wards, he forced them to descend into the pl. n, and there in a set battell vanquished them: in which conflict he vowed a temple to Diana. Thus having subdued all on this side Apenninus, he then set upon those that dwelt beyond the mountain; among whom were the Frisii & Ligurians, (so far as to whom C. Flaminius went not:) all those, Emilius, subdued despoiled them of their armour, he forced the multitude of them to forsake the mountains and come down into the plains. After he had quieted the Ligurians, he led his army into the country of the Gauls, and made an high way from Placentia to Arminum, so as it met with the causey Flaminius: and in the last battell, wherein he fought with banners displayed against the Ligurians, he vowed a temple to Queen Juno. And these were the exploits for that year, in Liguria.

M. Furius the Pretor in Gaul, seeking in time of peace for some pretence and colour of war, had taken from the Cenomani their armour notwithstanding they were innocent and did no harm. The Cenomani made complaint hereof at Rome to the Senat, and were put unto the Consul Emilius, unto whom the Senat had decreed a commission of vis and detinendum. After great debate with the Pretor, they overthrew him in the action, and had their armour delivered unto them again: and so the Pretor was commanded to give over his government and depart out of the province.

After this, the Embassadors of the Latin nation, who assembled and resorted in great number out of all parts of Latium, had audience given them in the Senat. These complained, that the great multitude of their own natural citizens, were removed and gone to inhabit in Rome, and there were enrolled: whereupon a commission was granted to Q. Terentius Calla the Pretor, to make search for them: and look how many of them those Latine allies could prove to have been enrolled (either themselves or their fathers) in any City or corporation of theirs, either at the time that C. Claudius and M. Livius were Censors, or after their Censorship, to force those to return thither again, where they had been enrolled or matriculated. By virtue of this commission, the number of 12000 Latins returned home again into their own country: for now the City of Rome was overcharged and pestered with a multitude of strangers and forreiners.

Before that the Consuls repaired to Rome, M. Fulvius the Proconsul returned out of Etolia, who after he had discoursed of his exploits petitioned in Etolia and Cephallenia, before the Senat assembled in the temple of Jupiter, requested of the LL. to judge it meet and requisite, and accordingly to grant him orders, that praise and thanksgiving might be rendered unto the immortal gods, and himself allowed to triumph, for that he had so well and happily managed the affairs of the common weal. Then then forth M. Atilius a Tribune of the Commons, and declared openly, that in case they went so out to passe any decree in that behalf, before the coming of M. Emilius the Consul, he would collect: for that the Consul himself was minded to contradict that proceeding, and had given freight charge unto him, at what time as he took his journey to the province, that the consideration of this matter should be reserved wholly until his return home.

And Fulvius (though he) in it hold to much time: and when the Consul himself is present in place to pass, then might the Senat move what decree it pleased them. Then answered M. Fulvius and said, If men were ignorant either of the grudge and quarrell between me and M. Emilius, or with what contentious spirit and Kinglike choller and indignation he pursued the said enemy and vanquished, yet it were not a tolerable thing and to be endured, that the absence of the Consul should both impeach the honour due unto the immortal gods, and also hinder and stay the triumph.

triumph which I have so justly deserved: that a General (I say) who had so worthily achieved his service, and an army so victorious, should stay and give attendance without the City gates, untill it pleased the Consul to return home: who no doubt of very purpose had on set purpose, upon this occasion would make slow halt and take his leisure. But now considering that the enmity and heart-burning that the Consul beareth to me is so notorious as it is, what indisferency and reasonable dealing may a man look for at his hands? who taking the advantage of the time, when a small number of Senators were assembled, caused an act of the Senat to passe by stealth, and entered it in the treasure house, containing thus much in effect, that Ambracia should not be reputed as a town forced by assault, notwithstanding it were assailed with mantlets and platforms: where we were driven to erect new fabricks, and plant other en-gins and ordnance of war after the former were consumed with fire: where we maintained fight about the wals, as well under the ground as above, for the space of 15 daies together; where after that the souldiers had scaled and gained the wals, the conflict endured notwithstanding a long time doubtfull, from morning to night; and where were slain above 3000 enemies. Now as touching the sacriledg committed (after the City was forced) in spoiling the churches of the im-mortall gods: what a slander think ye, hath he raised of me? what a matter hath he made thereof, and how he hath informed the Pontifics and Bishops? unless a man would say, that lawful it was not for the City of Rome to be garnished & beautified with the ornaments of Syracusa & other Cities won by force; but the law of war extended it to this only City of Ambracia? I beseech you therefore the L.L. of the Senat, yea, and I request the Tribuns, not to suffer me to be mocked and abused by a most insolent and proud adversary. Then at all hands they dealt with the Tribune, some intreated him, other rebuked and blamed him: but the speech of Tib. Gracchus (one of his colleagues) moved him most of all others: who shewed, that it was no good precedent and example, that men should maintain and follow their own privat quarrels in time of magistracy and publick government, but a shamefull matter and a foul indignity it was, and much becoming the Tribuns of the Commons and their sacred laws, that a Tribune should be Proctor to other men and prosecute their actions and enmities. Men ought (qd. he) according to their own discretion and judgment, either to love or hate the persons, to like or dislike the cause; not to depend and hang upon the countenance and becke of others, not to be carried to and fro with the wils, pleasure, and appetites of other men. As for the Tribune of the Commons here, he accorderth and taketh part with a cholericke and relty Consul, and remembreth well what M. Emilius left with him in privat charge; but forgetteth altogether that the Tribuneship was committed unto him by the people of Rome: committed I say, and put into his hands for to assise privat persons, and to maintain their liberties, and not to uphold the Kinglike rule and a royalty of a Consul. Never seeth he thus much before him, that it will be written another day in the Annals and yearly Chronicles, that of two Commoner Tribuns in the same fellowship and society, one for the love of the Common-weal renounced and gave over his own privat displeasure and enmity to a particular person, and the other took charge as it were by way of Commission, to pursue the quarrel of another man. The Tribune could endure no longer these rebukes and checks and therewith departed out of the temple: then the Prefor Ser. Sulpicius propounded the bill the second time; and so a triumph was granted to M. Fulvius. Who after he had rendred great thanks to the L.L. of the Senat, added moreover and said, that the very day wherein he forced the City Ambracia, he had by vow promised, to the honor of Jupiter Opt. Max. for to exhibit the great and solemn Rom. games. And to that effect the Cities of Græcia had contributed towards the charges, a hundred pound weight in gold: his petition was therefore, that the Senat would ordein that out of that mass of money which he was to carry and shew in triumph, and meant to bestow and lay up in the City Treasury, the forsaide sum of gold might be sequestred and reserved apart for the proper use abovesaid. The Senat commanded, that the Colledge of the Prelats and Priests in this case should be consulted with, and their advice demanded, whether they thought it necessary that so much gold should be spent and consumed in the charges of the said games? The Prelats made answer again, that it was not material to relegion and to the service of the gods, to how great a great a reckning soever the charges of the games should arise. Whereupon the Senat permitted Fulvius to defray what he would himself, so as it exceeded not the sum of 30000 [Alicia].
 He had proposed to triumph in the month of January, but hearing that Emilius the Consul (who was advertised by letters, that Ambracia the Tribune of the Commons had renounced and let fall his opposition which he commented) was coming in proper person to Rome, only for to hinder the triumph, and staid by the way sick; he prevented the day, for fear he should have had more anger and trouble in his triumph, then during his war. So upon the 23 day of December he triumphed over the Etolians and Cephalaens. Before his chariot there were born 100 crowns of gold, weighing 12 pound peece: of silver 23000 pound weight: of gold 243 pound weight: of Attick Tetradrachms 118000: of Philip peece of gold coin 2222: images of brasse 85: of marble 230.
 Likewise of armor, as well defensive as offensive, and other spoil of the enemies, an huge deal besides Catapults, Balists, and other engins and peece of battery. Moreover, there went before him 27 captives either Etolians and Cephalaens, or else under King Antiochus, left by him in those parts. The same day before that he entered into the City, he bestowed in the cirque Flaminium many military gifts upon many colonels, captains, horlemen and centurions, as well Romans as allies.
 Generally to all the footmen he gave out of the pillage 25 Denarii peece: twice as much to the centurions, and threefold to horlemen.

Now

- A Now approached the time of the solemn assembly for the election of Consuls, and because M. Emilius whose lot it was to be president thereof, could not be present at the day, C. Flaminius who came of purpose to Rome. By whom were created Consuls Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Q. Martius Philippus. After that were Praetors elected, to wit T. Manius, P. Cornelius Sulla, C. Calpurnius Piso, M. Livinius Latullus, C. Avarianus Scaurus, and L. Quinctius Crispinus. In the end of the said year, after the magistrates were thus created, Cn. Manlius Vulso the third day before the Nones of March, triumphed over the Gauls who inhabit Asia. The cause why he triumphed so late, was this, for that he would avoid making his answer (according to the act of Pandrus) while Q. Terentius Cullen was Praetor, fearing he should burn in the flame of the same sentence and judgement whereby L. Scipio had been condemned, or lest the flame of another mans judgement;
- B I mean the sentence whereby L. Scipio had been condemned, would have been too hot for him, and caught hold of him likewise: considering that the jury and enquest were more incited and provoked against him then Scipio: for that he succeeding after him, had spoiled and murthered with all kind of licentious looseness, the military discipline, which Scipio had observed most precisely and severely. Neither was he noted and touched in name for those things only which by bare hearsay were reported to have been done in the province, far remote from the view of men, but also of those particular instances to be seen daily in the demeanor of his soldiers. For verily the foreign excesses and strange superfluities took beginning from the Asian army, who brought all with them into the City. They were the first with in Rome that took up the use of brazen tables of rich counterpoints, carpets, cupboards, cloths, hangings and curtains of sundry kinds of tyllue, Like wise of one footed standing tables, buffets and cupboards, which in those daies were counted magnificent and stately moveables. Then came up the manner of having at bankers singing miniken wenchies, and such as could play upon the dulcimers or other instruments of musick, with dancers, jotters and other pastimes, and delightfome pleasures and fits of mirth at the table. Then began the boord to be furnished and set out with more exquisite & deinty viands, and of greater expense. Then Cooks, who in old time were reputed the most contemptible slaves, as well for calling as estimation, as for the use they were put unto, came to be in great request: and that which before time was a mechanical kind of manual service, grew now to be accounted a science of deep skill and understanding. And yet all these things that then bare so great a shew, were scarce so much as small loads and lumps, to the excessive superfluities that were to ensue.
- C Well, Cn. Manlius carried in triumph two hundred crowns of masie beaten gold, weighing twelve pound apiece: of silver 230000 pound weight: of gold 2103 pound weight: of Attick Tremulathum 230000: of Cithophors 350000: of Philip golden peeces 163000. Also much armor there was and spoils of Gauls carried in shew upon wagons: and 52 captains of enemies were led before his own chariot. Amongst the soldiers he gave a donative of 42 denarii apiece, he doubled the same to every centurion. Also to every footman he gave double pay, and to every horseman triple. Many there were of all States and degrees, whom he rewarded with military presents for especial service, and those followed next after the chariot. The soldiers chanted such songs and sonnets, as a man might easily see they were composed to feed the humor of a General desirous of glory, and one that made much of his soldiers especially: whereby his triumph was more honored with the affectionate favour of them, then other wise recommended and celebrated with the hearty love of the people. Howbeit the friends of Manlius served him in good stead to win the good will of them also through whole soliciting & earnest endeavour, there passed an act of the Senate, that out of that money which had been shewed in triumph, there should be repaid unto the people that subsidy which had been lent among them for soldiers pay, and not yet contented back again. So the Treasurers of the City made true and faithful payment with all diligence of 25 asses and d. in every thousand [for the loan.]
- D About the same time three Colonies came out of both provinces of Spain, with letters from C. Cornutus and L. Manlius the governors there: by which letters intelligence was given, that the Celtiberians and Hispanians were in some wayling and spoiling the lands of the Rom. confederates. The Senate referred the entire consultation of this matter to the new Magistrates. During the time of the Roman games that year which P. Cornelius Cethegus, and Aulus Posthumius Albinus represented, was made make a high pole which stood not fast in the they place called Circus maximus, fell down upon the image of Bellona, and cast it down to the ground. The LL. hereupon made some scruple in cogitations, and ordained, that the solemnity of those games should continue one day longer, and should be a new image to be set up for that one, and that the new should be all gilt. Likewise the Mercurian plays were renewed one day more, by the Ediles C. Sempronius Blasus & M. Fulvius Flaccus. The next following year, the Consuls Sp. Posthumius Albinus & M. Martius Philippus from the wars, from the siege of Lisbon and government of provinces abroad, to the punishment of some misbehaving company at home. The Praetors laid costs for their provinces. T. Manlius had the jurisdiction of the wars, and M. Livinius Latullus between citizens & strangers. Also C. Avarianus Scaurus had the governance of Sardinia, and to P. Cornelius Sulla of Sicily. L. Quinctius Crispinus was assigned to the higher Spain, and P. Calpurnius Piso to the farther. Both Consuls were enjoined to make inquisition into secret conspiracies within the City.
- E There came a certain Caton of base degree and condition, who came first in Hispania: a man not endued with any of those arts, whereof the nation (for all others most learned) hath brought many notions, as well for the education of our minds, as the trimming of our bodies, but a sacrificing being priest he was, and a divining wifed withal. Neither was it one that made outward profession of rectitude, and thereby getting a living openly, and so by an open show of religion possessed their heads and minds with fear and horror; but the knowledge he had (which for certain hidden and secret sacrifices. These mysteries of his at first he taught but unto a few, howbeit afterwards they began to be communicated and divulged as well to men as women: and to this religion were added pleasures and delights of wine and good cheer to the end that more customers might be allured and enticed for to have a liking thereof. Now when wine had drowned and dulled the understanding: when the night season, when the entertaining of men and women together one with another (and namely, they of young and tender years, with those of elder age) had clean put out and extinguished all respect and regard of themselves: there began first to be practised all sorts of corruption, for every one had all pleasures ready at commandment, and his choice of those whereto by nature he was more prone and given to lust after. Neither was there wickedness committed here, of one sort; namely, the abusing of mankind and womenkind one with another without distinction: but out of this shop and workhouse proceeded false witness, forging of seals, depositions, and testimonies; and more then so, writing and waste informations. From hence came the devilish cult of poisoning, and privy murders of benevolence of kindred in one house and the same so secret, that otherwhiles the bodies would not be found to be committed to the earth. Many sinfull parts were there played by way of fraud, guile, and cunning cozenage; but more by spelt force. As for violence, it was kept close and hidden by reason that with the hideous noises, with the sound ofymbals, drums, and cymbals, there could no voice be heard of such as cried out, when either they were forced to villany and abuse, or beaten to death. The infection of this catching poison of Hierax, spread as fast as Rome, like a contagious melody. At the first the spacious capacity of the City, having been used to drink and beat with some enormities, concealed all: at length revealed it was to the Col. P. Fabius, much after this manner: P. Fabius (whose father had served in the wars in quality of a gentleman of Robe, with a Cary house) left an orphan, after that his guardians were likewise deceased, became ward to himself after Darius and his father in law (his second husband) T. Symplicius Rutilianus, under whom he had his bringing up. Now as his mother was wholly devoted and obsequious unto her husband, so his father in law had so handled the matter in his guardianship, that he could not do good he compt thereof, and therefore his desire was, that either the infant should be sold to some country or else obliged and entralled unto him. The only way to compass his thing had thought, that the corruption and abuse of the Bacchantes. This she her therefore upon a time called her son to her, and told him, that she had made a vow for him when he was first, that to so soon as he should recover and be well again, she would present him to the priests of Barbaris to be consecrated and professed in their mysteries: and how soon she, feeling that by the goodness of the gods that was intended, and I thereby obliged by the bond of that vow, I will acquit my self thereof, that perforce it accordingly. She bare him in hand therefore, that he must for so many days live chaste and not touch a woman, and at the ten dayes end after he had eaten his supper, and was set washed and purified after the manner, she would bring him unto the holy place of those sacred mysteries. Now there was a famous stranger, by condition stood to countenance and named Hippodamus; too good, I wis, for that occupation which he did while she was young, which and he didervant: but yet still after that she was married and in that state of a free citizen, she maintained her self by the same trade and manner of living. Given she was like a familiar acquaintance with the forefard young Barbaris, by reason they were next neighbours, and therefore she was able: yet so, as she endeavored for the youth to get either to change his state, or something else ere it. For she it was that first was induced upon him, and how she would had for as much as he had but short allowance every way from his mother and father in law, and by them kept hardly, he was maintained well by the bounteous liberality of this loving husband. Nay, more than that, in continuance of time she was so deeply engaged in him, that when he was parted was dead, and her self at the disposition of some he left unto the Tribunes and old Praetors into their tutor, began to be more to make her self a wife and companion, where to she desired to find her only heart in remained or to assist. She had: There passing then betwixt them being together pledges of love, and they using to impart the one to the other the secrets of their hearts, the young youth by way of mery and pleasure talk would not one day be so careful to think any thing more, if for certain times he lay away and passed time with them: for thus upon a religious and devotion that he had, he was minded for to be professed and consecrated by the Brigides of Barbaris, and all to be spoiled from a young man in hope of his beauty. The woman following him try so, and from led in spirit, Mary go to send, (good she) and would have that for all things in the world. And better it were for me and you to be so true to me, then to be so with this she threatened, she cursed and boded, wishing all manner of plague to come upon them that had put such a thing into his head. The youth wanted much to hear his words, and to see her so to fare and take on beyond all reason and order, but that he had of all loves to be so true, and to forbear those cursed speeches, and said it was his own weakness, by the consent of his father in law, who had enjoined him to do so. And so the father in law of yours, quoth she, (that peradventure I should not do well to be me your mother, that hath such you by the action of yours to make shipwreck of your honesty and chastity, of your credit and good name, of your hope and other day, and lastly, to it and your very true heart, for you shall have much more than before

The Bacchantes detected.

A fore, and desired earnestly to know the depth of all this matter. Then after she had prayed all gods and goddesses to pardon her, if for tender love and affection that she bare unto him, she could neither will nor chuse but reveal those secrets that indeed were to be concealed, she set tale on end and said: "That she her self once entred into that chappel, when as she waited on her mistress, but since that she was made free and at her own liberty, she never set foot within the dore. And upon my knowledge (qd. he) it is the very shop and workhouse of all wickedness that can be devised. And now for certain these two yeers last past, there is not one professed and admitted to those mysteries there, who is above 20 yeers of age. So soon as any one is induced and brought thither, she or he is delivered to the priests as a very sacrifice to be killed: for they lead them to a place which resoundeth with yelling and crying, with singing of divers conorts, with jangling noise of cymbals, with thumping & bearing of tabers, to the end that the voice of any one that cryeth and complaineth of force and violence done to the abuse of his or her body might not be heard. Now I beseech you therefore, and of all loves I pray you, that in any case by one means or other you avoid this. howsoever ye do: and plunge not your self headlong thither, where first you shall be sure to endure and suffer, and afterwards to perpetrat and commit all abominable wickedness not to be named. And never would she let the yong man go from her, untill he had made her iustifull promise to abstain and forbear such mysteries and ceremonies. When he was come home, and that his mother was in hand with him, telling him what he must do this day and that day, and so forth: he flatly denied and said plainly, he would do neither the one nor the other, and at one word, professed and consecrated he would not be: whatsoever came of it. His father in law was present and at one end of this resolute speech of his, his mother straightwaies cried out and said, that he could not find in his heart to lie apart from Hispala one ten daies, and that he was so far bewitched and envenomed with the charms & poisoned allurementes and baits of that false serpent and pernicious Hydra, that he had no respective regard either of his mother, or mothers husband, no, nor any reverent fear of the immortall gods. The mother rated him of one side, the father baited and courted him on the other, till in the end they hunted him out of dores with 4 bondswaves besides. The yong man betook himself to Eburna, an aunt that he had by his father side, and shewed her the whole matter, why his mother had thrust him out of her house by the head and shoulders: which done, by her advice and counsell the next day he opened and declared the same in great secret, without the hearing of any earthly creature, to the

D Consul Pomponius. The Consul commanded him to repair again unto him three daies after, and so for that time dismissed him. Then the Consul in the mean while enquired of his wives mother Salpina, a brave and sober matron whether she knew an old wife called Eburna dwelling in the Aventine? Yes that I do qd. she, and I know her to be an honest dame, and a woman of the old world, and few her like now adayes. I must needs speak with her (qd. he) and therefore I would have you lend a messenger unto her for to will her to come thither. Eburna at the first sending came unto Salpina: and the Consul within a while sorted (as it were by chance) into their company, & began to find some talk of her brothers son Eburnus: with that the womans eyes stood full of water, and with tears she began to bewail the case and mishap of the yong man: who being spoiled of all his goods and patrimony (by those who of all others should least have done it) was now at home in her house, chased and driven out of doors by his own mother: for that the honest good youth (God blasse us all and be mercifull unto us) was unwilling to be consecrated and admitted to certain filthy and detestable sacrifices (if all be true that is reported thereof.) The Consul had enough now, and was fully perswaded of Eburnus, that he had told him no lie. Then he gave Eburna leave to go her waies home, and requested his mother in law Salpina aforesaid, to lend likewise for Hispala from thence out of the Aventine to come unto her, a woman (qd. he) affianched and well enough known to all the neighbours of that street: for that I have somewhat also to say to her. Hispala was somewhat disquieted at this message, to think that she should be sent for to so noble and honourable a dame, and knew no cause wherefore. But after that she saw the

Lictors before the entry of the doore, the troop and train also belonging to the Consul, and with all the Consul himself in person, she was astonished and (in manner) half dead. The Consul taking with him his wives mother, had the woman into an inward room of the house, and said unto her, that she need not to be afraid, if to be she could find in her heart to tell the truth: and for assurance thereof, she should have the faithfull word and promise either of Salpina (a lady of so good credit and reputation) or of himself if need were. Only he would have her to utter and declare what was ordinarily done at the grove of Stabulum in the Bacchanals, where they used to sacrifice in the night season. The woman had no sooner heard that word, but she fell into such a fear, trembling and quaking all over her body, that for a good while she was not able to open her lips and speak a word: but after she was come to her self again out of this trance, and by them heartned and encouraged she said, that when she was a very yong wench and a bond-maid, she together with her mistress, was there professed and consecrated: but for certain yeers of late, and namely since that she was affianched and made free, she was not acquainted with the place, nor with what work was there. I counsell thanks for this yet (quoth the Consul) that thou deniest not how thou wast there entred into that profession: but say on and tell out the rest as truly and faithfully. She answered again, that she knew no more then she had already disclosed. The Consul repaid upon her and said, that in case she were taken in a trap, & that another came forth to be face & reproved her, she should beseech him that she might have the like favour at his hand as otherwise she might if of her self she confessed the thing. forasmuch as he who had all from H your own mouth, hath already discovered the whole. The woman knew where he was then, and was perswaded verily (as it was indeed) that Eburius was a blas of the tongue, and had revealed this secret: whereupon she fell down at the feet of Salpisia; and first began in most humble manner to beseech her, that she would not suffer, that words of course, passed between her an estrangghised woman and her paramour, should turn not only to earnest and importance, but also to a capitoll matter, to touch her as much as her life was worth: for what I said (quoth she) was but to fright him, and not for that I knew any such thing. Posthumus hereat was chafed, and fell into a fit of choler: What? (quoth he) thou thinkest belike that thou art jesting and cogging with thy lover Eburius, and forgettest how thou art in the house of a right worshipfull lady, and in communication with a Consul. But Salpisia on the other side, willed her to stand up, (affrighted as she was) and withall, both exhorted her to be of good cheer, and also appeased the wrath of her son in law. In the end after she had taken a better heart unto her, she greatly blamed & found fault with the disloyalty and falshood of Eburius for scrying her so, and requiting her full badly again for so singular a good turn that she had done him, and then said, That she stood in great awe of the gods, whose secrets she should reveal and divulge; but in greater fear of men, who no doubt for bewraying these matters, would be ready to tear her in pieces with their very hands.

And therefore she besought Salpisia, and entreated the Consul to take some order for her, and to send her into some place out of Italy, where she might passe the rest of her daies in safety yet of her life. But of good cheer woman (quoth the Consul) let me alone for that, I will provide well enough, that thou shalt live at Rome, and that without all danger. Then declared Hispala the ori- X ginall and first commencements of these sacrifices and solemnities. At the beginning (quoth she) it was priviledged place & consecrated for women only & they alone medled with those mysteries; neither was it the custome and manner that a man should enter in among them: and three let holidayes they had in the year, during which time the priests of Bacchus performed their ceremonies in the day time, and folk were admitted by them, to their religion and profession; and women they were all (and those matrons) who were created priests for that purpose, in their time & turn one after another. But Parulla Minia (a Campana woman) when she was the priest, changed all, as being advertised and admonished by the gods so to doe: for she was the first that sacred and admitted men, to wit, her own sons Minius and Hergennius the Certinians: she altered the solemnity from the day to the night; and for three daies in the whole year, she ordered five in the very month, to scrve for the attendance and ministry of these mysteries. Since which time that these sacrifices & ceremonies were thus divulged, & men and women intermingled together, & the licentious liberty of the night time also to help all forward, there is no act so wicked, no fact so filthy, but there it is committed: and more sinful & unnatural abuse there is, of making one with another, then there is of women. If any are either unwilling to suffer this foul filthiness, or bethink themselves more dully in the beastly action and performance of that villany, such presently are to be killed and sacrificed as beasts. And this is suppled amongst them, the principall point and sum of their religion, to hold and beleve that nothing is unlawful whatsoever. The men shaking and wagging their bodies up and fro after a fanaticall fashion, as if they were distracted & out of their right wits, seem to divine and tell things to come. The women, attired like the she-priests of Bac- M chus, with their heads unbound and their hair hanging loose about their ears, run down with flaming torches to the river Tyber, where they dip their torches into the water, and take them out again light burning still, because they are made with sulphur vive and quick lime: and they say, that certain men are by the gods carried away from among them, no man knoweth whither: such as they bind fast to a certain engine or frame, and harty them out of sight into certain hidden caves:
and those be such, as either would not swear to be of their conspiracy, or be partners with them in al their mischievous designments, or endure against kind to be abused. The number & multitude there assembled, is exceeding great, and grown now be another body of a people: and among them are some noble persons, as well men as women. But now for these two years last past, ordeined it is, That none should be there professed and sacred above twenty yeers old; for such ages they lay for to serve their turn, as are soonest seduced and drawn to error, or most subject to be forced to suffer abuse and villany. When she had thus finished her information and discovered all, she fell down upon her knees again, and lay at their feet, and repeated her former supplication the second time, to wit, That he would send her away out of the country. Then the Consul in-treated his mother in law to spare some void corner of her house, whereunto Hispala might retire her self, and there make her abode. So she allowed her an upper lodging in her house, and the and the stairs that led towards the street were stopped up, and the entrance turned into the house.
Then presently were all the moveable goods and household stuff of Postumia removed, and her family sent for thither, and there entertained. Likewise Eburius was commanded to go and lodge O with a tenant or client belonging to the Consul. Thus when both the informers were forthcoming and under Posthumus his hand, he declared the whole matter to the Senat. And after he had laid every thing abroad in order, namely, what was reported unto him first, and what he had learned afterwards by enquiry, the Lords of the Senat were surprized with exceeding great fear, as well in regard generally of the commonweal, lest those conspiracies, nightly meetings and conventicles, might import some secret complot of mischief and danger: as also for doubt in in particular, that some of their own friends or family should be accessory and capable.

A The Senators were of this mind, that the Consul was highly to be praised and thanked, for that he had found out and brought to light such a matter as this, both with so singular care & diligence, and also without any tumult and uprore. Then they took order and ordained, Imprimis, That the Consuls should have an extraordinary commission to make search and inquisition into these Bacchanals and night-sacrifices: Item, That Edictis and Fessis the informers thereof should not be prejudiced thereby, nor come to harm for it, yea, and that a recompence and reward should be propounded to others that could give light and reveal the same! Item, That the Priests belonging to these religions, be they men or women, should be sought out not only at Rome, but in all other markers towns, cities and places of frequent resort, and conveyed before the Consuls to be and remain at their disposition. Item, That proclamation be made at Rome, and edicts sent through-B out all Italy, that no person whatsoever, who had been sacred & professed religious by the Priests of Bacchus, resort any more into assembly or conventicle for those sacrifices, nor yet do ought pertaining to such divine service. And above all things, that information and presentment be made of all those that had frequented such meetings or conventicles, to commit whoredome or any such filthiness and wickedness. And these were the ordinances of the Senat. The Consuls then granted their warrants out to the Ediles Cursiles to make diligent search and enquiry for those Priests of that religion, and upon apprehension to keep them in free ward and large prison forthcoming for to be examined: also to the Ediles of the Commons to look well, that no service of the gods be celebrated in secret. Moreover, the Triumvirs capital were straightly charged to set good watch and ward throughout the City, and see to meetings by night, for fear that no fire should hold C of any place. To those three Commissioners or Triumvirs were five other Quinquervirs adjoynd assistants, who every one should watch well and take charge of all the houses of his quarter within Tyberis. Then the Consuls having set them about these their severall charges mounted up the Rosses or place of public audience. And when the people were assembled together, then the Consul ascended had pronounced the solemn prayer which Magistrates are wont to use as a preamble, before they make speech unto the people, began his Oration unto them in this wise. Never in any of your assemblies, Quirites, was this solemn prayer unto the gods, either so meet and convenient, or so requisite and needfull as in this, to advertise and put you in mind, that those be the gods indeed whom your ancestors ordained, that you should honour, serve, worship, and propitiate, and not these here who prick & provoke (as it were) with goods of suries, your spirits
D and minds transported and carried away with false and strange religions to commit all wickedness, mischief, & filthy lust. Surely for mine own part I wot not either what I were best to conceal or how far forth to speak out and utter my mind. If you know not all, I doubt I should give you occasion to be negligent; again, if I discover all, I fear me that I shall affright & terrifie you too much. But what and how much soever I shall say, be ye sure it will be far less than the greatness and enormity of the thing requireth. Yet endeavour will we so much to deliver, as may suffice to give you a warning and watch-word to take heed. This am I well assured of, that you understand not only by hearsay and bare report, but also by the ringing noises and yelling cries in the night season that the Bacchanals have been a long time kept over all Italy, yea, and in many places throughout the City of Rome, which resoundeth again therewith. But what manner of E thing it is, I am verily perswaded there is not one of you that knoweth. Some beleere that it is a certain worship and service of the gods; others suppose it is some foolery and wanton pastime tolerated and winked at. But be what it will be, they think there are but a few interceded & employed therein. As touching the number and multitude of them, if I should tell you that they were many thousands, you cannot chuse but suddenly be afraid, unless I also presently shew, who they be and of what quality. Know ye therefore first and foremost, that the most part of them are women, (I leave the men to spring the source of all this mischief.) Then are there men indeed, but such as for all the world resemble women, so effeminate they are: such I say as have abandoned themselves as well to be abused as to abuse others: fanatical persons and bereaved of their wits by reason of excessive watching, past service & even stoned with bibbing of wine without measure, with howling & howling & crying all night without intermission. This conventicle of conspirators is yee of a great force, howbeit gathered much strength, in regard that they multiply still, & their number is every day more than other. Your ancestors in times past would in no wise admit that ye should assemble together at a venture and without important and just occasions, unless it were either by raising a standard or banner upon the fortresse for to levy an army; or to gather the people together to give their voices in elections of Magistrates; or that the Tribunes proclaimed a general congregation of the common people; or some of the Magistrates summoned them to an open audience for to hear an Oration, and wheresoever a multitude were thus met together, there they ordained and thought meet to have a lawfull governor and overseer of them. But what kind of night conventicles think ye first these might be & namely, where F men and women are met and thronged together pell mell one with another? In faith, if ye will at what age they of the male sex are professed and made novices, ye would not only pity them, but also be ashamed and afflicted. Think ye my masters, Quirites, that young men thus professed, & having taken this oath, are meet to make soldiers of? and that ye are to put weapons into the hands of such as are taken out of that sinking and miserable Chappel? Shall these, thus raised polluted, and overwhelmed with filthy uncleanness, as well of their own kind as others, fight for the pure chastity, for the honesty (I say) of your wives and children? Less harm

had

"had it been, if they could have rested so, and become only effeminate by their own unchaste im-
 "purity (for that had redounded most to their proper shame and dishonour) and not have abused
 "their hands to practise mischief, and busied their brains to contrive fraud and deceit. But now
 "was there in Commonweal either so great and dangerous a malady, as touching more persons, "or reaching to farther matters of greater consequence. For wot ye well this, that all the fatal "parts committed for these late years, were it filth by lust, crafty cozening, or any wickedness whi-"soever, proceeded & sprung out of this one ungracious chappel and place of counterfeite holiness, "and no other. Yet have they not put in practice all their mischiefs, which they have most curi-
 "ly plotted and sworn to execute. Hitherto their impious & detestable conspiracy hath bro"ken out, and passed no further than to particular and privat mischiefs, because they have not ga"thered force and strength enough to invade and oppress the Common-weal. Howbeit, the evil
 "encreaseth, and the malady spreadeth further daily, and by this time is grown to much, as it will "not contain within the privat fortune and condition of particular persons, but threatneth the "very main State of the Common-weal. And unless (Quirits) ye take order to prevent it, these "night-Congregations may soon be as frequent and great as this present assembly, summoned by "order of Law and commandment of the Consul, in the open day time. Now are they (singled by "themselves apart) afraid of you, when they see you thus all assembled together, but so soon as "you are retired either to your houses within the City, or farms in the country, & by that means
 "severed asunder, they will surely meet together: devise they will and consult both to save them"selves, and also to ruinate and destroy you at once. Then take heed to your selves: then shall you "(singled one from another) be in dread and danger of them all in generall. It behoveth therefore
 "every one of you to desire and wish that all they who belong any way unto your charge, be wise "and well given. Then, if either fleshly lust or furious rage, have drawn & haled any one of them
 "headlong into that gulph and sink of sin, to hold such a person to be of their crew, with whom he "hath thus sworn and devoted himself to all sin and abominable wickedness, and not reckon him
 "of your own retinue and train any more. Moreover, careless I am not of your own persons in "this behalf, that none of you should be seduced and led away with error. For nothing is there "in the world, that deceiveth more under fair semblance, than false religion. For when the name
 "and Majesty of the gods is pretended to cover and colour naughtiness, suddenly there entereth
 "into our mind a scrupulous awe, which doth captivate and possess our conscience, for fear lest
 "in chastising and punishing human trespasses, we violate and offend some divine right and power "therewith. But of this scrupulosity discharged ye are, by an infinite number of Pontifical decrees, "acts of the Senat, yea, and answers of divine Sages and Soothsayers. For how many a time and "often in the daies of our fathers and grandfathers, hath commission been granted to the Magi"strats, To restrain and forbid expressly all forraign sacrifices and strange limgles: To chase & ba"nish all odd hedge-Priests, Wizards, Tellers of Fortune, and Magicians, out of the common place, "out of the shew place and theatre, yea, and quite out of the City? To search out all their books "of Magick and Prophecies, and to set a fire on them? Lastly, to abolish all other order and man"ner of sacrificing, but according to the Canon, form, and order of Rome? For they judged (wise "men as they were, and deeply teen in all divine and humane laws) nothing so forcible to ruinate
 "and overthrow religion, as when divine service is celebrated after some strange and forain fa"shion, and not according to the ancient custome of the place. Thus much I thought good by way "of caveat to foretell you of to the end that no superstitious opinion should trouble your spirits
 "when you shall see us to demolish and overthrow the Bacchanals, and scatter these unlawfull "assemblies. For all this will we do with the good leave, favour, and grace of the gods. Who be"ing highly offended to see their divinity and godhead thus polluted with wicked and abomina"ble filthiness, have discovered the same, lying hid in darkness, and brought it to light: neither in "their wisdom and providence, was it their will and pleasure, that such enormities thus detected
 "should remain unpunished, but be suppressed and extinguished for ever. Now hath the Senat
 "directed out unto me and my Colleague an extraordinary commission and warrant to make due "inquisition hereinto: by vertue whereof, we for our parts will accomplish our charge accord-
 "ly with all diligence and expedition. As for the night-watch throughout the City, we have gi"ven order already to the inferior Magistrats to look unto it. Likewise, meet and reason it is,
 "that every one of you according to his place and calling, quit himself well in whatsoever shall "be imposed and laid upon him: and especially to endeavour and prevent that no danger or mu"tiny arise by the maliciousness of those that are culpable and offenders. Then the Consul com"manded the acts of the Senat in this behalf to be read openly: they propounded and promised "also, rewards to all informers, that either converted and brought before them any such persons, "or presented their names, if they were absent and out of the way. And look whosoever were thus "nominated and fled upon it, they would assign him a certain day to make his appearance: upon "which day, if he answered not to his name when he were called, he should be condemned not"withstanding his absence. And if any of their names were presented, who hapned at the time of "the information to be without the land of Italy, he should have a longer term set down, to come "in and make his answer. After this, they published an Edict, forbidding (lest any one should be de"sirous to sell or buy ought tending to flight and departure) to receive, conceal, aid, or maintain by "any means those that were about to die. After the assembly of the people dismissed, great fear
 "there was over all the City: neither was it contained within the walls, liberties, and territory only should therefore sustain discredit on their damage. Finally, the Consul Prator, at most in place, but also these hereafter to come, should provide and order that as was be-done to that woman, but some left from all hands. This the Senate judged meet and required be done. All these things were likewise propounded unto the Consul, and entered at the Council to the disposance of the Senate. Finally, as touching both the impunity and also the recompence of other the Informers, was referred to the discretion of the Consul. Now book 1 151 152 153 154 155 156 157 158 159 160

By this time Q. Marcius also, having finished the inquisition in his Circuit had gathered made preparation to go into his Province of Liguria, after he had received for to supply the make up his legions of 6000, and 1500 horsemen Romans, besides 2000 Libians and 2000 of Liguria.
The same Province with the like numbers, well of horse as foot, was ordered likewise into his company in government. Those armies they took charge of which the former years Q. Marcius and M. Asinius the Consul had: moreover, by an act of the Senate, enjoyed they were increased two new legions besides and withall they levied of the Liguria altes 2000 foot, and 3000 horses besides 600 footmen also, and 200 horsemen Romans. All these forces (seeing also the legions) it was thought good to be led to furnish out the army in Spain. And therefore the Consul, whither they were themselves in person occupied above the foresaid inquisition, gave commission to M. Marcius to take the mothers. And when those conquests were performed and done, as is before said Q. Mar- cius took his journey first of the way towards the Aguntis in Liguria. But while in eager pursuit of them he engaged himself into the secret and blind pitch, where he at all times they had their lurking retreats and places of safe retreat: within those freights and passages which the enemies had levied before he was environed by them in a place of great disadvantage, where he lost 400 soldiers, with three ensigns of the second legion, and eleven banners of the Liguria which were all taken by the enemies. Also much armour and many weapons were thrown away here and there, by reason that they were numbered there as they fled through the woody paths of the forest: neither did the Ligurians give over their chase, before that the Romans ended their flight. The Consul so soon as he was escaped out of the enemies territory sent his army away into divers parts of the peaceable country to the end, that it might not be seen, how much his losses were repaired, yet could not he for all that suppress and suppress the truth that was blown abroad of his unfortunate journey, nor cancell the remembrance of the overthrow, nor was the forest out of which the Ligurians hunted him was called. The flight of M. Marcius a little before the news of the affairs in Liguria, the letters out of Spain were read, containing sorrow mixed with joy: to wit, That C. Calpurnius who two years before was Prator into that Province fought a field with the Lusitani in the territory of Alba, where, 6000 enemies fell upon the sword, and the rest were discomfited, put to flight, and driven out of their camp. Afterwards, he conducted his legions to the assault of the town Alba, which he forced and won with no greater ado, than before he gained their camp. But as he approached near the walls and took his good heed to himself, he was wounded, and of his hurt within few daies died. Upon the reading of these letters (importing the death of the Pro. Prator) the Senate was of advice to dispatch a messenger to overtake the Prator C. Calpurnius as far as the port of Liguria and give him command from the Senate, that their advice was, he should make all the haste he could in his journey, to the end that the Province might not be without a governor there to command. The order which was sent, within four daies arrived at Liguria: and but few daies before, Calpurnius was departed and had put himself in his journey. Moreover, L. Manlius Acidinus (who was gone into his Province at the same time that C. Cal- purnius went) struck a battell likewise with the Celtiberians in the higher Province of Spain. But they departed on both sides out of the field with doubtful victory, save only that the Celtiberians the next night following, dislodged and removed from thence, whereby the Romans had liberty and time both to inter their dead, and to gather up the spoils of their enemies. And within few daies after, the same Celtiberians having raised a more puissant army of themselves gave the Romans battell near the City Calagurris. It is not set down in the history, what should be the cause why they were the weaker, considering their number was re-enforced: but soiled they were in fights and had the overthrow. Of the enemies there died upon 12000, and not so few as 3000 left prisoners: and the Romans likewise were Masters of the camp. And had not Calpurnius been empatched and restrained in this train of victory (which he hotly followed) by the coming of Cal- purnius his successor in government, the Celtiberians had been utterly subdued. The new Prator withdrew both armies to their wintering harbours. At the same time that these news came out of Spain, the plaies called Lusitania were exhibited two daies together in honour of the gods. And after them, M. F. Antonius set out (with great furniture in sumptuous manner for the space of ten daies) his plaies which he had vowed in the Proletian war. And for to do him honour and grace this solemnity, many cunning actors and players came out of Greece. This was the first time that there was represented at Rome the show of champions and wrestlers for the best game: then also was exhibited the pastime of hunting and baiting Lions and Panthers: and in one word, these sports were celebrated with as great magnificence and variety almost as the modern pastimes and games in these daies. After all this was holden a Novem- dial feast: during which, there was much sacrificing, and all by decision that for three daies it rained stones in the Picene country: and because it was reported, that the lightning in divers places, and in sundry sorts, had blasted and lightly singed the garments of a certain baby folk.
To

To the said feast, there was adjoynd a supplication of one day, ordained by a decree of the Pontifices, for that the Chappel of the goddess Ops standing in the Capitol was smitten with a thunderbolt. In regard of these prodigies, the Col. procured expiation by sacrificing greater beasts, and so they purged and hallowed the City. At the same time word was brought out of Umbria, that there was an Ursus a phœnix or Scorpion almost twelve years old. This was held for a detestable monster; and therefore order was given, that it should be kept out of the territory of Rome, and killed out of hand.

The same year, certain Gauls from beyond the Alps passed into the territory of Venice, without forraging, spoiling, and using any hostility; and not far from the place where as now Aquileia standeth they seized upon a plot of ground to build a City in. Certain Roman Embassadors were sent about this matter beyond the Alps; where they received this intelligence and answer from the inhabitants of the country, That neither those Gauls took that voyage and expedition by authority and warrant from the whole nation, neither knew they what they did in Italy.

L. Scipio likewise about the same time, set out his plaies for ten daies together; for which he said, that he had made now during the time of the war against Antiochus; & he defraid the charges thereof with the money contributed unto him by divers KK; and States for that purpose. Valerius Antius writeth, that after he was condemned, and his goods confiscated and sold, he was sent in Embassage into Asia, for to take up certain controversies and differences between the two KK, Antiochus and Eumenes; and then it was said he) that the said contribution was made, and many skilful artificers and plaiers gathered unto him out of all Asia; and in the end, after this Embassage, he moved the Senate for these games, because he had made no mention nor words at all of them after the said war, by occasion whereof (by Valerius his saying) he vowed them.

The year being now at an end, Q. Martius in his absence was to leave his Magistracy; & Q. Posthumius having into upon the inquisition aforesaid, and with all fidelity and carefull diligence that might be brought it to an end, held the solemn assembly for election of Magistrates: wherein were chosen Col. Ap. Claudius Pulcher & M. Sempronius Tuditanus. And the morrow after were elected for Prætors, P. Cornelius Cethegus, A. Posthumius Albinus, C. Afranius Stellio, C. Atillius Serranus, L. Posthumius Tappianus, & M. Claudius Marcellus. At the years end, upon the relation of Sp. Posthumius the Col. that in his visitation about the enquests aforesaid, as he rode along the sea coasts of Italy on both sides, he found certain Colonies dispeopled and desolate, to wit, Sipontum upon the Adriatick sea, and Buxentum upon the Tuscan. T. Manius the City Prætor (by vertue of an act of the Senate in that behalf) created three Commissaries, called Triumvirs for to enroll and plant new inhabitants there, namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Tullius, and C. Babius Tampilus.

The war against King Perseus and the Macedonians, which now was a breeding, arose not upon that cause & occasion which most men imagine, nor yet from Perseus himself: for the first ground-work thereof was laid by Philip, who if he had lived longer, would have been seen in open action. One thing there was above the rest which stung him; at what time as the Romans imposed conditions upon him after he was vanquished, to wit, That the Senate laid a bar for to be revenged of those Macedonians who had revolted from him: which he despaired not but it had been possible to have obtained at their hands, considering that Quintius in the capitulations of peace, reserved that point entire and excepted not against it. Now afterwards, when Antiochus was defeated in the battel of Thermopylae, and that both Philip & the Col. entred upon the severall exploits: Acidius went in hand to assault Heraclea, and Philip at the same time the City of Lamir. Heraclea was no sooner forced, but Philip had commandment to levy his siege before Lamia, and the town was yielded to the Romans: and this he took to the heart. Howbeit, the Col. appeased his choler for the time, in that making haste in person to Nasactum (unto which town the Ætolians after their rout were retired) he suffered Philip to war upon Arhamania and Aminander; to adjoyne also, and lay unto his kingdom those Cities which the Ætolians had taken from the Thessalians. Now had Philip chased Aminander out of Arhamania, and won certain Cities without any great ado, Demetria also (a strong City of great importance, and very commodious for all things) together with the nation of the Magnetes, he brought under his obedience. After this, he forced certain towns in Asia, which were troubled with the seditious variance of their principal and great personages, by reason that they knew not how to use their new liberty, wherewith they had not been acquainted: he won those Cities (I say) by taking part with those, who in this civil dissension were the weaker, and otherwise would have gone to the walls. By these means the wrath of the King against the Romans was well allayed for the present: nevertheless, he ceased not all the time of peace to bethink how he might gather more strength, and be able to war again, whensoever any good occasion should be presented unto him. He increased therefore the revenues of the Crown, not only by raising taxes out of all the fruits of the earth, and setting import and customs upon all merchandise brought into his Realm by sea from forrain parts; but also revived the mines of the old mines which had discontinued, yea, & in many places ordained new. Moreover, he replenish his country, which by many calamities following war, was dispeopled, he not only took order that his subjects should multiply by forcing them to get, breed, and bring up children, but also translated a great multitude of Thracians into Macedony; and for a good time whilst he was in repose and rest from the war, he bent his whole mind, and employed all his study how to make himself great, and augment the puissance of his kingdom. Then old matters and quarrels were renewed, which might whet his stomach, and kindle his anger against the Romans. For the complaints which the Thessalians and the Perthebians made for that their Cities were by him possessed, likewise those grievances which the Embassadors of King Antiochus laid abroad touching the Thracian Towns, which he seized and held by force, were heard by the Romans: so as it evidently appeared, that they neglected them not. But that which moved the Senat most, was this, That they had intelligence how he intended to be Lord of Asia and Aegyptus: as for the Thessalians, they took less regard of them. Moreover there came the Embassadors of Athamania, who complained not for the loss of some part of their territory, nor that he encroached upon their frontiers, but that all Athamania was reduced under the subjection and jurisdiction of the King. The banished persons also of Athamania, who had been chased out of the City by the Kings garrison (for that they stood in defence and maintenance of liberty) made relation, that not only Maronea was in the hands of Philip, but the City of Edessa also. Likewise there came Embassadors from Philipp, to purge him of all these matters laid to their charge, who averred, That their King and Master had done nothing but by commission and warrant from the Roman General. They pleaded and alledged, that the case of the Thessalian, Perthebian, and Magnesian Cities, yea, and the whole nation of Athamania together with Antiochia was all one with the Etolians: namely, That after Antiochus the King was chased and expelled, the Country itself being employed and occupied in besieging the City of Erastia; but Philip for to recover the States abovenamed, which being vanquished in war, were now subject unto him. Hereupon the Senat, because they would not determine and set down any thing in the absence of the King, sent three Delegates or Commissioners, to decide these controversies, to wit, Q. Caecilius, M. Titius, Babius, Tamphilus, and T. Sempronius. Upon whose arrivall, there was published a general Dict of all those States that were at difference with the King, to be holden at Trope in Thessaly. When they were all set there in councill, the Roman Legats, as umpires and judges, the Thessalians, Perthebians, and Athamans as plaintiffs and accusers, and Philip as the defendant to hear and receive the challenges and accusations against him: the chief Embassadors from the said Cities, pleaded against Philip, bitterly or mildly, more or less, according to the several disposition of their natures, and the proportion either of affectionate favour or malicious hatred which they bore to him. Now all the question and debate touching Philippopolis, Tricca, Phyloria, Eurymera, and other towns about them was this: Whether those pieces, considering the Etolians won and held them by force (& well known it was, that Philip had taken them from the Etolians) belonged in right to the Thessalians, or appertained of old time to the Etolians? for Antiochus had granted them unto the K. upon these conditions, namely, if they were any of the appurtenances of the Etolians, and if they combined and took part with the Etolians willingly of their own accord, and not by constraint and force of arms. Upon like terms stood the controversy of the Perthebian and Magnesian towns. For the Etolians had brought a confusion in all their territories, by reason that they held and possessed those Cities, by taking their vantage upon divers occasions. Besides these substantiall points properly to be decided, the Thessalians came in with their complaints also. For that those towns (in case they were out of hand delivered unto them; yet) he should render them spoiled, naked, and desolat. For over and besides those who miscarried by casualty of war, Philip had carried away into Macedony 500, even the principall flower of their youth, and abused them like slaves in putting them to base ministeries & servile drudgeries, and took whatsoever by compulsion he redelivered to the Thessalians, he had taken order afore that they should be good for nothing. As for example (say they) Thebes in Phthia, the only maritime City for much traffick and merchandise, was in times past gainful and commodious to the Thessalians, and brought them great revenues and profits. But Philip had turned the staple and all the trade and negotiation by sea from thence to Demetrias; and having got hulks and boys, caused them to baulk and pass by Thebes, and direct their course for Demetrias. Nay, he could not so much as hold his hands from evill entreating their Embassadors, who by law of nations are inviolable. For he forelaid them in ambush as they were in their journey to T. Quintus. By which means the Thessalians all in general were so over-awed by him, and put in such fear, that there is not a man amongst them dare open his mouth, either in their own Cities, or in any of the Diets and Councils of the whole nation. For why? their patrons of whom they hold their liberty are far off, but an imperious Lord they have that sitteth ever on their skirts, and pricketh them continually in the sides, and will not suffer them to use and enjoy the benefits granted them by the people of Rome. For take away from them the liberty of speech once, what freedom have they left? And even at this present for all the assurance and confidence they have in the priviledge of Embassadors, they rather sigh and groan out their words, than speak frankly, and perley with liberty. And unless the Romans provide better in some good sort, that both the Greeks remaining in Macedony, may be void of fear, and Philip also curb'd and kept short for being so bold, it will be to no purpose at all, that either he was vanquished, or they enfranchised. He is therefore to be held in with a rougher and harder bit in his mouth, like an headstrong and unruly horse, that will not be ruled with a gentle snaffle. In this sharp and eager manner deale the last, whereas the former had used fair language to appease and mollifie his anger, beseeching his grace to pardon them in case they spake their minds for their liberty, to lay down the rigour of a Lord and Master, to bear himself like a kidd ally and loving friend, & to take example of the Romans, and them to imitate, who chose rather to gain associates by love, than constrain them by fear. After audience given to the Thessalians, the Perthebians came in place, and alledged that Demetrias—

- A Philippi (a City which Philip desired Olynthus) belonged in right to Perthebia: & earnest they were, that it might be restored unto them. They demanded also to have Mallus and Enicium again. Then the Athamans put in and spoke for their liberty; and so have the sorts of Athenians and Perthebians rendered unto them. Philip because he would seem more like a plaintiff than a defendant, as to accuse rather than to be accused, began himself also with complaints. He found himself grieved, that the Thessalians had won by force of arms the City Mendus in Dolopia, part of the appurtenances belonging to his kingdom Stum; That the same Thessalians and the Perthebians together had forced Perrus in Pertheia, as for Kyma (an Asolus town without all question) they had indeed laid it unto his feignory, but Paraphelus, which should be under Athamania, by no right in the world was annexed to the Thessalians, & comprised within their charter. For
- B as touching the matters (which he) charged upon me to obtrusively, namely, of laying wait for the Embassadors, of frequenting those portadons, or abandoning those: the one is a meer mockery, and riden on nothing; namely, for me to give account what havens, merchants, and mariners shall pass or arrive at; the other is dead advice & contrary to my nature & that which I never could abide to practice. For their many years (said he) Embassadors have never ceased and given over, to inform grievous matters against me to the Roman Generals; and to the Senat at Rome; and which of them ever to this day hath had so much as a foul word given again unto him from me? Supposed & objected, it is, that once they were tormented by the way as they were going to Quina; but it is not said with all what hapned unto them. This manner of dealing & accusation is somewhat of squabbles that is in would have somewhat to say, be it never so false, when they can find no matter of truth to charge a man withal. These Thessalians beyond all measure abuse the kindness & indulgence of the people of Rome, & saring against who had endured a long drought, they drink over-greedily, pouring in their liberty, & nothing else to it, and know not when to make an end, and to break their draught; Like, for all the world to bondslaves suddenly set at freedom beyond their hope and expectation, whose manner is to break out into broad terms and licentious language, and cannot contain but revile and rail at their very Masters. And at last, in a furious fit of cholera he hurst forth into these words: That the sun was not set and gone to bed for ever, but would one day rise again. This figurative speech of his not only the Thessalians took to themselves, but the Romans also continued as a glance at them. Upon these words arose some bitt and murmuring in the assembly, but being in the end appeased & stilled, he answered
- D the agents for the Perthebians and Athamans in this wise: That the case and condition of those Cities for which they stood; was one and the same, namely, that the Col. Aelius and the Romans passed them unto him by a deed of gift; as having a fortime belonged to their enemy. Now if they who have given, will also take away the same, then (said he) I must needs quit my hold, and lose them; but in so doing they shall to gratifie their fickle, inconstant, and vain allies, men of no regard, and good for nothing, do more and manifest wrong to a far better and more faithful friend. For nothing is there in the world more thankless and less while accepted than liberty, especially with them who know not how to use it; & by abuse thereof will soon spill the grace of such a benefit. Then the Roman Delegates, having heard the reasons and allegations of both parties pronounced sentence, That the Macedonian garrisons should quit the Cities above-said, and the Realm of Macedony be confined within the ancient bounds and limits. As touching the injuries which they complained to have been reciprocally offered from one to another, there was a form and course of law to be set down, which should contain a processe and manner, how the matters between the Macedonians and the other nations might be reformed, and composed. Hereat the King was highly offended and displeased, but the Delegates went their waies toward Thessalonia as to right likewise the Cities of Thrace, and to hear their causes; where the Embassadors of King Emmanes made a speech to this effect.
- E If the pleasure of the Romans be, that the two Cities Enus and Maronea shall be free, it is not for me in modesty to say any more; but advise & admonish them to leave the same in real and not in verbal liberty, and not suffer agins by them granted to be impeached or intercepted by another. But if they have less care and consideration of the Cities and States planted in Thrace, yet more care and reason it is, that those places which sometimes were subje& unto Antiochus, should fall to Emmanes rather than to Philip; by way of recompence for war-service, in regard as well of the merits of his father Antiochus during the war against Philip, as of his own deserts, who during the war with Antiochus, was personally present in all travels & dangers both by sea and land. And to this purpose he hath besides an award of the ten Delegates passed already before-hand, who in the gift and donation of Chersonesus & Lyfymachia, have no doubt given Maronea & Enus likewise to be as dependants of a greater gift, considering the near vicinity and neighborhood of those other Cities. For as concerning Philip, what hath he deserved at the hands of the people of Rome? What right of feignory can he pretend, why he should plant garrisons in these Cities so far remote & distant as they be from the frontiers of Macedony? I wish ye would call for the Maronites, and hear what they can say, who are able to enform you more fully and certainly in all respects of the whole state of these Cities. Then were the Embassadors of the Maronites called in, who affirmed: That the King had a garrison not in one place only of their City (as he had in other Cities besides) but in many quarters thereof at one time; so as Maronea was pestered full with Macedonians. And therefore (say they) the Kings favorites and flatterers are they that rule all and bear the sway: they and none but they, may be allowed to

of King Philip.

“speak both in Senat at the Council-table, and in general assemblies before the people; in cy 60 H “away with all honours & dignities; & either are invested therein themselves, or else confer them “upon whom they please. The best men, who stand either for defence of freedom, or in mainte“nance of the laws, either are driven their country and banished, or sit a cold & blow their tails, “for any advancement they come unto; & being subject and thrall to persons of no worth stand “like cyphers and hold their peace. Somewhat they said moreover as touching the right of their “limits to wit, That Q. Fabius Labro, at what time as he was in those parts, confined Philip within “the bounds of the old Kings’ street or high way, which directly leadeth to Paroreia in Thrace, and “in no place declineth toward the sea: but Philip afterwards had made a new caney, and draw it “with a compass about, within which he empaled and took in the Cities & territories also of the “Maronites. To these challenges Philip began far otherwise, than he did of late against the Thessali“ans and Perrehoebians, and in this wise he spake: “I have, quoth he, no matter to debate either “with the Maronites or Enmenes; but now at this present I am to contend even with you, my Ma“sters of Rome;) at whose hands I have seen thus long that I can obtain no reason and equity. I “thought it meet and right, that the Macedonian Cities, which had revolted from me during the “time of truce, should be rendred again unto me: not for any great increase of feignory that “thereby should have accrued unto my kingdom (for small towns they are good wor, and situate up“on the utmost frontiers) but because their precedent and example might have importuned much;
 “to retain the rest of the Macedonians in their duty and allegiance. In no wise it would be gran“ted. During the Ætolian war, I was enjoyned by the Consul Acilius to besiege and assault the “City Lamia: and after I had been toiled out and wearied with maintaining skirmishes, raising “fabricks, planting ordnance and engins against it, even when I was at the very point to scale “the walls and force the City, the Col reclaimed and called me away, yea, and compelled me to “levy the siege, and withdraw my forces from thence: And for to make me some part of amends “for this wrong done, permitted I was to win again and conquer certain small piles and forts, “rather than Cities of Thessaly, Perreboia, and Aschmannia. And even those also, I may say unto “you Q. Cæcilius, ye have taken from me within these few daies. And now forsooth of late, the “Embassadors of Enmenes also (and God will) have presumed upon this as a thing granted and “without all question, That more reason it is for Enmenes to have & enjoy that which belonged “to Antiochus, than for me. But my judgment is far otherwise. And why? Enmenes could never “have continued in his Realm; unless the Romans, I will not say, had vanquished K. Antiochus, “but surely if they had not waged war against him. And therefore is he indebted unto you, and “you no waies beholden unto him. As for my kingdom, so far was it off, that any part or quarter “of it should be in hazard and jeopardy: that when Antiochus of his own meer motion offered “to buy my society with three thousand talents, and fifty covered ships of war, together with “all those Cities in Greece which I held in possession aforetime: I refused all, and disdained his “alliance; yea, and I professed openly, even before that M. Acilius came over with his army into “Greece, that I was his enemy, and together with that Consul, was employed in what part soe“ver of the war, which he charged and laid upon me. Also when L. Scipio the Consul his suc“cessor, determined to lead his army by land to Hellasport, I not only gave him leave to pass “peaceably through my Realm, but also caused the high waies to be paved and gravelled, bridged “to be made against his coming, yea, and furnished him with provision of victuals. And this did “I not in Macedony alone, but also throughout all Thrace; where among other matters, this “was not of least importance and consequence, to restrain those barbarous nations there, from “running upon them, and to keep them in peace and quietness. In consideration now of this “kind affection of mine (If I may not call it a good desert) unto you, whether ought ye Romans “in reason to give me somewhat to that I have, to augment and increase my dominion by your “largels and munificence, or, to take from me (as you do) that which I have either in mine own “right, or by gift from you? The Macedonian Cities, which you confess to have been parcels of “my kingdom, are not restored unto me; Enmenes on the other side, he comes to make spoil of “me, as if I were Antiochus, and (mark I pray you the device of it) he pretendeth a decree of the “ten delegats to colour his most shameless, impudent & cautelous falshood; even that by which “himself may be most refuted and convicted. For in very exprefs and plain-terms it is thus writ“ten, That Chersonesus & Lyfismachia are given to Enmenes. Where I pray you, and in what cor“ner of the instrument and patent stand Enus, Maronea, and the Cities of Thrace? Shall he ob“tain that at your hands, and by your means, as given and granted from those ten Delegats, which “he never durst so much as once demand and requyre of them? Tell me (if the thing be worth so “much) in what place ye would range and reckon me? If your purpose be to persecute me as an “Enemy and mortall foe, spare not, but go on still as ye have begun: but if you respect me as a “King, as your ally and friend, I beseech you, repute me not worthy of so notorious and mani“fest a wrong. This Oration of the King in some measure moved the Commissioners, and there“fore by framing a mean and indifferent answer, they held the matter still in suspense undecided.
 “If (say they) the Cities in question were given to Enmenes, by vertue of a decree set down “by the ten Delegats, we will not change nor alter any thing therein. But in case Philip acqui“red them by Conquest and force of arms, he should have held them as the guerdon of his “victory. If neither, we are of opinion, That the hearing and decision of this difference shall “be referred over to the Senat: and to the end, that all may remain entire, the garrisons in “those

These Cities shall be withdrawn and depopulated. These, I say, were the causes that principally incited the affection of Philip from the Romans; and who, in all contentment in his heart, inasmuch, as evident it is, that the war was not stirred up by his son Perseus upon any new quarrells and freshly occasion, but upon these motives set unto him by his father to be pursued.

No suspicion was there at Rome of a Macedonian war. L. Manlius the Pro Consul was returned out of Spain; and when he demanded a triumph of the Senate assembled in the Temple of Bellona, the same in regard of his noble and worthy exploits might have been obtained, but for example sake it was not granted. For an order it was in Rome, by ancient custome of their forefathers, that no man might triumph, who brought not his army back with him unless he left unto his successor the Province fully subdued and settled in peace. Howbeit, Manlius was allowed an indifferant honours, namely, to enter into the City by way of Ovation. In which solemnity he had borne before him in a pompous pageant two and fifty coronets of gold. Moreover, in gold a hundred thirty two pound weight, and in silver a thousand and three hundred. Also, he pronounced aloud in the Senate, that Q. Fabius the Quæstor was coming, and brought with him ten thousand pound weight more of silver, and eighty of gold, which he meant likewise to bring into the Chamber of the City.

That year a great commotion and insurrection there was of bondslaves in Apulia. L. Porcius Cato the Prætor had the government of Tarentum; and he sat in inquisition upon a damned crew of certain herdsmen and graziers, who had conspired together, and used to rob by the high-way side, and in the common pastures belonging to the City; which Commission he followed with such severity and rigor, that he condemned 7000 of them. Many escaped and fled, but many were executed and suffered death. As for the rest, long were they kept in the City of Rome, about the levy of soldiers, but at length they went into their Provinces.

The same year, C. Calpurnius and L. Quintus the Prætors in Spain, having in the beginning of the Spring led forth their armies out of their wintering holds, and joyned their forces together in Baetica, advanced forward into Carpetania, (where the enemies were encamped) with a resolution on to manage and conduct the war with one joint mind and common council together. Not far from the Cities Hispin and Tollin, there began a skirmish between the forragers of both parties, that were gone forth to make provision: seconded they were from the one camp and the other, by means whereof, the whole armies of both sides by little and little, came forth into the field to strike a full battel. In this tumultuary skirmish, the enemies had the vantage, as well of the ground wherein they were embattelled as of the manner of fight and service. By reason whereof, both the Roman armies were discomfited and driven back into their camp; but the enemies pressed not upon them: not withstanding they were put in great fright and much disordered. The Roman Prætors doubting lest their camp the morrow after should be assailed, dislodged in the night between, in great secret and silence, without any sound of trumpet, and departed. In the morning by break of day, the Spaniards in ordinance of battell approached the trench and rampier: and being entered within the camp (which they found void and empty beyond their hope and expectation) they filled and ransacked all that the Romans left behind them, whiles they made haste away in the night season: from whence the enemies returned to their own camp, and there for certain dates abode in standing leaguer and stilled not.

In that Battell and in the chase together, there were slain of Romans and allies 5000: and with the spoiles of their bodies, the enemies armed themselves: from thence they marched to the river Tagus. The Roman Prætors in the mean season employed all that time to levy and assemble new forces out of the Confederate Cities of Spain, and in comforting and encouraging the hearts of their own soldiers after their fright, upon this adverse conflict and unlucky foil. Now when they had gathered (as they thought) a sufficient power, and took themselves strong enough, and that the soldiers also desired to be doing with the enemy, for to rale out and cancell the former ignomy and disgrace, they encamped twelve miles from the river Tagus aforelaid: and about the third watch of the night advanced their standards, and marching in a four square battell, by day light they were come to the bank of the river (now were the enemies lodged upon a little mount beyond the water;) and inconspicuously in two places (where the river shewed a flood) they waded through with their arms, Calpurnius on the right hand, and Quintus on the left. All this while the enemies continued quiet and moved not: but in the mean time, while as they wondered at their sudden coming, and deviled how to trouble and disorder the soldiers as they should make haste to pass the river, the Romans had transported over themselves, and their bag and baggage also, yea, and brought all together into one place. And because they perceived by this time the enemy to stir and remove, and had no time to fortifie their camp, they put themselves in battell array. In the midst stood the fifth legion of Calpurnius, and the eighth of Quintus, which was the very flower and strength of the whole army. Now they had a fair open plain all the way between them and the enemies camp, as there was no cause to fear any ambush. The Spaniards so soon as they espied two armies of their enemies upon that side of the bank which was next to them, all at once issued out of their camp, and ran to battell: to the end that they might surprise and empeach them, before they could join and range themselves together. The fight was sharp and hot in the beginning: for the Spaniards of the one side were puffed up with the conceit and pride of their late victory. And the Romans of the other, were galled and incensed for anger of a dishonour received, which they were not used unto. The battell in the midst (consisting of two most valiant and hardy legions) fought right courageously; which the enemies seeing, that they could not otherwise teach to retreat and give ground, began to charge upon them with a battailon in close fashion close together; and still they pressed hard upon them in the midst more & more number, and ever thicker ranged. Calphurnius the Praetor seeing this battailon distressed and pressed with all speed L. Quintilius Varus, and L. Junius Tullus, two Legions, to either of the legions severally, to encourage and exhort them to stick to it like men, and to make remembrance and recollection. That in them alone consisted all the hope of conquering and keeping. That they never to little yielded back & lost their ground, there was not one of the whole army that should ever see it again no, nor so much as that the rest of the battailon. As for himself he went with him the Cavalry of two Legions, and when he had wheeled a little about and for a while with them, he charged hard upon the flank of the battailon of the enemies which he assailed, and urged still the main battailon. Quintilius with his Cavalry flanked the enemies on the other side, but the horsemen of Calphurnius fought more fiercely by odds than the other, and the Praetor himself in person was foremost of them all; for he was the first that drew blood of the enemy. So far engaged himself within them, that hardly a man could know of which side he fought by his singular valour, the horsemen were mightily animated; and by the valour of the Cavalry on horseback, the Infantry also were enticed to fight on foot. The principal Centurions were abashed and ashamed to see the Praetor in person among the pikes and swords of his enemies, and therefore every man for his part did his best, put forward the post-ensigns, willing them to advance their banners, to the end that the soldiers might follow hard after. Then they all on all hands to set up a fresh and lusty shout; they took their bier and charged upon them from the vantage of an higher ground; by reason whereof they disarrayed them first, and like a lion the stream they bare them down before them, so as they could not stand upon their feet and sustain this violence of theirs, but fell one upon another. As many as fled toward the camp, the horsemen pursued, and so intermingled themselves among the rout of the enemies, that they could pell mell with them into their hold; where they that were left for the guard thereof, renewed the fight, so that the Roman horsemen were forced to light from their horses; and while they maintained the conflict, the first Legion came to second them, and consequently more and more succours as they possibly could ran to them: down went the Spaniards and were massacred in all parts of the camp; and not above 4000 of them all, fled away and saved themselves, of which number about 3000 (who still kept their armour) seized upon a hill near adjoining: the other thousand being for the most part armed by the balls, were scattered all over the fields. The enemies were at first above 35000, but after this battailon how few of them were left; and from them were won 133 ensigns of Roman and Allies, there died few above six hundred; of auxiliary soldiers from out of the Province, about 150. Five martial Tribunes were lost, and certain Roman Gentlemen, whose death especially made it seem a bloody victory. After which the army abode within the enemies camp, for that themselves had no time to fortify their own. The next morrow Calphurnius in an open audience highly praised the horsemen, and rewarded them with rich harness and trappings, declaring aloud, That by means of their good service principally the enemies were discomfited, and their camp forced. As for Quintilius the other Praetor, he bestowed upon his men of arms, small chains and buttons of gold. The Centurions likewise of both armies received gifts at their hands, and namely, those who fought in the main battailon.

The Consuls having finished the levy of soldiers, and accomplished all things requisite to be done in Rome, led the army into their Province of Liguria. Sempronius departed from Pisa, and made a journey against the Apuan Ligurians, where by wasting their territories and burning their towns and fortresses, he made way into the forest, and opened the passages as far as to the river Macta and the port of Luna. The enemies took a certain mount (an ancient hold) where their ancestors sometimes had feared themselves; but from thence they were by force dispossessed by reason that the Romans overcame the difficulties of the avenues thereto. As Claudius likewise for his part, was equal in valour and good fortune to his Colleague, as having fought certain prosperous battles with the Ligurian Inhabitants. He forced besides his towns of theirs, and took many thousands of prisoners within them. Of the chief authors of that rebellion, he caused three and forty to lose their heads.

Now approached the time of the solemn assembly for election of Magistrate at Rome; and albeit Sempronius his lot it was to hold the said assembly, yet Claudius returned first to Rome, because P. Claudius his brother made suit to be Consul. He had for his competitors, L. Emilius, Q. Fabius Laber, and Servius Sulpicius Galba; all four of the Nobility. Old suitors they were all, and because they had suffered the repulse at sometime, they renewed the suit for this dignity, as being so much the rather due, because it had been once denied them. And this was the cause that these four followed & pressed the harder for to obtain the same, because it was not lawful for any more than one of the Patricii at once to be created Consul. There were also of the Commons certain persons well beloved and of good reputation that stood in election for the place, to wit L. Furius, Q. Terentius Cotta, and Cn. Baebius Tamphilus; they also had taken repulse beforetime, and were put off still in hope one day yet to obtain that honourable dignity. Claudius of them all was only the new Competitor. Now men thought very without any doubt or question, yet and doubtless in their conceits, Q. Fabius Laber and L. Furius to be Consul. But Claudius the Consul together

A together with his brother desired himself and without his Officers attending upon him, travelled and laboured hard in all parts of the common place: notwithstanding the adversities, yet and the most of the Senators cried out upon him, and said, That he ought to consider and remember rather that he was the Cos. of the people of Rome, than brother to P. Claudius: why then sit he not still in the Tribunal either as president and judge of the court assembled, or else as a beholder and spectator only, without saying any word himself? Howbeit, he could not possibly be reclaimed from this disordinate affection, of his which he shewed in labouing for his brother. This election was divers times also troubled with the great debates and contentions caused by the Tribunes of the Commons: whiles some of them spake against the Cos. others again maintained his suit, and took part with him. But in the end, Fabius took the foil, and Appius went a way with the game for

B his brother. So P. Claudius Pulcher was created Cos. beyond his own hope, and more than others looked for. L. Porcius Licinius held his own, and obtained the second place in his course; for that the Commoners went moderately to work, & shewed more so much affection and forcible means, as Claudius did. After this, was holden the election of Praetors. And chosen there were, C. Duellius Flavinus, P. Sempronius Longus, P. Cornelius Cethegus, Q. Nautius Marbo, C. Sulpicius Blaesus, and T. Terentius Varro. Thus much concerning the Consuls, which was achieved both at home in the City, and abroad in the war, that year wherein App. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Consuls.

In the beginning of the next year, in which P. Claudius and L. Porcius bare the Consulate, when as Q. Caecilius, M. Valerius, and T. Sempronius (who had been sent to hear and decide the controversies between the two Kings, Philip and Antiochus, and the States of Thessaly) had made report of their embassages; they permitted likewise the Embassadors of the said Princes and Cities to enter into the Senat. Who related the self-same things again, which had been already before in the presence of the foecial Legats in Gnecet. After this, the C. of the Senat addressed a new embassage into Macedony and Greece; wherein App. Claudius was the chief for to visit and see whether the Cities adjudged and assigned to the Rhodians, Thessalians, and Perinthians were delivered unto them accordingly. They also had in charge to cause the garrisons to quit Demetrius and Marone, and to look that all the sea-coast of Thraciay were freed from the subjection of Philip and the Macedonians. They were enjoined moreover to go into Peloponnesus, from whence the former embassie was departed in more doubtful terms than if they had severed one the other. For ever and besides other things they were sent a way without any answer for their dispatch, and to

D be it they requested the Achaeans for to assemble their general Diet; they might not obtain it. For which, when as Q. Caecilius found himself discontented and grievously complained, and the Lacedaemonians withall made pious moan, that the walls of their City were demolished and razed down, the common people lead away in captivity into Achaia, and there sold, and the laws of Lysimachus taken from them, under which their City and Common-weal until that day had been maintained and governed: the Achaeans excused themselves most of all for the imputation of refusing to hold a Council; and to that purpose they rehearsed a Law and Ordinances, whereby they were forbidden expressly to call and publish a Diet, unless it were in the case of levying war, and contracting of peace, upon occasion that any embassadors came directly unto them from the Senat, or with letters, or commission in writing. But for that this manner of excuse should not serve their turn again afterwards, the Senat gave them plainly to understand, that they ought to take care and order, that the Roman Embassadors might at all times have means of free access to their Councils, like as they also reciprocally should have a Senat held for their sakes, as often as they would themselves.

After these embassages were departed, Philip was advertised by his Embassadors, that there was no remedy, but he must abandon those Cities, and withdraw his garrisons: and herewith being mightily offended & angry against all, yet he discharged his choler only upon the Maronites. Up to Onomastus, warden of the ports and sea-coasts, he gave commandment to kill the chief of the adverse part. And he by the means of Cassander, one of the Kings supporters and favorites, who a long time had dwelt in Marone, procured certain Thracians to be let into the town by night, & there F he committed murder and massacre, as if it had been a City won by force of arms. And when the Roman embassadors made complaint to him, namely of such outrages committed so cruelly against the guiltless Maronites, and so proudly and insolently against the people of Rome: in that they should be killed and cut in peeces as enemies, unto whom the Senat had ordained restitution of their freedom he made answer and said, that neither himself, nor any of those who belonged unto him, could do withall: but it was long of themselves and their variance one with another: whiles some of the Citizens drew to him, and others inclined to King Antiochus. Which ye may (qd. he) soon know to be a truth, if ye will but ask the Maronites themselves: For this account he made, that whiles they were all terrified with so late and fresh a massacre, there durst not one of them open his mouth against him. Appius replied again, and said, That they were not to make an enquiry in this so evident and notorious a fact, as if it were in any respect doubtful: but if he would discharge and clear himself as innocent of the action, he should send to Rome Onomastus and Cassander, who were named to have committed the outrage, that the Senat might examine them upon interrogatories. This word at the first so troubled and dashed the King, that his colour went and came in his face, & he knew not how to keep his countenance. But after he was come again to himself he made answer, That (if they needs would) he cared not much to send Cassander, for that he had dwelt & continued in Marone; but as for Onomastus, who neither was at Marone, nor nor so much as in any quarter near unto is how possibly could be discharged or touched with the H matter? Now as he spared Quintus the father of the twin, and was loath to have him come in question; so being his more dear and honourable friend, so he spared him much more than the other; lest he should betray and disclose the thing; for that himself had conferred with him thereunto; and besides, he had served him as a Minister to execute, and been privy unto him as a complice to plot such like dangerous things. Cassius also, as it is verily thought, was poisoned and made away, by means that were made of purpose to accompany him through Spain to the sea side; and all because the villainy should not be detected and come to light. Thus the Boians departed from the pancy and conference with Philip; as shewing in their countenances that they were nothing well pleased; and Philip on the other side went his way as refo-lute to levy war again; but forasmuch as his forces as yet were not sufficient to do any exploit, and for as much as he would delay the time between, he determined to send his younger son Demetrius to Rome, both to purge his father of those matters wherewith he was charged; and also by humi-ble request to appease the anger of the Senat; supposing; that this young gentleman, who had been left as an hostage at Rome, and these had shewed a good testimony of a Princely nature and good disposition, might much avail to his cause. In the mean while himself undertook of alliding the Bizantins, but so very much to strike home versus into the Princes of Thrace, made an expedition against them; and when he had in one battell discomfited them, and taken prisoner their chief Captain Andron, he returned into Asperus, having sent certain messengers to folk in the barbarous nations, inhabiting near the river Helespont, for to enter and invade Italy. In Pelo- ponnesus also the coming of the Roman Legats was expected; whereby this commission were enjoy-ned to the point of Asperus in order to fight against whom became the Achians would not be to further as to say Lysander their Prator summoned a publicke Council aforehand, in which there was partly as touching the Lacedemonians, namely, how that of enemies they were become informers and accusers; and danger it was, lest when they were vanquished they would be more to be feared than all the time that they waged war. For during the war the Achians found the Romans to be their good associates; but now the same Romans are more friendly to the Lacedemo- niens; than to the Achians; seeing that Draco and Alcibiades (banished persons both out of Lace- demon, and by the means of the Achians restored again to their place) had undertaken to go in embassage to Rome against the Achians; which had so well deserved at their hands; and there gave so hard language against them, as if they had been chased and driven out of their country; and not restored to the place by them. Hereupon arose a great outcry from all parts of the assembly for to put to question, what Office should be determined expressly of them by name; and in this fit where all were by vote, and nothing by counsel; condemned they were to die. Some few did take name the Roman Embassadors, for whose sake a Council was holden at Citium, a City in Laconia. But before any matter was treated on the Achians were surprised with exceeding fear, considering and thinking how this deciding of matters was not like to be managed and carried with any indifference; but in behalf of forasmuch as they saw Draco and Alcibiades condemned by them in the last Council, to be in the company of the said Embassadors, and no man durst open his lips and speak a word. Appian declared, That the Senat was much displeased at those matters whereof the Lacedemonians had made complaint; namely, That first in a tumultuary fray and conflict, they were murdered, who had been called forth by Philypus, and came to plead and speak in their own cause; Then, lastly they had celebrated their cruelty thus against their persons, to the end, that in no part their inhumanity should be wanting, they had rased the walls of a right noble and famous City, abolished their most ancient laws, and put down the discipline and governments of Lycurgus, so renowned throughout all nations. When Appian had made an end of his speech, then Lysander (both in regard that he was Prator, and also because he took part with the faction of Philopomenus (who was the author of all that had been done at Lacedemon) made answer in this wise: More hard it is for us now, O Appian, to speak before you, than of late it was in the presence of the Senat. For then we were to answer the Lacedemonians, who accused us; Shunne this present we have you to hear our accusers, before whom, as competent judges we should plead in our own defence. Howbeit, we have submitted our selves, and undergone this unequal and hard condition, presuming upon this hope, that you will lay aside that accusatory heat to which not long since you used, and put upon you the person of a Judge to hear with indifference and equity. For mine own part, considering that you ere while have but related those matters which the Lacedemonians both here in place before Q. Cavilius of late, and also at Rome afterwards complained of, I would think that I am to answer therefore not unto you, but unto them in your hearing. You charge us with the murdering of them, who being called out by the Prator to Philopomenus to plead their cause, were killed. This crime I hold that it ought not to be objected against us by you Romans, no more so much by any other in your audience. And why so? because it was expressly specified in your own treaty and accord of covenants, that the Lacedemoni- ans should have nothing to do with the maritime Cities. At what time as the Lacedemonians took arms, and seized by force in the night those Cities, which they were precisely forbidden to meddle withall, T. Quintus, if the Roman army had been in Peloponnesus, as aforetime no doubt we must needs think, that being thus surprised and evil entreated, they would have had recourse thither for succour. But since ye were so far off, whither else should they flee and retire themselves, but to us your allies, whom they had seen before to help and succour Gythium?

 whom

A "whom upon the like cause they were to have assisted. Lacedæmonians together with you & it was in of your quarrel therefore that we entered a just and lawful war. Which being an act of ours, by others commended, and which ought not by the very Lacedæmonians to be condemned; and considering that even the Gods themselves have approved thereof in that they gave victory, how cometh it then to pass, that you bring those matters into question which are by right of law warranted? And yet a great part thereof in no respect toucheth and concerneth you. That we called them to some forth to answer their cause, who had raised a commotion of the multitude, who had forced the maritime Cities, who had ravished them, who also had massacred the principal citizens. We are so answer therefore, and so as that properly appertaineth. But that they were massacred in the way as they came into our camp, was nothing to us, but your deed O Apian, and Alcibiades who now (forsooth) say he some our executioners. The banished Lacædæmonians (of which number those two also are, and who at that time were with us, for that they chose the coast Towns to retire into for their habitations) supposing that their own death was sought, and that there would have been outrage committed upon them, they ran upon those by whose means they were driven out of their country; even upon an indignation, that they might not so much as pass their old age in banishment with safety. They were the Lacædæmonians, not the Achæans that slew the Lacedæmonians whether justly or unjustly, that is not the question, neither skilleth it. But what say ye to this O Achæans: how can ye deny but that ye are culpable, in that ye have abolished the Laws and the most ancient discipline of Lycurgus, and withal raked the walls of Sparta? And how is it possible that both these C "points should be objected unto us by the same men? considering that those walls were never built by Lycurgus but contrary-wise (and not many years past) for to overthrow and annul the discipline instituted by Lycurgus? For the tyrants of late daies built them to serve as a fortress and bulwark for themselves, and not for a defence unto the City. And if Lycurgus at this day should rise again from death to life, he would take joy in their ruins, and say that he acknowledged now his own native country, and ancient Sparta indeed. You Lacedæmonians should not have expected Philopomen nor the Achæans but yourselves ought with your own hands to have pulled down and destroyed, all the tokens and memorials of tyranny. Those walls were the very marks and as a map would say, the emblem and deformed scars of your tyranny and ferricide. And you who without walls for the space almost of 800 years had lived in freedom, D "yet and for a certain time also had been masters of Greece, became slaves during a hundred years, enclosed and restrained within walls, as it ye had been fettered by the feet. Now as touching the laws, which ye pretend to have been taken away by us, I suppose verily that the tyrants they were who deprived the Lacedæmonians of their ancient laws, and that we have not taken from them theirs (for none they had of their own) but rather have given them ours: neither have we done otherwise than well by them, but regarded much the good of their City and Commonwealth, in that we have joined them in our solemn court of Parliament and incorporated them as unto us to the end, that in all Peloponnesus, there should be but one body, one State, and one Council. Then (I wot ye will) they might have justly complained to have been wronged, when they might have cried, and said they had not been wronged, in case we our selves had lived E "under one kind of laws, and put them to be ruled by others. I know full well, O Apian, that all my speech hitherto is neither bestowing allies to us, nor detest and meet for a nation that is free, but rather (to speak more truly) for slaves debating before their masters. For if that sound of the trumpet, that voice of the publick crier were not to vainly stir by ye, and kindle and declare that we Achæans before all others should be free: in the confederation stand firm and stable: if our alliances and amity be entertained and observed equally, and indifferently, why demand not I of you Romans what you did after the winning of Capua? Set G "your own will have no Achæans to make account unto you, what we did to the Lacedæmonians whom we conquered by war? Set case that we caused some of them to be killed. What of that?
 Commanded not you (Apian) that the Senators of Capua should lose their heads? We have demolished the walls indeed, but ye have not only ruined their walls, but wholly ruined their City and territory. But (you will say) the confederation is in behalf of the Achæans in equal and indifferent to our own advantage, and in truth and effect their liberty dependeth upon the good will and pleasure of the Romans, who indeed have the pre-eminence of the seignory and dominion besides. I know it, Apian, as well as you can tell me, yes, and (although it behoveth me now to be) I am not so much offended and displeased therewith. But this I think you) let there be as great odds and difference as ye will between us Achæans and you Romans, provide this only, that your enemies and ours be not with you in as good regard and account as they should be, neither in their degree and condition, than we your allies and associates. For that they should be equal to us, we have been the cause in that we granted them our own laws, in that we admitted them to be incorporate in the general Diet of the Achæan State and commonalty. But will ye have the truth? the conquered have not sufficient to content and satisfy the conquerors: except demand more than allies have and enjoy, and those things which have confirmed by oath, ratified and consecrated by monuments and instruments of writing, can we long retain in hope for a perpetual memory to all posterity, they would force and wrest from us by eviltoken our property. For it is, O Romans, we honour and reverence you, and if you will needs have it so, we dread and fear you also, for ye do us more both honour and also fear the im-

immortal Gods more than you. And then he had with the second and consent of the greater part: H and all men judged, that he had spoken like a Magistrate indeed; and for the dignity and majesty of his place in such sort, as it was easily seen, that they were never able to hold their religion and conscience in their authority with the Romans; in case they went coldly to work and proceeded in mild terms with them. Then Appian answered and said, That he would gladly advise and persuade them, all that he possibly could, to be reconciled unto the Lacedæmonians; whilst they might do it with full contentments for fear lest soon after they should be constrained and forced to seek unto them against their wills and maugre their hearts. At this word they all laughed and groned again; but afraid they were and durst not refuse to do that which they were commanded. This petition only they made unto the Romans, that as touching the Lacedæmonians they would change & alter what they thought good; and not force the Achæans to sin against their conscience, in dismantling those things which they had established and ratified with a solemn oath. So the sentence of condemnation only (lately passed against Arcus and Alcibiades) was reversed.

In the beginning of this year (when at Rome they had sited in consultation about the Provinces of Consuls and Pretors) Liguria was assigned unto the Consuls for their charge and government, because there was no war in any other place. Then the Pretors cast lots for theirs. To C. Decimius Flavinus fell the jurisdiction of the City; and to P. Cornelius Cethegus that other between Citizens and forrainers: C. Sempronius had the government of Sicily, and Q. Nevius Mathe of Sardinia; with constitution also to sit upon the inquisition in case of poisoning. A. Terentius Varro was deputed L. Governor of high Spain; and P. Sempronius Longus of the low. Out of those 2 Provinces it fell first; that there came much about the same time two Lieutenants; L. Juvenius Tulo and T. Quintilius Varus; who having related before the Senat how great a war was now dispatched and finished in Spain, acquired withal, that there should be rendred praise and thanks to the immortal Gods for the happy success in the wars; and likewise that the Pretors might be permitted to bring away their armies. So there was a solemn procession ordained to be holden two dayes; but as touching the reduction of the armies, they gave order to refer it wholly to be debated at what time as there should be session about the armies of Consuls and Pretors together. Some few dayes after it was ordained, that the Consuls should have with them into Liguria two legions a piece; which Ap. Claudius and M. Sempronius had the conduct of. As touching the Spanish forces, great contention there was between the new Pretors and the friends of C. Appianus and Q. Minus in their absence. Both sides had Tribuns and both had Consuls to take part with them. The Tribuns attempted to cross the act of the Senat if they ordained that the armies should be brought home. The Consuls again protested, that if the Tribuns thus opposed their negative, they would not suffer any other decree and ordinance to pass. In conclusion, the respect of those that were absent; was of less importance; and an act of the Senat was entered; That the Pretors should not add above 4000 men of Romans and 400 horsemen; likewise 5000 foot and as many horse of Lacedæmonians to conduct with them into Spain. And when they had thus enrolled these four full legions, look what surplusage there remained over and above 5000 foot and 500 horse in a legion, they should give them their congied and dismiss them out of soldiery; first, as many as had served out their full time, and then those who had born themselves most valiantly in the war under Calpurnius and Quintilius.

After this debate and variance was appeased, there arose another in the neck of it, occasioned by the death of P. Decimius the Pretor, C. Licinius and L. Pappius (who had been Ediles the last year before) likewise C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter, and Q. Fulvius Placcus, laboured to be in his room late deceased. As for the last of these rehearsed (because he was Edile Curule) he brewed not himself in his white robe; but he made more means and laboured above all the rest, having to his adversary and concurrent the Flamin above said. At the first he seemed equal only unto him in the suit, but afterwards when he began to have the better of him, certain Tribuns of the Commons stood upon this point, and alledged, That his name was not to be accepted as eligible; for that one and the self same person might neither take nor exercise at one time, the conjunction of two Magistracies; and namely, both Curule or of State. Others again said, that it was meet and reason that he were dispensed with and exempt from the Law; in that behalf to the end, that the people might be at liberty to elect whom they would for Pretor. L. Porcius the Consul was first of this resolution, not to admit his name; and afterwards, because he would seem to do by warrant and authority of the Senat, he assembled the LL. together and said, that he propounded and put to question before them, That forasmuch as an Edile elected sued to be Pretor without all right, or any precedent tolerable in a free State; for his own part he was minded (unless they were of a contrary opinion) to hold the general assembly for the election according to law. Then the LL. gave their advice, that L. Porcius the Consul, should continue and treat with Q. Fulvius, that he would be no hinderance, but that the assembly for the substitution of a Pretor in the room of C. Decimius departed, might be holden by order of law. As the Consul was thus in hand with him according to the act of the Senat, Placcus made answer, That he would do nothing against his own person. By this doubtful and indifferent answer of his he put those in good hope who expounded and construed as they would have it; that he would accommodate and apply himself to the authority of the LL. of the Senat; but at the time of the election he sued more earnestly than before, complaining of the Consul and Senat. That they wrong and wrested out of his hands the benefit of the people of Rome intended unto him; and to bring him into ill will and obloquy.

A obloquy of the people, they made much ado about two officers and a double dignity: as if all the world saw not, that after he were declared and pronounced Pretor, he would incontinently resign up the Edileship. The Consul perceiving both him fully resolute and set upon a pitch in the suit, and also the favor and affection of the people inclined more and more toward him, brake up the assembly aforesaid, and called a Senat: where, in a frequent session of Senators it was ordained, That for as much as Flaccus was little or nothing moved with the authority of the LL. of that honorable court, he was to be dealt withal in a general assembly before the body of the people. When the people were met together at the summons of the Consul, he proposed the matter unto him before them. Flaccus released never a jot, but persisted still in his opinion, and gave the people of Rome thanks for their favour, in that they shewed themselves willing to elect him Pretor; B so often as they had time and place wherein they might testify and declare their love to him: which affectionate kindness of his fellow citizens, he never meant to reject and abandon. This constant and resolute speech of his, kindled and enflamed so great love and affection in them toward him, that past all peradventure he had been chosen Pretor out of hand, in case the Consul would have received his name. Much strife and debate there was amongst the Tribuns, one against another, yea, and between them and the Consul, until at length the Consul held a Senat, and there a decree passed in this wise. That forasmuch as the willfull stub bornels of Q. Flaccus of one side, and the inordinat affection of men on another side, was such, as the solemn assembly for subelecting of a Pretor in the place of the deceased, could not be holden according to the laws, the Senat agreed and resolved, that there were already Pretors enough, and P. Cornelius should administer C and execute both jurisdictions in the City, and exhibit the playes and games in the honour of Apollo.

After this troublesome debate about the election, was by the sage wisdom and valorous courage of the Senat suppressed, there arose another far greater, by how much the thing was of weightier importance, and the persons agents therein more in number. and for quality and place mightier. There stood in election to be Censors (and that with earnest endeavour and exceeding heat of contention) L. Valerius Flaccus, P. and L. both Scipios; Cn. Manlius Vulso, and L. Furius Purpureo, all Patricii. And of commoners, M. Porcius Cato, M. Fulvius Nobilior, T. and Marcus both Simplicii, the one surnamed Longus, the other Tuditanus. But M. Porcius over-went them all by many degrees, as well those of the Patricians as also of the commons, notwithstanding they were come of most noble families. This man carried with him so vigorous a spirit and pregnant wit, that howsoever he were born and defended, it seemed he was able to make way of himself to advancement and honour. He wanted no Art and skill meet and requisite for the managing either of private business of his own, or publick affairs of State: cunning he was in country husbandry, as well as in civil policy. Some are advanced to the highest dignities and most honourable places, by their deep knowledge in the law; others attain to promotion by eloquence: and there be again, who have risen and become great through martial prowels and feats of arms. But this man was by nature so estimable and pleasant to all alike, that whatsoever he addicted and gave himself unto, a man would have said, he had been born and framed even from his mothers womb to it and to nothing else. To war, a most hardy and valiant souldier: and in many foughten fields highly renowned. Being mounted once to high places of honorable calling, a right excellent commander he proved, and General of an army. In peace again for sound counsel in the civil law, passing well learned: for pleading at the bar and making orations, most eloquent. Neither carried he himself so, that his tongue flourished only whilst he lived, as leaving no monument behind him of his singular eloquence; but it liveth, say, it flourisheth still, immortalized as it were and recommended to posterity in all kind of writing. Orations of his there be extant many, which he penned and pronounced as well in his own cause as for the defence of his friends yea, and invectives also against others: for albeit he was to put down and weary his adversaries, not only by declaiming and accusing them, but also by pleading his own cause. Fierious quarrels and enmities there were exceeding many, that tormented him; and he plagued others with as many: and hard it is to say or set down, whether he were urged and pressed upon by the nobility, or himself coustled and baited them more. Doubtless by nature he was austere and rigorous, his speech was sharp biting, and beyond measure plain and free. But he carried a mind with him that stooped to no desires and lusts whatsoever: his life so severe and precise, as it was untouched and without all spot of blame: despising all flouting favours, and condemning earthly riches. In thrift and frugality, in sobriety, in patience, in endurance of travail and danger, his body was steel to the very back. And as for his mind and courage, it was such, as very age and time (which abateth and consumeth all things else) was not able to break and dent: when he was fourscore years old and six, he pleaded at the bar for others, he made orations for his own defence, and wrote books: and in the ninetieth year of his age he consulted Seneca before the people to receive his judgment by them. As all his life time before the nobility was set against him, so when he stood now to be Censor, they pressed hard upon him: inasmuch as all his competitors (excepting L. Flaccus, who had been his colleague in the Consulship) conspired together, how they might give him the repulse and put him besides the Censorship, not only for that their own teeth watered, and they were desirous themselves to part of that honor, not because they repined to see a new risen Gentleman, and one of the first head of the Censor, but also because they looked for no other, but that his Censorship would be rigorous and prejudicial to the name and reputation of divers men; considering how he had been crossed and hate by very many, and was desirous himself to wait them a shrewd turn, and be met with them again. For even then, while he laboured and fued for the place, he used minatory speeches, and gave out, that they only were opposed against him, who feared they should have a Censorship sharply exercised without partiality and respect of persons. And herewith he maintained and upheld the suit of L. Valerius with him, saying that if he had but him of all others to be his colleague, he should be able to repress the wicked enormities newly come up and rise in the City, and to bring in request again the ancient manners and fashions of the old world. Men were much moved in these respects and considerations: and so maugre the heads of the nobility, they not only created him Censor, but also adjoynd unto him L. Valerius for his companion in that government.

After the election of Censors was ended, the Consuls and Pretors took their journeys into their several Provinces, all save Q. Naevius: who before that he could go into Sardinia, was staid behind no less than four months, about certain inquisitions of poisoning: whereof, he fate upon many without the City of Rome, in corporate burroughs, market Towns and places of great resort, for that he thought that manner of proceeding more convenient. And if we list to believe V. Annius, he condemned two thousand persons.

Sensibly, L. Posthumus the Pretor, (unto whom the government of Tarentum by lot fell) did good justice upon great conspiracies made by certain grasers: and with great care and diligence followed the enquest of the Bacchanals, and dispatched the reliques thereof quite and clean. Many of them who were adjourned and made not appearance, but gave the slip and left in the lurch their sureties bound body and goods for them, and lurked in that quarter of Italy: he either judged and condemned as guilty and convicted, or caused them to be apprehended and sent to Rome unto the Senat: who were all cast in prison by P. Cornelius.

In the farther part of Spain all was quiet, by reason that the Lusitans were in the last war subdued: but in the hither part, A. Terentius forced Corbis a Town of the Suesetans, which he assaulted with mantlets and other fabricks of war, and sold all the prisoners: which done, he passed the winter peaceably in that higher part of Spain also.

The old Pretors, C. Calpurnius Piso and L. Quintius returned to Rome; and both of them were with great accord and consent of the LL. of the Senat allowed to triumph. And first C. Calpurnius triumphed over the Portugals and Celtiberians. In which triumph, he carried in shew 83 coronets of gold, and 12000 pound of silver. Within few dayes after, L. Quintius triumphed over the same Portugals and Celtiberians. In which solemnity, there was represented in shew, as much gold and silver as in the former.

The Censors, M. Porcius and L. Valerius, while men hung in suspense between fear and hope what they would do, held a review and a new choice of the Senat. Seven Senators they displaced and deposed from that dignity: amongst whom, there was one of mark, for his nobility of birth and honorable offices which he had born, namely, L. Quintius Flaminius who had been Consul. An ancient order (they say) it was in time of our fore-fathers, That when the Censors had put any out of the Senat, they should note them directly for those faults which they had committed: and at this day, extant there be divers incorporations of Cato, against them whom either he cast and displaced out of Senat, or from whom he took away honours of service: but of all others, the fourest and bitterest is that of his, against this L. Quintius: which if he had pronounced as an accuser before he had noted him with that disgrace, and not as Censor after the said note, his very own brother T. Quintius (if he had been then Censor) could not possibly have kept L. Quintius in the state of a Senator. Among other grievous matters he uttered against him, That he had trained with him from Rome into his Province of France (in hope of many great rewards) one Philippus Pannus, a notorious and costly Ganymede. This boy, as he was fooling and playing the wanton with the said Quintius then Consul, used to upbraid him with this, That he was had away from Rome, against the very time that the shew of sword-players at utterance was to be exhibited: and this he said, to shew how ready he was to satisfy the pleasure of him his lover. Now it chanced as they were making good cheer together, and having taken their wine liberally were well heat therewith, news came and reported it was in the banker time. That a certain noble man of the Bolians was arrived, with his children as a renegar from the adverse part: and was desirous to speak with the Consul, for to have assurance from his mouth of safe conduct: who being brought into the pavilion began to parly with the Consul by a Frenchman or interpreter. And in the mids of his speech: How said thou (quoth Quintius to that wantonly his Ganymede) because thou hast missed and lost the sight of those sword-players at Rome, wilt thou see presently here this Frenchman die in the place before? He made not any great semblance unto him in good earnest of his desire that way: but the Consul at the first beck of that heathly rich and baggage, caught the naked sword which hung over his head, and first gave the poor Gaul a wound in his sponce as he was speaking unto him, and afterwards as he made shift to rise from him, and called upon the protection of the people of Rome, and the assistance of those that were present, Quintius ran him quite through the sides, Valerius Annius, who never had read the opinion of Cato, but gave credit to a flying fable only, without any head or author, telleth the tale with some other circumstance howbeit much like in substance of matter, as touching his lecherous lust and bloody cruelty. He writeth that Quintius while he shode at Flaminius, sent for a famous courtesan upon whom he was enamored, to a banquet; and as he courted and made love to this strumpet, vaulting himself unto her, among other discourses he recovered with what rigor he had followed certain inquisitions: what a number of prisoners he had in irons condemned to death; and how many of their heads he minded to chop off. Then this harlot, sitting down beneath him, said, That she had never in all her life seen any man to cut ones head off, and it was a sight that of all other she would faint see. Whereupon a noble and amorous knight to gratify the queen, caused one of those poor souls condemned to die, to be set out of prison into the banquetting room, and presently to be beheaded before her face. A cruel fact it was, inhuman, whether it were commended as Cato hath objected in his Oration, or as Plinius hath written in his story, that any human creature should be thus massacred like a sacrifice, and the table besprinkled with his blood, amid the cups standing full of wine, and the dishes furnished with viands, where and when the manner and custome was to raise and raise the fifth essay in the honor of the Gods, and that devoutly with grace and good prayers; and all to content and feed the eye of a wanton and shameless Harlot, lying in the bosome of the Consul. In the end of Cato his Oration, this condition was offered unto Quintus, That if he would plead anguile, and deny this fact and others which he charged him with, then he should put in a real caution, and stand to his defence and trial: but if he confessed himself guilty, then he willed him to consider whether he thought any man would grieve and be sorry at the ignominie which he was to receive, who being transported beside his understanding with wine and women, made but a sport and pastime to shed mens blood, as a very banker. In taking a review of the Cavalry or Gentlemen of Rome, L. Scribo, Asiatum had his great horse of service taken from him. This Cenforship was likewise executed with severity and rigor to all sorts and degrees, and namely, in the pricing and valuation of their goods. For Cato commanded the Sergeants to take a note of all the ornaments, jewels, and apparel of women; also of their chariots and coaches if they amounted to the sum of 15000 asses, and to enrol the same in the Cenfors book, Item all bondslaves under twenty years of age, sold after the last tax or assessment for 10000 Asses or upward, that they should be valued at an higher price by ten fold than they were esteemed worth: and that for all these things they should pay and contribute to the City chamber after three in the thousand. These Cenfors cut off all water either running out of any common stream into a privat house, or derived into particular fields and grounds. And all houses either built by private persons upon common ground, or any wayes encroaching and leaning to publike places they caused to be demolished and pulled down within thirty dayes. After this, they set out divers peeces of work to be wrought at a price, of that money which was ordained to that purpose, namely, to pave certain pools with stone, to scoure the draughts and sinks where need was: and in the mount Aventine and other parts where none were already to make new. And particularly of themselves Flaccus caused the causey, or wharfe to be made against the waters called Nepunia, that the people might passe to and fro that way: and also a street-way through Formianum. And Cato for his part built two galleries, Munium and Titium, in the Mineries; and bought four shops for the City: he built there also the stately Hall or Palace called Palatia. As for the City revenues, they did let and let them forth to farmers, at an exceeding rackt rent: but all the City works they put out to undertakers by the great, at as low a reckoning as they could. These leases and bargains aforesaid being once cancelled by order from the Senat, and new made at the importunar suit and that with importunities and tears of the Publicans, as well farmers as undertakers; then the Cenfors by proclamation commanded those to avoid far from the subhastation, who had disannulled the former leases, and bargains, and with some little abatement and easing of the former rents, they demised the same profits and revenues again to others. This was a cenforship of great note, full of rapine, ill will, and hear-burning, which troubled and molested M. Porcius as long as he had a day to live, for that he was reputed and held to be the author of that severity and rigor exercised therein.

The same year two Colonies were erected and inhabitants sent from Rome, to wit, Pollentia into the Picene territory, and Pisaurum into the Gauls country. Six acres of land were assigned to every one of the coloners. And the same Triumvirs, namely, Q. Fabius, Labeo, M. Fulvius, Flaccus, and Q. Fulvius, Nobilis, were they that both parted the said lands, and also had the leading and planting of the foresaid Colonies.

The Consul that year achieved no memorable exploit at all, neither at home in City, nor abroad in war. Against the year following they created Consuls M. Claudius, Marcellus and Q. Fabius, who upon the fifteenth of March, on which day they entered into their government, put to question as concerning the Provinces, as well their own as the Pretors. For there had been chosen Pretors C. Valerius the Flamin of Iupiter (who also the year before was in election for the place) Sp. Posthumius, Albinus, and P. Cornelius, Sisenna, also L. Pappius, L. Julius, and Cn. Sicinius. Unto the Consuls was assigned the province Liguria, together with the charge of the same armies, which P. Claudius and M. Porcius had conducted. As for both the Provinces in Spain (as well beyond as on this side Iberia) they were reserved with their ordinary forces, for the Pretors of the former year by special commission without calling any lots at all therefore. The new Pretors were enjoined for to dispose and part their governments, that C. Valerius the Flamin of Iupiter might exercise one of the jurisdictions of Rome, so he was L. chief justice for the forrainers, and Sisenna Cornelius over the citizens. Unto Sp. Posthumius fell Sicily, to L. Pappius Apulia, to L. Julius Gallia, and to Cn. Sicinius Sardinia. As for L. Julius he was enjoined to make haste and set forward on his journey, for the Transalpin Gauls (beyond the mountains) had passed over by the streights of the forrests and water unknown beforetime, into Italy, as hath been aforesaid, and were building them, a Town in that territory, which at this day is called Agathina. This Prefect had by him good men to peache him in that enterprise, so far forth as he might possibly without war and force of arms and if there were no other remedy but that they must of necessity use violence, then to remedy that Consiltherof: for agreed it was that one of them should lead the Legions against the Gauls. In the end of the former year there was a general assembly holden for the choosing of an Augur whom in Sp. Posthumius Albinus was created in the room of Q. Cornelianus Emilius late deceased. But in the beginning of this present year P. Licinius Crassus the sixth Pontifex departed out of this world, in whose place M. Sempronius Tudicenus was invested for the Bishop. But C. Servilius Geminus was created the arch-pielar or high-priest aforesaid. In the honor of P. Licinius at his funerals, there was given a dole of flesh and a shew exhibited of two sword-fencers fighting with sharp: likewise there were represented funeral plaies and games, which continued three dayes and after that solemnity, a feast was holden during which, when the tables were set & spread accordingly all over the grand place of the City, suddenly there arose a tempest with great storms, which forced most men to erect tents and booths there: but after a while when the weather was fair again, they were taken down and had away: and men commonly gave out and said, That whereas the Prophets & wizards had foretold among other their fatal prelages that they should be forced to quarter & pitch tents in the market place of Rome: now that prophesie was fulfilled, and they were freed and excused from farther danger. And no sooner were they eased and delivered of that scruple, but they were troubled with another, for that it had rained blood two daies in the court-yard of Vatican and the Decemvirs published a solemn supplication for the expiation of that prodigious sign.

Before that the Consuls departed into their provinces, they brought into the Senat for to have audience, the embassages come from beyond Sea. And never before that day were so many men of those forrain parts seen at Rome. For from the time that the bruit was blown abroad amongst the nations bordering upon Macedony, that the Romans gave no desear to the complaints and accusations commened against Philip, and that many had sped well by complaining: every City and State in their own behalf, yea, and many privat persons in particular (for an ill neighbour he was to them all) repaired to Rome, in hope either to be righted and eased of their wrongs, or to discharge their stomacks and be moned and comforted for their miseries. Likewise from King Eumenes there arrived an embassage accompanied with his own brother Athenas to make complaint, as finding themselves grieved that the garisons were not withdrawn out of Thracia, as also to inform that Philip had sent certain aids into Bithynia to Prusias who made war upon Eumenes. Now Demetrius (Philip his son) at that time a very yong Gentleman, was to answer to all these challenges: and an easy peece of work it was not, either to bear in mind all the matters objected, or to think upon the points of every answer accordingly. For over and besides that the articles were many in number, most of them were of very small consequence and importancie: namely, arise about limits and land-marks, about carrying away men and ravishing women, of driving of cattel, of ministering justice partially and with affection or else of none ministered at all: of sentences given and judgments passed in causes either by force or for favour. The Senat perceiving that neither Demetrius could speak to these points and give them good evidence, nor themselves be well informed and cleely instructed by him: being moved also and grieved to see the youth so raw a scholer in these affairs, and therewith much troubled in spirit, gave order to enquire and demand of him, Whether he had received any notes in writing from his father, as touching the premises? And when he answered and said, Yea, they thought the first and principal thing for them to do was, to see and hear what were the answers of the King to every specialty and particular. And thereupon they presently called for that book of his fathers, and then permitted him to read the contents thereof. Now therein were set down certain brief abstracts of pleas and defenses to each severall point: shewing Imprimis, that some things he had done according to the decrees & awards of the Roman Delegates and commissioners, Item, Whereas he had left somewhat undone, the default was not in him but in the very parties that accused him. He had interlaced between certain grievances and complaints, as touching the iniquity and hard penning of those decrees: and how matters were not scanned and debated before Cacilius with that indifferency and equity as was meet and requisite: and natally that without desert of his part, all men were set against him and insulted over him. The Senat collected hereby good arguments, how the heart of Philip was wounded and galled against the Romans. But when the yong Prince excused some of these matters, and for the rest promised and undertook, that all should be done to the uttermost as it pleased the Senat to order and set down: then it was thought good to deliver this answer unto him: That his father had in nothing done better nor more to the contentment of the Senat, than that he seemed willing (howsoever matters were passed already) to make satisfaction to the Romans by the means of his son Demetrius. As for the Senat, they could dissemble, forget, put up and endure many things done and past: yea, and were perswaded verily in their hearts, that they might believe and trust Demetrius as knowing assuredly, that although they sent his body again to his father Philip, yet they had his heart and affection with them still, as a sure pledge and hostage: and that he was a friend to the people of Rome, so far forth as his reverent duty to his father would permit and give him leave: telling him withal to understand, that for to do him honor, they would send Embassadors into Macedony: to the end that if ought had not been so fully effectuated as it should have been, it might be done yet in good time, without imputation of fault and blame, or partial satisfaction to be made for any thing hitherto omitted: yea, and desirous they were, that Philip should understand thereby the

A the mediation of Dionysius and for his sake, he stood year in good terms of peace and friendship with the people of Rome. These things he did and done for the increase of credit and reputation, presently turned to the displeasure of the young Gentlemen; and in the end to his utter ruin and overthrow.

Then were the Lacedæmonians admitted to audience in the Senate. They moved many petty matters and trifling considerations; but that which principally touched the main point was whether to win Whether they should be restored again to the Achæans had condemned; or not. Whether they were justly or unjustly killed whom they murdered. Moreover they put to question, Whether the Lacedæmonians were to be condemned within the general assembly and Council of Achæa; or, that this State (as before times) should have their rights and franchises apart by themselves from all others in Peloponnesus. The Senate ordained and awarded imprætoris, That they should be restored. Item, That the sentence pronounced against them, should be reversed. That Epicharmus should do service to this high court and public Diet of Athens and finally that this accord and award should be engrossed, subscribed, and signed as well by the Lacedæmonians as Achæans.

Q. Marcius was sent Ambassador into Macedonia, who also had direction and order given him by the same commission, to visit the State of the allies in Peloponnesus; for there also remained some troubles after the old quarrels and variances; yet, and the Messenians refused to appear at the general council of Achæa. Now if I would set in hand to record the causes and circumstances of that war, I should forget my purpose in the beginning of my work, wherein I resolved not to touch at all any discourse of foreign histories, no farther than they were linked to the Roman affairs. Howbeit one memorable occurrence there happened, which I cannot pass by, namely, that albeit the Achæans had the better hand in war, yet it chanced that Philoparchus their Pretor was taken prisoner by the Messenians, as he made an expedition to seize upon Corone by prevention, which the enemies were desirous to be masters of. Surprised he was in a valley of great disadvantage, and some few horsemen with him. It is reported, that by the help of the Thracians and Candians, he might have fled and escaped; but for very shame to abandon those men of arms, which were the noblest Gentlemen of that nation, to whom he lately had made choice of, he had not the power to do otherwise, but stay to see the last. For while he came himself behind in the rearward, because he was desirous to make means for their evasion through the streights of that pass, and to that purpose valiantly received the charge of the enemies, his horse fell and cast him at once, so as with his own fall and his horse lying upon him, he had like to have gone away in a swoon: a man now threescore years old and such; and which, newly crept abroad and recovered of a long and lingering disease, which had mightily wasted and consumed the strength of his body. Well, thus lay he along, and the enemies ran over him; and so soon as they knew who he was, they reared him upon his feet from under his horse, no less respecting than if he had been their own General in regard of a reverence they bare unto the man, and in remembrance of his noble exploits: they brought him again to himself, and forth of that by-valley standing out of the pass, they carried him into the high way, and were so far possessed and overcome with joy so unexpected, that they could not well believe their own eyes that they had gotten him. Some dispatched van-couriers to Messene with the news hereof; namely, that the war was brought to an end, considering that Philoparchus was taken and was their prisoner. At first the tidings seemed so incredible, that the foremost messenger was held not only for a vain liar, but also for one not well in his wits; but after that there came one after another, and all with one voice verified and affirmed the same, at length it was believed. And then, see what they did: before they knew for certain that he approached neer unto the City; they all ran forth of the gates by heaps to see the man: all (I say) bond as well as free, women and children one with another. In so much, as the gates were choaked up with the thrust and throng of the press: for no man could believe assuredly it was true, the thing was so strange, unless he might see him with his own eyes. They that had the charge of bringing him, found much ado to put by the multitude whom they encountered, and to enter in at the gate: and so thick they stood in the press, that they took up all the wayes besides, so as he could not be brought forth to be seen. Now because the most part of the people might not possibly have a sight of him, they gat up all at once into the Theatre, which stood neer unto the way, and pestered it full; and with one voice they cried aloud; That he might be brought thither and presented unto the view of the whole people. The Magistrates and principal citizens, fearing lest the compassion that might arise in mens hearts upon the beholding of so worthy a personage, would raise some trouble and commotion; while some comparing the reverence of his former authority and Majesty, with his present condition and calamity; and others calling to remembrance his manifold deserts and passing good turns, might haply be touched with pity: set him far off in the open sight of them all, and then at once took him hastily out of their view: for their Pretor, Dionysius gave out openly and said, That the Magistrates were to enquire and demand certain points of him as touching the main sum of the civil war. Then he was brought into their Council-Chamber, where their Senate assembled and began to consult about him. It was now well toward evening; and so far off they were from resolving in other matters, that they could not but think themselves and agree, in what place they might keep him that one night in safeguard. At which they were and amazed, to consider and think upon the greatness of his estate past, and of his noble virtue and valour; and so mandate receive the charge and custody of him in his own house, not trust any one besides with him sleeping. At length some there were, that put them in mind of the foolishness of the City, wanted under the ground like a dunghill, and called all about them to rise from their sleep. It was he let down bound as he was, and gave him some strong drink, for his sake, as they thought, was by an engine laid over, to enclose him sure. Thus reposing more trust for his safe custody in that place than in any person, they waited and attended all the morning. When afternoon came, the whole entire multitude in general, remembering the benefits and good turns done of old by him to their City, were of mind to pardon and spare him, both by his merit and obligation, to seek for remedies and redress of their past and present calamities. But those persons, by whose motive and inducement the Maffians had devolved (and such were they, as looked to the common-weal), consulted apart in secret, and concluded, which else contented not him to death: only the doubt and question was, whether they should do this thing with speed, or by delay. But those pretailed in the end, who were more greedy of present revenge, and so they sent one unto him with a draught of poison. When he had taken the cup to his head (by stealth) he gave not a word, but only asked, whether Lycarta (the other General of the Achazans) were escaped alive, and the foresaid horrid men safe? When answer was made, that they were in safety: That is happy, quoth he, and therewith drank off every drop in the cup with hearty, and a while after yielded up his vital breath. But long joyed they not of his death, who were the bloody authors of this cruelty: for the City of Maffia being conquered by force of arms, among other capitulations, delivered these malefactors into the hands of the Achazans, who demanded presently to have them. The bones and ashes of Philopomen were likewise readred unto them, and inserted, how was by the general Council of all Achazans in such solemn wise, that in heaping upon him all honours that could be devised for an earthly man, they forbore not also to adore him as a God immortal. The Historiographers, as well Greek as Latine, attribute so much unto this man, that some of them have recommended to posterity (as a memorable thing of all others that happened this year) to wit, that in this one year there died three renowned Captains, Philopomen, Annibal, and P. Scipio. See how they have matched him in equality with the greatest warriors and noblest Generals of the two most puissant nations in the whole world.

Then came T. Quinctius Flaminius in embassage to King Prusias, whom the Romans had in suspicion and jealousy, both for that he had received Annibal after the flight of Antiochus, and also because he made war upon Eumenes. Now were it that among other matters Flaminius charged Prusias, that he entertained in his court the most spitefull enemy of all men living, unto the people of Rome: who first solicited his own native country to take arms against the Romans, and after the force and power thereof was abated and defeated, persuaded King Antiochus to do the like: or rather that Prusias of his own accord to gratify Flaminius there presented to do the Romans a pleasure, had a meaning and intent either to kill Annibal, or to deliver him alive into their hands. I wot not how it came about, but upon this first communication and conference between them, there were souldiers sent incontinently to beset and guard his house. Annibal evermore forcast in mind some such issue and end of his life, seeing the deadly and inevitable hatred that the Romans bare unto him: reposing besides no confidence at all in the fidelity of these Kings, and having withal some experience already of the inconstancy and levity of King Prusias. Moreover, he had in horror this coming of Flaminius, as fatal unto him, and a mean to work his final destruction. To the end therefore he might be ever provided aforehand against those inconveniences and dangers, wherewith on all sides he was encumbered, and have a ready way of evasion to save himself, he had devised and caused to be made seven doors for egress out of his house, whereof some were very privy and secret vaults, because they should not be envied nor watched with guards. But Kings commandments are of that force, that whatsoever they would have to be searched out and discovered, cannot lie long hidden. For the guards so compassed and enclosed the whole circuit of the house, that it was impossible for any to get forth and make an escape. Annibal being advertised that the Kings souldiers were at the gate, assailed to steal away as a postern, which stood furthest out of the way, and wherof the conceitance was most secret, but perceiving that the souldiers had beset it too, and lay for to encounter and receive him that way, and that every place was invested with a set guard, he called for the poison which he had of long time before ready prepared for all such or current occasions, and uttered these words withal, "Let us rid these Romans of this their continual fear and pain wherein they have been all this while, since that they think it so long to stay for the death of one old man, Flaminius shall obtain no great nor memorable victory of me, disarmed thus as I am, and betrayed into his hands. But this very day shall prove and testify, how far the people of Rome are degenerate and changed from their ancient manners. Their forefathers (God be) advertised King Pyrrhus their enemy armed in field, and lying with an host of men against them in Italy, they gave him warning I say to take heed of poison: but these living at this day, have sent their Ambassador, even one that hath born the dignity of a Consul, to advise and counsel Prusias wickedly to take the life away of his own guest. Then after he had cursed the person of Prusias and his whole realm, and called upon the Gods, protectors of the law of hospitality, to bear witness how he had violated his faith, and broken promise with him, he set the cup of poison to his mouth, and drank it off. This was the end of Annibal, Puffinus and Annibal write, that Scipio also died this year. But I added nothing with them nor with Valerius. From them I square, because I find that when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Censors, the same L. Valerius being Censor, was elected President of the Senate, where

Annibal.

A Asfricanus had been President for ten years space together, during the time of two reviews by Censors next before. And so long as the said Asfricanus lived, there would have been no other chosen President in his room, unless himself were to have been called and deprived of the Senators dignity, of which disgrace and note of infamy there is not one that maketh any mention. And as for Palerinus Antonius he is sufficiently refuted by M. Naevius a Tribune of the Commons, against whom there is an Oration drawn, and the same penned by P. Asfricanus, and bearing his name. This Naevius is recorded in the rolls and registers of Magistrats, by the title of Tribune of the Commons, in that year when P. Clodius and L. Porcius were Consuls, but he entered into his office during the Consulship of App. Claudius and M. Sempronius, the tenth of December. From which time to the fifteenth of March are three months, upon which day Pub. Clodius and L. Porcius began their Consulship. So it seemeth that he was living during the Tribuneship of Naevius, and that he might well commense an action against him, and call him to his answer, but he departed this life before that L. Cato and M. Porcius were Censors. But in my conceit the death of these three (the most renowned personages each one of their own nation) are not to be compared one with the other in this regard, that they hapned all just at one time, more than for this, that none of them all had an end correspondent and answerable to the poore state and glorious lustre of his life. For first and foremost in this they all jumped together, that they neither died nor were entered into their native country. Again, Annibal and Philopemen were both poisoned, Annibal was banished and betrayed by his own friend and host, Philopemen was taken prisoner, and left his life in prison and irons. As for Scipio, although he was neither exiled nor condemned, yet making default of appearance at the day assigned unto him, and being cited to his answer in his absence, willingly banished not himself only for his lifetime, but his corps and funerals also after his death.

C Whiles those affairs passed in Peloponnesus (from whence our pen hath a little diverted and digressed) the return of Demetrius and the Embassadors into Macedony, diversly wrought in mens minds, and amused them some in one thing, and some in another. The common people of Macedony, who were mightily afraid that the Romans would make war upon them, highly affected Demetrius, and cast a favourable aspect upon him as the author of peace, and withal they desired him without all doubt to the Kingdom after the decease of his father. For albeit he were younger than his brother Perseus, yet men thought and spake, that he was begotten in matrimony by Philip of his lawful wife, whereas he had Perseus by a concubine, who carried no token and mark of a certain father, as having to his mother a woman that was nought of her body and common. Whereas Demetrius resembled his father Philip, and was as like him as might be. Moreover, men said, That the Romans would place and establish Demetrius in the Royal throne of his father, but Perseus was in no credit and reputation among them. Thus folk stuck not to give out abroad in their common talk. Whereupon not only Perseus was in care and doubt, that the preeminence of age only would little boote and advantage him, considering in all respects else he was inferior to his brother, but Philip also himself, supposing verily that it would hardly lie in his power to leave the inheritance of the crown to whom he pleased, thought that his younger son was a more in his eye, and troubled him more than was for his ease. Offended, otherwhiles he was, that the Macedonians resorted unto him so much as they did, and highly displeased that there should be

B any more Royal courts than one in his realm, during his life. And to speak a truth, the young Prince himself returned from Rome more puffed up, no doubt, with pride, than was becoming; as who presumed and grounded much upon the opinion that the Senat had of him, perceiving that they had granted those things to him which had been denied unto his father before: but look how much favour and honor (in respect of the Romans) he won among the rest of the Macedonians, so much envy and ill will he procured himself thereby not only with his brother, but with his father also: and especially after that other Roman Embassadors were arrived, and that Philip was forced to part with Thracia and withdraw his garrisons, and to do other things either by virtue of the old award of the first commissioners, or by a new ordinance of the Senat. Well he performed all, but with a heavy heart and many a deep sigh and groane, and so met the rather, be-

F cause he observed and saw how his son Demetrius conversed more with the Embassadors, and frequented their company oftner than his. Howbeit he obeyed, and did whatsoever was enjoined him by the Romans, because he would minister unto them the occasion of levying war against him out of hand. And supposing it was good policy to avert their minds from all suspicion that he intended any such designs tending that way, he led his army into the middle of Thracia against the Odrysiens, Dantheleis, and Bessians. He won the City Philippopolis, abandoned by the inhabitants who were fled and had retired themselves with their whole families to the high mountains near adjoining: and after he had wasted the lands and territories of the Barbarians that inhabited the champaign country, he received them under his subjection by composition. Afterwards, having left a garrison at Philippopolis, which soon after was chased and expelled by the Odrysiens, he determined to build a Town in Demetrias, a region of Paonia under the river Alpeonius, which issueth out of Thracia, and keeping his course through Paonia, dischargeth it self, and falleth into the river Alpeus, not far from Solus the old City, he built a new, and caused it to be called Perseus, thereby to do honour to his eldest son Perseus, and as yet it is a new world known.

E During the train of these affairs in Macedony, the Consuls took their journey into their several Provinces. Marcus sent a messenger before him to L. Porcius the Proconsul, to give him to understand that he should present his legions before the new Town of the Gauls. But at the first approach approach of the Consul, the Frenchmen yielded the place. Twelve thousand they were that bare arms, and most of them had by force gotten their armour out of their country villages, which was taken from them through their hearts, with all things else that either they had gotten out of the country by pilling and robbing, or brought with them of their own. Whereupon they addressed their Embassadors to Rome, for to make complaint of these abuses and wrongs: who having audience given in the Senat by C. Valerius the Pretor, declared, how by occasion that Gaul was overcharged with a multitude of people, they were constrained as well for want of ground and possessions, as also for need and poverty, to pass over the Alps and seek themselves some place of habitation. And where they saw any quarters forlet, desert, and unpeopled, there they had planted themselves, without offering injury to any person: where also they had begun to build a Town, which might be a good proof and argument, that they came not to do violence upon any City or country Village. And now of late M. Claudius had sent unto them a message, that unless they submitted and yielded, he would war upon them: whereupon they preferring certain peace (although it were less honorable) before the doubtful hazard & adventures of war, surrendered, rather to be in the protection and safeguard, than under the subjection of the people of Rome. But a few daies after, they were commanded to quit both City and Country. And thereupon resolved in their mind to depart in silence and saying never a word, into what place soever they could, there to seek their fortune: but then they were disarmed, yea, and spoiled and stript of all that ever they had, and nothing left, that either they drew before them, or carried about them. In regard whereof, they were humble suppliants to the Senat and people of Rome, that they would not proceed in more rigour and cruelty against them, harmless persons as they were, and submitting themselves unto them, than against professed enemies. To this Oration of complaint the Senat caused this answer to be returned: That neither they had done well in coming into Italy, and presuming to build them a City upon other mens territories, without permission of the sovereign Roman Magistrate, who had the government of those parts: nor yet the Senat was well pleased, that they should be thus despoiled, considering they had yielded. And therefore minded they were to send with them their Embassadors to the Consuls, to command them in their name, to see that all their own goods should be restored again unto them, so that they made return thither from whence they came: who also should go forward immediately over the Alps, to give the States of France warning to keep in their people with them, and hold them in their native country: forasmuch as the Alps were the frontier limits standing in the mids to confine between them, and therefore those mountains neither ought nor might be passed of one side or the other, and so make account of this, that they should speed no better now in transgressing their bounds, than at what time as they first made a way and passage over them into Italy. The Embassadors employed about this business, were L. Furius Purpurio, Q. Minutius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. Thus the French after resolution made unto them of all that was their own by good right, and without wrong of others, departed out of Italy. Now when these Roman Legats were come, they had good words and courteous answer from the Transalpine nations. And those amongst them that were more ancient than the rest, blamed the people of Rome for their overmuch lenity, in that they let those persons go, who without warrant from the whole State, durst be so bold as to take a voyage to settle upon any lands belonging to the Signory of Rome, and were so hardy as thereon to build a Town. For surely they deserved not less than to abide grievous smart for their rash demeanor. Moreover and besides, whereas the Romans have given them their own goods again, they feared much that so great indulgency of theirs, would induce and encourage others to enterprise the like. So they friendly entertained and as kindly accompanied the Embassadors, yea, and liberally presented them with rewards.

M. Claudius the Consul having thus expelled the Gauls out of his Province, began to lay the ground of the Isirick war, and for this purpose wrote his letters unto the Senat, for a warrant and commission to pass with his legions into Isiria. The Senat was therewith contented. But whereas they were in question and consultation about conducting a Colony to inhabit Aquileia, they could not agree whom to send, whether Latins or Roman citizens. But in conclusion the L. P. Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus, in whose hands the business was committed.

The same year were two Colonies of Roman citizens erected at Mutina and Parma: and two thousand persons were to either place translated out of the territory which lately was occupied by the Boians, and before time had been in the tenure of the Tuscans. They of Parma were endued with eight acres of land, and those of Mutina with five a piece. The Triumvir Commissioners who had the disposing and managing of the business, were M. Emilius Lepidus, T. Titinius Carus, and L. Quinctius Crispinus. Like wise the colony Saurnia consisting of Roman citizens, was brought into the territory of Calabria, by the conduct of Q. Fabius Laber, C. Afranius Sallus, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, departed Triumvirs therefore who set out for every man ten acres of ground.

The same year A. Terentius the Propraetor for his from the River Iberus in the Ausonian country, fought fortuitously against the Celtiberians, and forced certain Towns which they had fortified. Basse Spain beyond Iberus was quier this year, because both P. Sempronius the Propraetor lay sick of a long disease, and also the Lusitanians (as good hap was) rested still and quiet, as being by no man provoked to stir. Neither was there any memorable exploit achieved in Liguria by Q. Fabius the Consul. M. Marcellus was called home out of Isiria: and after he had discharged his army,

A army, returned to Rome for to hold the election of the Magistrates. For Consuls he created C. Debius Tamphilus and L. Emilius Paulus. This man had been Edile Curule together with M. Emilius Lepidus, who was Consul five years before; and yet the same Lepidus suffered the repulse twice ere he was created Consul. Then were Pretors chosen to wit, Q. Fulvius Plautius, M. Valerius Laevinus, L. Manlius the second time, M. Ogulinus Gallus, L. Cacilius Dentus, & C. Terentius Varro. In the very end of the year there was a solemn supplication holden by occasion of certain prodigies; for men believed verily that in the court yard of the goddess Concordia it rained blood for the space of two daies: and reported it was not far from Sicily, that a new Island was discovered out of the Sea, where never any was before seene. Valerius Antius writeth, that Annibal died this year: and that to compass and work his death, there were sent in embassage to Prasus, L. Scipio Africanus, and P. Scipio Nasica, besides T. Quintius Flamininus, who in that action is named most.

The fortieth Book Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fortieth Book

When Philip had given commandment to make straight search for the children of those whom he kept in prison (and personages they were of most noble birth) for to put them to death: the Boeotians fearing the King his malicious intent and wicked lust, in the behalf as well of her own children as of her sisters little ones (God wot) and very young infants, brought forth and offered unto the said children naked keen swords and a cup of deadly poison, persuading with them to avoid the imminent shame and dishonour, by present death: which after she had obtained and seen effected, she likewise placed her own pace, and slew her own self. Moreover in this book are related the debate and variance between Perseus and Demetrius the two sons of Philip King of Macedonia: and how Demetrius came to his death by poison, although the mischievous practise of his brother Perseus who devised false crimes and raised standards against him, and principally among the rest, charged him that he intended to kill his own father, and meant to usurp the Kingdom. Last of all, because he was a friend to the people of Rome: by which means after the death of Philip Perseus obtained the crown. Also it containeth the happy exploits achieved by many and divers commanders in Liguria, and in Spain against the Celtiberians. The books of Numa Pompilius were by certain husbandmen as they laboured in the ground of L. Petilius a Notary, under the Jacobin found enclosed within a coffer of stone, and written both in Latine and Greek. And when he brought off the City, to whom the books were brought, had perused them, and found therein many points tending to overthrow religion and the divine service of the Gods, he swore before the Senate, that it was dangerous for the State and Common-wealth, that they should be read and preserved: in such sort, that by an Act of the State, they were burned within the Comitium or Hall of publick assemblies. The Colony Aquileia was now erected. Philip exceedingly displeased with himself, and pricked with remorse of conscience for that he had caused his son Demetrius to be poisoned, upon the false suggestions and accusations of his other son, aimed against him, devised to punish Perseus, and rather to confer the Kingdom upon Antigonus his friend, than that his son should succeed him: but in this desertment and purpose of his he suddenly died: and so Perseus took the crown and Kingdom upon him.

The fortieth book of T. Livius.

IN the beginning of the year next ensuing, the Consuls and Pretors cast lots for their several governments. As for the Consuls, there was no other Province to employ them in, but Liguria. The civil jurisdiction among citizens fell to M. Ogulinus Gallus; and the foreign over strangers to M. Valerius. High Spain was assigned unto Q. Fulvius Plautius; and the Nether-land thereof to P. Manlius. L. Cacilius Dentus had the governance of Sicily, and C. Terentius Varro of Sardinia. The Consuls were employed to take matters for Q. Fulvius had written many of Liguria in the Appennines belimed to rebellion; and greatly to be feared it was, that they would break out and make roads into the territory of Pisa. And well they knew already, that of the two Provinces of Spain, the higher parts were in arms, and the war with the Celtiberians was fit to rise; and as for the lower the military discipline there, was corrupt and gone, by reason of riotous pleasures and idleness, where unto the soldiers were wholly given, by occasion that the Pretor lay so long sick. For these causes, thought good it was, that new armies should be levied and enrolled: to wit, four legions for Liguria, and every one of them to contain 3000 foot and 300 horse: unto which, there was an addition of 1000 footmen, and 300 men of arm from out of the Latine allies. And these two armies were to serve the Consuls. But over and besides, they were commanded to enrol 7000 foot, and 300 horsemen of Latine allies, and then to send inco Spain to M. Manlius, who was to continue still in place of command, after the term of his Consulship expired. Likewise they had in charge to levy of Roman Citizens 4000 footmen and 200 horse, and of allies 7000 of the one, and 300 of the other to be conducted into both Provinces of Spain. And Q. Fulvius Plautius had his commission of government renewed for one year longer, with the charge of that army which he had in Liguria.

The

* 19 of April: for the feast unto the god-des Pales was solemnized an.
x. calend. Mai. which was, Neutalis dies urbis Romae; the birth day (as it were) of Rome.
* Luna.

The spring season that year was very stormy and tempestuous. On the even of the last, Palilia about noon-tide, suddenly there arose a mighty blustering wind, which overthrew many edifices as well sacred as profane. It cast down the brazen statues and images in the Capitol: it caught up the wicket of the door belonging to the Temple of the Mars, (which is in the Avenue) carried it away and set it fast to the back wall of the Temple of Ceres. It overturned and laid along other statues in the great circus or show-place called Circus Maximus, together with the pillars upon which they stood. The lanterns and pinnacles it rent and tore after a strange sort from the roof and top of certain Churches, and carried them clean away. And therefore this tempest was held for a prodigious token, and the Auspices gave order for the expiation and satisfaction thereof. Likewise the same provision was made in regard of a report from Brutus, that a mule was foaled with three feet: and from Fornia, that the Chappel of Apollo (and namely at Ceryra) was stricken with lightning. For these prodigies, there were twenty greater beasts killed for sacrifice: and a supplication holden one whole day. And about the same time, intelligence was given by letters from A. Terentius the Pretor, that P. Sempronius having continued above a year sick, was departed this life, in the farther Province of Spain: which was the cause that the Pretors were willed to make more hast, and to march the sooner to pass into Spain.

* Patimidia.

After this, the embassages from beyond the Sea had audience given them in the Senat. The first was that of the two KK, Enmenes and Pharnaces, and also of the Rhodians, who complained for the great loss and overthrow by the Sinopians received. And about the same instant arrived also Embassadors from Philip, from the Achaeans and Lacedaemonians, who had their answer and dispatch after a speech made by Martius, who had been sent to visit the estate and affairs of Greece and Macedony. But as touching the foresaid Kings of Asia and the Rhodians, this stood for their answer; namely, That the Senat would send their Embassadors and Commissioners to take knowledge and see to all things there in place. But as concerning Philip, Martius had so told his tale, that he put the L.L. of the Senat in more fear and perplexity: for in his declaration he confessed, that Philip indeed had accomplished the will and pleasure of the Senat, but in such sort, as it was evident to be seen, that he would do so no longer than he were held thereto and compelled of necessity: for apparant it was, that he minded to make war again, considering that whatsoever he either did or said, tended to no other end. For first and foremost he caused all the multitude to be removed and translated (with their whole families) out of the cities by the Sea-coast, into that quarter which now is called Emathia, and in times past was named Pemio; and gave whole Cities aforesaid to the Thracians and other barbarous nations to inhabit: supposing that this kind of people would be more fast and faithful unto him in his wars against the Romans. And verily this deed of his bred a great discontentment and murmuring throughout all Macedonia: inasmuch, as few there were of them, who thus left their native habitations together with their wives and children, that could bite in and contain their secret grief and heart-burning, and say nothing: but being gricked and needed more to anger than curbed and bridled with fear, they brake out and were heard to crie and cry out upon the King as they went along the way in troops and companies. Hereupon his fell stomach by nature was fozalled that he had all men in jealousy, and no time nor place there was, but he suspected. In the end he began to give it out openly, that he could not make account to be in safety and security unless he apprehended and kept in prison the children of those persons whom he had before-time killed, for to dispatch and make away them also (in time) one after another. This cruelty in itself heinous enough and enormous, the calamity and wofull misery of one house made more odious and detestable. Murdered he had many years before Herodius, a noble man and a Prince of the Thessalians: and some time after, he slew also his sons in law, who had married his daughters. These Gentlewomen being left Widows, had each of them by their Husbands a little Son: and the names of these women were Theoxena and Arche. As for Theoxena she would in no wise marry again, albeit she had many suitors that wooed her: but Arche was wedded to one Peris, the very principal and noblest personage of the Macedonian Nation: and when she had born him many children, she died, and left them all very young. Thence afterwards Theoxena likewise was married to the foresaid Peris, to the end, that she might have the bringing up of those her sisters children with her own hands, and in truth she was not more kind to her own pretty son than to those her sisters children: but so tenderly regarded them all alike, as if she had born them of her own body. Now when she heard once of the Kings edict and proclamation which was gone forth, for the apprehension of all those infants whose fathers before had been put to death, supposing that these children should be exposed, not only to the abuse and scornful mockery of the King, but also, to the lust and villany of his guard, she conceived in her mind an horrible designment: yea, and she stuck not to say, That with her own hand she would rid them of their lives, rather than they should come within the churches of Rhodia. But Peris her husband (who abhorred the very naming of so odious a fact) said, that he would convey them out of the way as far as Sikyon, to certain trusty friends of his there, and would himself in proper person accompany them all the way thither, and take part with them of that exile and banishment. So they put themselves in their journey, all together (he and his wife and children) from Thessalonica toward Aetia, unto a solemn sacrifice and feast which yearly they use to celebrate with much ceremonies pomp, in the honour of Demetrius their first founder. Now when they had spent that day in feasting full solemnly, about the third watch of the night (when all others were fast asleep) they were embarked in a ship prepared for them by Peris: and

A making semblance, as if they would return to Thessalonica; but indeed purposing to cut over to Euboea. But when they had laboured and wrought to no purpose upon the wind, which was full against them, they were overtaken and prevented by the King's officers who had the charge and keeping of the haven, there was a platoon of foot (well appointed with armed men) set out to fetch in that vessel, with express commandment (as they would answer to the contrary at their utter peril) not to come again without it. Now as they approached neerer, Perseus verily for his part was very earnest with the rowers, mariners, and sailors, to pite their bunnels and make way from them; otherwhiles stretching out his hands up to heaven, calling and praying unto the Gods to help them in this their hard distress. But the courageous lady his wife, all the while (turning again to execute that designment of hers long before purposed) tempered and mixed a portion of poison, and brought forth certain swords withal. Now when she had set the poisoned cup before the children in their very eye, and drawn the words naked: Death (quoth she) is the only means we have to save our liberty: lo here the way that lead to death: now as every ones heart standeth to this or that, take thereto, and avoid the cruelty and pride of the King. Come on lads and jolly striplings, lead you the way fast that are the bigger and elder; take sword in hand, fall thereupon and work the feat at once: or if ye list rather to be long a dying, drink here of this cup. What should they do? the enemies were fast upon them ready to board their vessel, their mother on the other side, encouraging them instantly to take their death. In such wise, that to conclude, some dying the one way and some the other, were all cast headlong over shipboard, when they were but half dead. Then she for her part embracing her husband about the middle (because she would dye with him for company) threw her self and him both together into the Sea. Thus the Kings men seized upon the ship, when the masters thereof were gone.

The horrible example of this fact kindled more coals, and set the malice and hatred kindled against the King as it were on a light and flaming fire anew, inasmuch as now commonly in all places they fell to open cursing of him and his children. Which maledictions and execrations, it was not long but all the Gods heard and gave ear unto, and caused that he likewise exercised cruelty even upon his own flesh and blood. For Perseus seeing his brother Demetrius to arise every day more than other in favour, greatness, and reputation with the whole Macedonian people, and to grow also in credit and grace among the Romans, supposing with himself how he had no other hope left him of attaining to the crown, but by the means of some wicked practice bent all his thoughts and studies that way, and aimed only at that mark. But believing verily that he was not strong enough and sufficient alone, to execute and bring forth so much only, as within that unmanly and womanish mind of his he had devised and conceived, he practised with his fathers friends, and curious sounded their hearts one by one apart, calling out ambiguous and doubtful speeches. And at the first verily some of them shewed countenance, as if they could not abide to hear of any such thing, because they repented more hope in Demetrius. But afterwards, as the hatred of Philip grew daily greater against the Romans, which Perseus still fostered and maintained, whereas Demetrius with all his might laboured against it; they fore-seeing in their mind the unhappy end of Demetrius, who lay too open and was not heedful enough to guard himself against the fraudulent and mischievous plots of his brother, sided with Perseus; making this account in policy, to let that go on and help it forward, which in the end would rake effect, and namely to entertain and advance the hope of the mightier. For the execution of the rest they reserved every thing to a meet and convenient time thereafter. As for the present, the best course they thought upon was this, to incense the King all that ever possibly they could against the Romans, to incite and put him forward still to think of nothing but war, whereto of his own accord his mind stood well enough, and was inclined. And withal (to the end that Demetrius might be from day to day more and more suspected) they entered of purpose (as before they were agreed) into speech, as touching the hope and great part of the Romans: whereto when some of them would lead again in scorn, wife to debate their manners and fashions; others to deprave their deeds and ways, some rolling in general at the very form and making of their City, how it was not yet embellished & beautified either with stately edifices in publick places, or with fair houses of private men; others mocking and having in derision the principal and chief performances of the City in particular the inconsiderate young Gentleman, carried away as well with an affectionate love to the Romans, as with a desire to do his brother, would answer to all those points in the defence and maintenance of the Romans: by which means he brought himself both into more favour with his father, and also to be more & exposed to slanderous imputations. Whereupon his father acquainted him no more with any counsel as touching the Roman affairs, but wholly relied upon Perseus, and with him conferred thereabout, imparting unto him both day and night all his projects and designs whatsoever. By this time were they returned, whom he chanced to see, the soldiers for to levy soldiers and soldiers, and brought they had with them from thence certain noble young Gentlemen, and some among of royal blood. One of them promised to give his sister in marriage to one of Philip's sons inasmuch as the association by way of affinity with that nation set the Kings heart also aloft. But Perseus brake out into these words: "What serves all this for (quoth he) since we have not so much help and safety by aids from abroad, as harm and danger by a mischief and mischief at home. We keep here and foster in our bosome, I dare not say a traitor; but I assure you a very dangerous spie and no better: whose body verily the Romans have lost it again, but his heart and soul they are possessed of, ever since he won it before at H Rome. All the Macedonians in a manner have their eyes upon him, for him they come, and give out in plain terms, that they will no other King than whom the Romans shall set up. Old Philip was of himself badly enough affected in his mind, but upon these suggestions buzzed into his head, he was the worse, and more disquieted, and set out of frame: he entertained these rumours, and let them nearer to his heart than he made fair in outward shew and countenance. Now it happened that the time was come of the ordinary review of his army, the solemnity whereof was usually performed in this manner. They cut a dog overthwart the midst in two halves, the head and foreparts together with the entrails were set on the right hand of the high way; the hind parts on the left.

 Between this sacrifice thus divided, the companies in their armour passed in a shew. Before the front of the vanguard were carried the coats of arms and royal ensigns of all the Macedonian Kings, that ever had been from the beginning. Then followed the King himself in person with his children. Next marched the Kings guard and cohort, with the squires of his body. And last of all in the rearguard behind came the rest of the multitude and commons of the Macedonians. Of either side of the King went his sons, two lusty Gentlemen. Perseus was about 30 years old, and Demetrius five years younger: the one in the midst and best of his age and strength, and the other in the very prime and flower thereof. An happy father had he been for so fair issue, seeing this proof, this maturity and perfection of theirs, if the grace of God had gone withal, and that they had been well disposed and affected in mind. The manner and custome of this review and solemn sight was (after the sacrifice duly accomplished) for the whole army to joust and tourney in this wise, that being divided into two battalions, they should one charge the other, and represent the shew of a very conflict and set field. And who should be the chief leaders and captains in this brave pastime, but the Kings two sons? But believe me they jested never a whit, nor made a vain shew for sport, but went to it roundly in good earnest, as if they would determine now, who should be King another day? Foul work they made with their wooden wasters and headless pikes: many were wounded, and nothing wanted there but sharp iron of a very bloody battle indeed. That regiment which Demetrius commanded, had the upper hand by odds. Perseus shewed himself highly displeased and angry thereat; but contrary-wise his friends and favourites of the wiser sort, rejoiced at it, and made remonstrance, That this was the only thing to minister just occasion unto him for to challenge and accuse his younger brother. Now the same day, the one as well as the other tested their companions, who had thus performed the jousts and tournaments of either side with them.
Perseus was invited by his brother to supper, but he refused and denied to come. However such was the good fellowship amongst them, and so merry were the yong gallants and lusty Cavaliers, that they passed the festival day in all joy and mirth, either part with their Captain and plied the wine full liberally. Then in their cups they fell to discoursing freely of their running and pastime, and began to cast out merry conceits and broad jests at their adversaries of the contrary side, inso much as they forbore not to glance at the very Captains themselves. Now had Perseus sent a privy spie, one of his guests, to listen what good talk there was at his brothers board, but he demeaning himself & walking not so circumspectly as he should, was encountered by certain youths, that chanced to come forth of the hall or parlor where they sate at supper, and was evil treated and well beaten for his labour. Demetrius nothing aware thereof, among other table talk, Why go we not (quod he) and banquet with my brother? and if there remain any anger and displeasure behind after our jousting in jest, appease and mitigate the same in simplicity of heart and mirth-making? Mary, no better, cried they all again with one voice, Iave only those that feared to be met withal presently and served alike for mistaking & knocking the toad out. Demetrius would needs draw even them also with him; whereupon they carried weapons hidden under their apparel, for fear of the worst, that they might defend themselves, if any violence were offered. But what can be carried so secret, but our it will, where there is intestine discord in one family? All was full of spies and false knaves, as well in the one house as the other. For there ran a pick-thank and false carrier before unto Perseus, and declared unto him that there were coming with Demetrius four yong men with privy skins by their sides. And albeit he wist well enough what was the cable thereof (for he had heard that one of his guests was by them beaten), yet to aggravate the matter and make it more odious, he commanded the dore to be fast locked, and from the upper rooms and lofts of the house and out of the windows to the street side, he kept off and repelled those (that came to ban-ket and be merry with him) from approaching the dore, as if their coming were for no other purpose but to murder him. Demetrius after he had for a time cried out in the street, and given on for this disgrace and indignity, saying it was long of the wine and nothing else that he was thus excluded, returned again to his own house to make an end of the banquet there: and all this while knew nothing what the matter was. The morrow after Perseus, so soon as ever he thought he might have access to the speech of his father, came to the court, and in the sight of the King stood afar off with a troubled countenance and heavy cheer, and none a word with him. How now (quod his father) what is amiss with you? is not all well? Ah my good lord and father (quod he) would you knew, that it is the fair gift & grace of God, that I am a liveliman at this hour. I that brother of mine, goeth not about us any more by way of secret practices and hidden ambushes: for the night that was, he came with armed men to set upon me in mine own house, and to take away my life. I was driven (father) to that the doors against him, and to save my self from his furious rage, within the defence of the walls thereof. When he had thus possessed his father with fear

A and attended them together: Nay (quod he) I will prove all plainly before your face, when you shall know it to be such that I say, if your grace can be content to give me audience. Audience? (quod he) yes many will I and that with patience: and immediately he commanded Demetrius so he called before him. And whilst he sat for two of his old friends to assist him, and to take their advice to wit, Epistaphius and Chimastus, who with nothing of the quarrel and variance between the two brethren, for that they had been strangers a long time at the court. In the mean while, he walked up and down alone, attending their coming, coming and departing many matters in his head, and his son Perseus stood still aloof. After words were brought that the parties were come, he retired aside with these two friends, and as many of his guard into an inner room, and permitted his sons to bring with them into the place, three friends a piece unarmed. And when he was set, thus began he to speak.

B Here sit I a most wretched father, to be a judge between my two sons, the one plaintiff, the other defendant in the case of parricides: and to find among those of mine own house and blood, the foul stain of that felonious crime, either falsely forged, or indeed committed. Certainly, long ago I feared such a storm and tempest toward, and I saw it rising afar off, when I perceived your unbrotherly looks one toward another, when I over-heard some unhappy words to pass between you. Yet other whiles I was in good hope that the heat of your anger might evaporate and flake, and the suspicions and jealousies be cleared and pass away: considering that even professed and mortal enemies, have laid down arms, concluded peace, and become friends at last; yet, and great quarrels and enmities between private persons have had their end. I hoped that one

C time or other ye would remember how ye were natural brethren, that ye would call to mind, how ye were little children together, and had conversed with all simplicity & singleness of heart familiarly in your infancy: and finally, that ye would think upon my good lessons and precepts unto you which now I fear me much, that I have sounded to your deaf ears in vain. How often have I blamed and detested in your presence and hearing the examples of brethren at discord and variance, recounting unto you the stories of the fearful sequel and horrible issue thereof; namely, how they have thereby undone themselves and their race, overthrown their own houses, yea, & utterly subverted whole Kingdoms? On the other side, I laid before you better patterns and precedents to follow, and namely of the concord, agreement, and unity between the Lacedaemonians & the Spartans, that reigned two by two together to their own good and the publick weal of their country for many hundred years: but the same City fell soon to decay and ruin, when the fashion once

D was taken up, to usurp the tyranny and sovereign rule every man for himself alone. Moreover, I set before your eyes these two brethren hereby, Enneus and Attalus, who at the first began with so little that they were in manner abashed and ashamed to take upon them the title and style of Kings: and at this day are equal in grandeur of dominion to my self to Attalus, and to any Kings of this age living: and that by no other means in the world, more than by brotherly love and mutual concord. Nay, I said not so but discoursed unto you and recited sundry examples of certain Romans, which either I had learned by hear-say, or observed by mine own eye-sight and experience: and namely, the two Quintii, T. and L. who warred both against me. The Scipios likewise, P. and L. who vanquished and subdued Antiochus: their fathers also and uncles, who were brethren, and whose concord and unity all their life long was such, as it was not disjoyned in their very death. But neither the wickedness of those first recited, and a semblable end correspondent to their ungracious life, was able to scare you from outrageous discord: nor yet the good heart & meaning of the later sort together with their happy fortune draw & induce you to be wise. During my natural life, whilst my breath is within my body, both twain of you, seduced by foolish hope & disordinate desire, are ready to take possession of my Kingdom over my head. And so long only would ye have me to live, until that I surviving the one of you, might presently by my death put all out of question, and make the other (as sole heir apparent) undoubted King. Sick ye are I see well of father and brother, ye can abide neither the one nor the other.

E There is no goodness in you at all: nothing is there that ye hold dear, nothing that you count holy and inviolable: but in lieue and stead of all, there is crept and entered into you an unsatiable desire to reign, and that hath wholly possessed your hearts. Come on therefore now, grieve and wound your fathers ears with your ungracious tales and wicked words; debate and dispute the matter with reciprocal accusations, you that shortly will decide and determine it by dint of sword: say on and spare not; speak out all that either you can alledge truly, or list to devise & invent falsely. Mine ears are now wide open, but shall hereafter for ever be close shut, against all secret slanders that ye shall whisper and report one against the other. When he had breathed out these words with great indignation, the assistants there began all to weep much and shed tears, and for a good time there was sad cheer and not a word: until at length Perseus began and said: "I should belike

F have opened the dore in the night that I should, and received into my house armed guests to banquet with me: yea, and held out my throat unto them for to be cut: since that nothing is believed, unless the deed had been done and dispatched: since that the same is said unto me (who have been toraid and whose life hath been sought) which were more becoming to speak unto a wood-kern and robber by the high-way side: It is not for nought I see well that these here, give out abroad and say, That you have no more son, but Demetrius, and call me a bastard and a supposed son of yours, as begotten of a concubine. For if you held and avowed me legitimate, if you vouchsafed me the place, the degree and love of a son, you would never fare and storm a-

The secretary Oration of Perseus against his brother Demetrius.

I thought me so as you do, for discovering the ambush I set for me, and complaining thereof to him (Sedibus) him rather than laid in wait to surprise me: neither would you let forth out of the small account of my life, as to be moved neither for the danger past wherein I was, nor at the peril to come, if such wait-layers may escape unpunished. Now if there be no remedy but that I must die and say nothing, let us hold our tongues and be mute: let us only pray to the God he-fore that this intended mischief begin in me, may also take an end in me alone, and that you be none the worse, who is to be wounded and pierced through my body. But in case (like as by the very instinct and suggestion of nature, they that are assailed and set upon in a desert wilderness, be thought to implore and call for others help and succour, although they neither saw nor knew of any before) in case (I say) it be lawful for me likewise to open my mouth and speak, when I see the naked sword drawn upon me: then I beseech you for your own love, even for the love of your good self, and the name of a father (which whether of us two in have more esteemed and regarded, you have full well known long ago) to give me audience, and to hear me as if you had been awakened at my cry and pitiful lamentation in the last night's riot, and came in the way show here I was forced to call, Help, Help: and as if you had taken Demetrius in the manner within my gate, in the very entry of my dore, accompanied with armed men, at an undecent and unfitting hour of this night past. Those plaints and moans which then I would have uttered by way of disorders and confused cries, in that sudden affright of mine upon the deed doing the same I now make the morrow after. Ah brother, we have lived now a good while, not (I wot) as brethren should banquet and make merry one with another. It is the crown that you look for, that is certain and past peradventure: but your hope to attain unto it, is crossed divers ways. My birthright and mine elderhip is a block in your way, between you and it; the law of nations is against it: the ancient custome of the Macedonians checketh it: and finally, the will, pleasure, and judgment of our father is opposite unto it. Mount you cannot possibly so high, but by the effusion of my heart blood. You go to work, you assay all means, you leave no stone unrolled, and nothing unattempted to effect that: but to this day, either mine own wary diligence or happy fortune hath guarded me and withstood your wicked parricide. Even yesterday, during the time of the solemn review and purging of the army, during the time of running at tilt and jousting in time of the shew and pastime resembling a skirmish, you missed very little of making a bloody harvest of it and a deadly conflict indeed: and nothing else saved me from death, but this, that I suffered my self and my men to go by the worse and be overcome. From this martial combat, as if it had been no more but a game and sport among brethren, you would needs have drawn me to a supper. Why think you father, that I should have snipped among those guests unarmed, who came in arms to banquet with me? Do you believe, that I should have been in no danger of their naked swords of steel at night: who in the day time and within your sight, laid on such load with wooden swords and battons, that they had like to have killed me? To what end else came you brother, at that time of the night? why came you as an enemy considering I was in choler and my blood was up, wherefore came you accompanied with tall fellows, privily armed and with short swords under their garments? I durst not venture to sit at supper with you: should I have received you then, coming as you did with armed men to banquet with me? Had the dore had been opened; whereas you hear me now to make my complaints, you should have been by this time busied about my winding-sheet, herse, and funerals: I lay not forth and urge matters in slanderous manner, after the fashion of these accusers at the bar: neither collect I bare conjectural presumptions to enforce & conclude any doubtful points: for what need I so to do? Denieth he that he approached my dore with a troop of men? or that he had in his train a company, such as wore weapons covertly under their apparel? Do but send for them whom I shall name. But in faith, what will not they dare to do, that cando this? and yet I trow, they will never be so hardy and shameless as to deny it. If I had taken them in the manner with their weapons about them within mine entry, and so brought them before you, then you would say it were a plain case and out of all doubt. If then, they confess as much with their mouth, hold them as culpable as if they had been surprised in the act doing. Now curse (and spare not) the greedy appetite and thirst after a Kingdom; now fall to raise and call up the furies out of hell to set brethren together by the ears: but good father, let not your curses and execrations thus flie at blind random: make some distinction yet and difference, between him that lieth in await, and the party who is forelaid. Let him be holden guilty, that fought to kill his brother, let him feel withal the gods of his father to be his enemies and angry against him.
 But as for him who was in danger to lose his life through his brothers mischievous practise, let him have his refuge and recourse to the mercy and justice of his father. For alas, whither else should I flie for succour? seeing that neither the solemn review and purging of your army, nor the running and jousting of the men at arms, neither mine own house, nor my table, nor yet the very night season (which nature hath given to mankind for covert & repose) affordeth me safety and security? If I go to my brother (being bidden to supper) die I shall: if I receive my brother within my dores (coming to banquet) die I must: So that whether I go or stay, all is one: I cannot avoid but fall into trains and ambushes, laid for to take away my life. To what place shall I retire and betake myself? None have I regarded, nothing have I relied upon, but the gods & your good self, father. As for the Romans, I stand in no such terms with them of grace and favour as to trust upon their succour: nay, they all wish me hanged, because I take the wrongs done unto you by them,

A I shew, to the heart because I shew my self discontented and touched with the indignity that so many Cities, so many nations are plucked from you and namely, that of late they have despoiled and betrayed you of all the maritime parts, and in coasts of Iberia: and so long as either you or I live, they never look to enjoy Academy. But it by the mischievous practise of my brother, I might once be rid out of the way: and wish if old age had made an end of you, yea, and peradventure before that day came, (which they would never lay so long for) then, they know well, and make full account, that both the King and Kingdom of Macedonia, will be theirs: yea, enough. Indeed if the Romans had spared any piece at all without Macedonia, I should have thought, and made reckoning, that it had been a place of retreat and refuge left for me. But what need that, so long as I have strength enough among the very Macedonians. You saw your self yesterday how violently the souldiers charged upon me: what wanted they but the sharp sword and edged weapon well, that which they failed and missed of in the daytime my brothers banquetters met with in the night. For what should I speak of the greater part of the nobility they have grounded and built all their hopes of dignity, promotion, and advancement, in the Romans, and namely, in him who now do all in all with them, and is of greatest reputation. And surely, to speak a truth, him they prefer not only before me his elder brother, but also they go within a very little to set him before your self, his liege King and natural father. For this is he, for whose love and in favour of whom, the Senat hath remitted and pardoned you that penalty which you had incurred: This is he, who now protecteth you from the force of Roman armies: who deemeth it meet and reason that your old age should be obliged and beholden to his youth. For him stand all the Romans with him take part, all those Cities which are delivered and free from your subjection: of him hold the Macedonians that wish for peace with the Romans, and take contentment therein. Now for me, father, what hope or help can I have elsewhere, but in you alone? Whence to think you send those letters of Quintus sent lately unto you, wherein he writeth: That you did passing well for your own estate, in sending Demetrius to Rome: and exhorteth you with all, to send him again the second time, accompanied with more Embassadors, and those the very principal and best of all the Macedonians? This Titus Quintus (if you will needs know the reason) is the man, who leadeth, induceth, and directeth him at this present in all things: he is his counsellor, and his choise master. And Demetrius hath rejected and cast you off his own father, so hath purged him in your stead: Where it is, where all these privy plots have heretofore been first contrived and set on harthing: and at this present in willing you to send more in embassy, and choose the chiefest personages of the Macedonians with him, he seeketh bought selves but helpers and assistants to put his designs in execution. As many as go from hence to Rome, be they never so good and virtuous, at their setting out, be they loyal subjects and acknowledging no other but Philip for their King, turn from thence tainted and infected with the alluring enticements of the Romans. Demetrius sheweth all together in their books. They are all for him, and pass for none else. Hence they call their King, during the life of his own father. Now, if I seem to be touched, offended, and grievous here, wishfully and by circumstance to have it charged reproachfully on both sides of him, namely, directly from others, but also from your mouth, father, that I aspire and seek to be King. For mine own part, I would both they and you knew, that if the diadem and crown were mine, far be it from me that I would not refuse. For who is he, that I should meddle to undertake & suppose, for to step into his place and succeed? None there is at all but my father before me, and I long may he so be, pray God, and I will so survive him no other wise, but if I be worthy and deserve that he should likewise desire the same. If my father will make me his heir and inheritor of the Kingdom, I will accept thereof. He indeed covereth to be a King, yea, and ungraciously doth therein, with all his ready will, pure forward, and to stand before the countenance of nature, the order of things, the custom of the Macedonians, and the law of nations. But what imagineth Demetrius, that supposed mine elder brother (thinks he) stands in my way between me and honor: to him I appeal, in that he Kingdom by right and by my fathers will: Let us rich him out of the World. What I am, and the first he thought to be a King by the death of a brother. As for my father, he is aged, he is doleful, he is bereaved of a son: he will have more care to look to his own person, than to mind or revenge the death of his son. The Romans, they will rejoyce, they will approve, and maintain on my side. They be disposed, and these be foolish and doubtful hopes, but believe me, father, I hope as yet, altogether without doubt. For time stands the case, and this is the sum of it. All that you may preserve me from danger, now whilst I am alive, by inflicting punishment upon those who have wronged me, in his death: but let this enterprise speed once, and take effect, if you shall need be able to perfect them, to the purpose and revenge my death. And when Perseus had made an end of his speech, they that were present in place cast their eyes with upon Demetrius, as if he would have made answer immediately, and so were all silent a long time, and said now word, so long, that it was suddenly that he could not for weeping open his mouth: but in the end he was moved by his father to speak, and then after that necessity had surmounted his grief, he began: My father, all the means of help which were ever wont to serve the defence of the good head, I am prevented and disappointed of, by the plaint of my accuser. By those false and foolish words of his, having thus he shed to work the ruin and undoing of another, he hath made my true ears suspect, which passing out of mine eyes, proceed from a melting & wounded heart within. And whereas I might have not ceased (ever since that I returned from Rome) to pursue Perseus, who his confederate and complice both night and day to lay wait for my life,

The Oration
of Demetrius
in his own defence, before his father.

"now he begins first with me, and will needs put upon me the visor, and have the world believe "that I play the part not only of a secret and cunning wait-laiier, but of an open thief and a noto"rious murderer and cut-throat. He seemeth to fright you with his own danger, that he might "make even you the very means and instrument to hasten forward the death of his innocent bro"ther. He saith that he hath no place of refuge in the whole world: to the end that I might have "no parcel at all of hope left, so much as in you. Thus circumvented as I am, left alone, forlorn, de"stitute and void of all succour, he chargeth me with being in favour and grace with forraign stran"gers: a thing I wis, that doth me more harm than good. Moreover, see how he proceedeth like a
 "practised and cunning barrister, in that he interteth and mingleth the last nights work together "with the blame of my former life: to the end that he might make more suspitions by the course "of mine other years passed, this criminous matter also (the simple truth whereof you shall know I
 "anon) and withal confirm and maintain this vain surmise and slander, of my hopes, my will, and
 "intended designs, by this subtile invention of his, by the fained & forged fable I say of that which "was pretended the night that was. He hath not failed moreover to make you believe that this "acculation of his was not premeditat and studied upon beforehand, but framed ex tempore; and "occasioned only upon the suddain fright and trouble overnight. But in good faith, Person, if I "had been a traitor to the King my father & the realm, if I had complotted with the Romans and "other of my fathers enemies, me thinks you should not have waited for this nights devised fable,
 "but you ought to have accused me before this time, of treason. And if that imputation were vain
 "and frivolous without this surmise, and served to discover and bewray your envy & spight which "you bear against me, more than it detecteth any crime which is in me: yet you should have let "me alone and forborn this day, or put it off until another time: that it might have been clearly "seen whether of us twain laid wait for the other, you or I, upon a strange & extraordinary man"ner of hatred. As for me (so far forth as I possible can, in this suddain trouble of my spirits) I will "endeavour to speak severally of each point, which you have heaped up together so disorderly,
 "and reveal I will the ambushes and trains of this night, yours or mine, fall out as it shall. He "would have it thought that I practised to kill him, for this intent forsooth, that when mine elder
 "brother were once made away, unto whom the inheritance of the crown appertained by the law
 "of nations, by the custom of the Macedonians, and also, as he saith, by your judgment: I the yon-"ger might step into his place, and succeed him whom I had killed. What meaneth then, and "whence serveth that other part of his Oration, wherein he saith, that I have been so respective to
 "the Romans, and that upon the assurance that I have in them, I hoped to be King? For if I were
 "perswaded thus of the Romans, that they could set up whom they pleased to be King of Mace- "donia, & if withal I presumed so much of their good grace and favor to me, what need had
 "I then to commit a parricide? Was it because I had a mind to wear a diadem embroiled with my "brothers blood by me murdered? and was I desirous to make my self odious & execrable among "them, with whom either for mine honesty indeed, or at least waies for a counterfeit shew ther-
 "of I have won some credit, such as it is, if haply it be any at all? Unless perhaps, you think that
 "T. Quintius (by whose vertue and counsel, you reproach me that I am ruled) advised me to kill
 "my brother, Quintius, I say, who is so kind unto his own brother, and liveth with him so loving"ly. This plaintiff & accuser of mine hath collected not only the affection of the Romans which "they bear unto me, but also the opinion which the Macedonians have of me, yea, and in manner
 "the consent of all Gods and men in my behalf: in which regards all, he took himself not able to "match me in this quarrel and difference about the Kingdom: and yet see, how the same man
 "laith to my charge, that as if I were in all other respects, inferior unto him, I was faine to have "recourse to this last shift of practising mischief and wickedness. Will you have this to be the case?
 "Will you be content to join issue in this point? That whether of us twain feared the other to be "reputed worthies of the Kingdom, he should be judged & condemned to have sought and con"trived the death of his brother? But let us discuss and examine in some sort or other, the order "and manner of this pretended and devised crime. He hath burdened me, that I have laid for him
 "many and sundry waies; yet hath he knit up all these means and conditid them together in one
 "daies work. I purposed to kill him (saith he) in the open day-light, after the solemn review and "assailing of the army, even when we joisted together, and seemed to charge one another in bat-
 "tel-wis: yea, upon the very day (God he knoweth) of the said solemnity, I intended I wis (be"lieve him if you will) when I invited him to supper, to make him away with a cup of poison. I "would have stabbed him (what else?) or run him through with my sword, when I came to ban-
 "ket with him & was accompanied with some of my train armed and having weapon about them.
 "You see, father, what proper and choice opportunities I had picked out to commit this preten"ded murder; namely the very day of disports, the time of supper, of banquet and collation. As for "the day, let us examine it and the manner thereof: was it any other than this, wherein the army
 "was reviewed and solemnly purged? when between a sacrifice, cut in twain, the royal coats of all
 "the arms of Macedonian Kings that ever had been, were carried aloft in a stately shew; and we "alone your two sons (father) marched on either side of you before the rest, and the whole Ma"cedonian army followed after. When I was thus cleaved and purified by this expiatory sacrifice
 "(if haply I had committed any sin before that deserved expiation) and especially at the very "same instant when I beheld before mine eyes (on either side of the way) the parcels of the beast "sacrificed: entertained I then in my thoughts the practise of poison, & the handling of sword pre"pared

- A "pared aforehand against the banquet, to perform a parricide that afterwards I might with some "other sacrifice expiate and cleanse my conscience thus stained & defiled with all kind of wicked"ness: A likely matter surely. But a spirit corrupt & blinded with the humour of flandering ano"ther, upon a desire to gather matter and make all suspicious, careth not to huddle one thing upon "another confusedly. For if I meant to have poisoned you at supper, what was there more unfit "to set forward that designment, than to provoke you to anger, by running so eagerly upon you &
"fighting with you so roughly, that thereby you might take good and just occasion to refuse be"ing requested, for to come to supper? And when in your choler you had once denied to sup with "me, was it not the next way for me then, to endeavour how to appease you, and seek some other "opportunity, since I had prepared the poison for that present only? But I must leap from that de"signment to another, even to the killing of you by the sword, and that upon the very same day,
"under a pretence of banquetting with you? If I thought that for fear of death you forbore my ta"ble at supper time, how comes it that I imagined not seemably, that for the said tear you would "avoid my company at banquet after supper? There is no cause why I should be ashamed, Father,
"if upon such a festival day as it was I drank wine liberally, and took perhaps a cup too much a"mong my companions. Nay, I would it might please your majesty to enquire with what mirth, "and merriment I feasted yesterday at home in my house, and this joy set us the farther out, be"cause in that warlike pastime of lusty youths, our side went not by the worse. But this misery &
"unhappy fear upon that our mirth, hath well delayed and cooled the wine: spent it hath the "strength thereof fuming up into our heads, which if it had not come between, we as great laiers
"C "await as we were had to this hour lien sound asleep in our beds. Well, if I had minded to assail
"and force your house, and that done to murder you the master thereof, would I not think you,
"have for born for my part one day to bib and quaff wine so freely? and likewise kept my souldiers
"from drinking drunk? But because I should not alone plead my simplicity and make my excuse "thereby, this my good brother also, who God wor is none of these naughty and suspicious crea"tures, comes in with his vie and faith, I know nothing, I charge nobody, neither wor I what to "say else, but that they came armed to banquet with me. If I might be so bold as to ask how you "came to that knowledge, you cannot chuse but confess that either my house was full of your
"spies, or those armed men of my train took their weapons so openly, that every one saw them.
"And because he would have you believe, that neither himself made any enquiry before, nor at
"D "this time pursueth the matter with any accusatory spirit, he willed you to demand of them whom
"he named, whether they had not their swords about them? to the end that after you had sought
"into it as a matter doubtful, and found them to confess it, they might thereby be held convicted.
"But why rather will you not, that examination should be taken in this manner: whether they "took their swords with them to kill you or no? And whether they did so by my warrant, directi"on, and privy? For this is it that you (brother) would make the world believe, this is it which "you would have to appear, and not that which my men confess. But the case is plain, yea, & they "will be known no other, than that they were armed in their own defence. Whether it were well "or ill done, they are of age to make account and render a reason of their doings. Do not you
"minge my cause with that action of theirs, which interesteth it nothing at all. But rather de-"E "clare, whether we meant to assail you openly or secretly? If openly, why were we not all armed?
"why was there none of us besides those persons that did beat your spie? If secretly, what was the "traid and order of the execution of that design? After the banquet ended, and I the setter of the "banquet retired from thence, should those four have staid behind to fall upon you when you "were asleep? How could they have carried it so close as not to be spied, for that a little before, they "had been seen in a brawl? And say, they had killed you; by what means could they escape them"selves? Was it possible that your house should be forced and kept with four swords? Fie; fie
"F "Perseus speak no more for shame of this night, but come again to that rather which galleth you
"at the heart, which kindleth your envy, and setteth you on fire. How cometh it to pass, O Deme"trius, that men speak abroad that you shall be King? why should you be deemed of some more "worthy than myself, to succeed the royal estate of my father? How is it that I am in doubt of my "hope, which but for you, were sure & certain? These are the fether thoughts of Perseus, although "he saith nothing, these make him of a brother to become an enemy: these cause him to be mine
"accuser, these concern they be that fill your palace, your court and your realm, with surmises, slan"ders, and suspicions. But for mine own part, father, like as I ought neither to hope for your roial
"crown, nor at any time peradventure, to make words and dispute about it; because I am the "younger, and because it is your will and pleasure, that I should give place unto mine elder bro"ther: so it became me not heretofore, neither doth it become me yet, to demean my self so in any "action, that I should seem unworthy to have you for my father, but to be capable of all dignities "whatsoever. The one point I should strain unto by indirect courses and wicked vices, in not
"G "yielding unto him as right and reason would; but the other, by my good carriage and sober be"haviour. You reproach me with the Romans, brothers, and those things which in right ought to "turn to my praise and glory, you blame and reprove me for. It was no seeking of mine, that I was "delivered to the Romans as an hostage, or sent to Rome as Ambassador: but when I was ap"pointed by you, father, I refused not to go. At both times, such was my demeanor, that I had an "eye still and good regard, not to discredit either your highness, or your Kingdom, or the Mac"donian nation. And therefore you were the cause, father, of that friendship which I have with the "Romans.

“Romans. As long as you and they are at peace, I shall be well affected to them: begin war once: that was an hostage and Ambassador among them, and (though I say it) not unprofitable for you my father, even I, will become a most spiteful and mortal enemy unto them. Neither do I at this day require, that the favour I have among the Romans might stead me any way: only I beseech you that it may not prejudice and harm me. It began not by occasion of war, neither is it reserved for the time of war. For assurance of peace, I was a pledge and hostage: for maintenance of peace, I was employed in embassy. Content will I be, by the one and the other, in case I neither purchase fame nor incur blame. If I have committed any impiety against you father, if I have done or designed any wicked part against my brother, I refuse no punishment, I crave no pardon or favor. If I be innocent, I desire only and humbly beseech your grace, that I be not overweighed with the heavy load of envy and ill will, since I can be overthrown by no crime justly. I objected unto me. This is not the first day, that my brother hath accused me: but this is the first day, that he is seen to be my accuser: and full little have I deserved it at his hands. If my father had been displeased and angry with me, I would have thought that you of all others, being the elder brother, should have been a mediator and intercessor for me (the younger) to my father, and a means to purchase a pardon for my folly and the error of tender youth: but see! where my succour and refuge should have been, there contrary-wise is my ruin and overthrow. From my feasting and banquetting, from my mirth and good cheer, by his means have I been haled hither nor halt waked, but with mine eyes full of sleep, to answer in the case of parricide: and forced I am to plead mine own cause without my counsel, without my proctor or advocate. If I had been to speak in the defence of another, I would have taken time to study, premeditate and frame an oration. And yet, what was I to hazard there, but the reputation of wit and learning. Instead thereof I not knowing for what cause I was sent for, heard your Majesty first (wroth and angry as you were) to command us to plead our causes: and then my brother, who hath stood up to accuse me. As for him, he hath pronounced an Oration studied for, and devised long before hand: but I was allowed no longer time (than whiles I heard my self accused) to be think me what to plead, or to examine and take knowledge of the matter that he hath laid forth against me. In that present moment of time, could I, think you (so suddenly taken as I was) either give ear to my accuser, or consider and think duly of mine own plea? Stonied so I was, with that sudden trouble and unexpected occurrent, that much ado I had, to understand what I was charged with: so far was I from devising what to speak in mine own defence. What hope should I have now? and in what case were I, if I had not my father for my judge? at whose hands (albeit I am not so well beloved as mine elder brother is, yet since I am the party defendant, I ought at leastwise to find as much pity and compassion. For I beseech you (O father) to save me, in regard of my self and you: but he requireth you to take away my life, only for his own assurance and better security. And what will he do against me think you, after you have made over the crown and scepter into his hands: who now already thinketh it meet and reason, to dispose of my blood at his good pleasure? In uttering of these words, the tears gushed forth so abundantly, that they stopped his mouth so, that he could neither speak or draw his breath. Then Philip after he had commanded them to go apart, and communed a while with his friends, spake and said, That he would not decide their cause upon these words of theirs, nor upon one hours debating, but by enquiry into both their lives, and observing their behaviour in deed and word, as well in great matters as in small. Hereby they all saw well enough, that the accusation of the precedent nights act, was sufficiently refuted and evicted & the only thing in Demetrius to be suspected, was the over-great favour that the Romans bare toward him. This was the very seed of the Macedonian war, sowed as one would say, during the life of Philip, but the war was after to be waged most of all against Persians.

“The two Consuls took their journey into Liguria, the sole consular Province of them both: and because they had achieved their exploits fortunately there, ordained there was a solemn procession on one day. It fortuned that there came two thousand Ligurians or thereabout to the utmost frontier of the Province of Gaul, where Marcellus lay in leaguer, requesting to be received under his protection. Marcellus after he had commanded the said Ligurians to give attendance upon him in the same place, required by his letters the advice of the Senat. The Senat gave order to M. Ogulnus the Lord chief justice of the City, to write back again unto Marcellus to this effect. That it was more meet that the Consuls, unto whom that government appertained, should give order and determine (as touching the Ligurians who yielded and submitted) what was expedient for the common-weal in that behalf, than the Senat. As for them, if they were to give their opinion, they thought it not good to accept of the Ligurians surrender: and being once received then to be disarmed: but they were of this mind and advice, that it was requisite they should be sent and referred over to the Consuls.

“The Pretors at the same time arrived in their Provinces, to wit P. Manlius in bale Spain, where he had been Governor before during his former Pretorship; and Q. Fulvius Flaccus to the higher: where he received the army of Terentius: for that other side of Spain beyond Iberus, had been left without a Lord Deputy by occasion of the death of P. Sempronius the Pro-pretor. Whiles Fulvius Flaccus assaulted a Town in Spain named Ubicula, the Colibierians made head and came upon him: where many and bloody hot skirmishes passed, and wherein many Roman soldiers were both hurt and slain. Howbeit Fulvius held still his resolution, and by no forcible

A nible means whatsoever could be brought to levy the siege. The Celtiberians roiled out of heart with divers combats, retired and departed. The City then seeing their succours dislodged and gone, within few daies was forced and ransacked; and the Pretor gave the pillage thereof to his soldiers. Thus Fulvius after he had gained this Town, and P. Maelius, when he had retired and rallied his forces into one place, which had been dispersed, without any other memor. ble act performed, brought their armies within the wintering harbours. And these were the exploits in Spain, during that summer season. Terentius who was departed out of that Province before, entered the City of Rome with a petty triumph, by way of ovation. He carried before him in the eight thousand three hundred and twenty pound weight of silver, and four score of gold; besides two golden coronets weighing 67 pound.

B The same year the Romans were chosen Arbitrators between the people of Carthage and King Masinissa touching their territories: and came personally to see the place in controversy. And thus stood the case: Gala the father of this Masinissa, had won the ground in question from the Carthaginians. Syphax afterward disleized Gala thereof: and consequently to gratify Masinissa, his wive's father, freely gave the same to the Carthaginians, and set them in possession again. Now last of all, even this very year, Masinissa had dispossessed the Carthaginians of the same. This matter was debated by the parties of both sides in the presence of the Romans, with no less courage and fervency of spirit, than at other times when they tried the issue by dint of sword in open field. The Carthaginians laid claim and put in their plea. For that first it appertained to their ancestors in right of inheritance, and afterwards was conveyed to them by their free gift and donation of Syphax. Masinissa counterpleaded again and alleged, that he had both recovered the said territory, as parcel of his fathers realm, and also held it by the law of nations: and that the case was, deep on his side, in regard as well of the just title as also of the present possession where in he was: saying, that in his cause he doubted nothing else but that the modesty of the Romans should prejudice him, for fear lest they might be thought to be partial in the cause and respectivo to him: King their ally and good friend, and in favour of him to give up their award against the common enemies both to him and them. The Commissioners and arbitrators would not infringe and alienate the right of possession, but left all as they found it, and referred the entire decision of the matter to the Senat of Rome.

C Nothing was there done after this in Liguria: for first the enemies were retired for safety into their wilds and forests out of the way and afterwards they called their army and slept away every man to their own villages and castles. The Consuls likewise were willing to break up and dismiss their forces, and thereupon sent to the L. of the Senat to know their pleasure in that point, who advised the one of them to discharge his own regiments, and repair to Rome for the election of Magistrate the next year: and the other, with his legions, to winter at Pisa. A rumour there ran, that the Transalpine French put their youth and serviceable men in arms: but it was not known what quarter of Italy this multitude thus levied would invade. But the Consuls thus agreed together, that M. Baebius should be present at the general assembly at Rome, for the election already, because M. Baebius his brother sued to be Consul. Then was the assembly holden for the creation of Consuls, and elected there were, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and M. Baebius Tamphilus. This done,

E the Pretors also were chosen, namely, the two Quintus Fabii, the one Maximus, and the other Bepet. T. Claudius Nero, Q. Petilius Spurius, M. Pinarius Polca and L. Durranius. When these were entered into their magistracy the Provinces were by lot after this manner disposed. The Ligurians fell to the Consuls: as for the Pretors, Q. Petilius was Lord chief Justice for the citizens pleas, and Q. Fabius Maximus for the strangers: Q. Fabius Buto had the government of Gaul, T. Claudius Nero of Sicilia, M. Pinarius of Sardinia, L. Durranius of Apulia together with the Istrians: for that the Tarentins and Brundisins had given intelligence, that the sea-coasts were much troubled and annoied by the robberies of pirates and men of war from beyond Sea: and the like complaints were made by the Messilians, of the Ligurian navy. For these causes order was given, and warrants went out for to levy armies: that the Consuls should have four legions between them, contain-

F ing in every one 5200 Roman footmen and 300 horse: also to enrol 15000 footmen and 800 horsemen of Latine allies. In the Provinces of Spain (both the one and the other) the old Pretors continued still in their government, with the charge of those armies which they had already: and for a supplement to reeeforce and make up their broken companies, there were appointed 3000 foot and 700 horse of Roman citizens together with 6000 of the one and 300 of the other, from out of the Latine nation. All this while they forgot not their navy at Sea. And the Consuls had in charge to ehuse for that purpose, two wardens called Duumvirs, who after they had out of the Arsenal shoo into the Sea twenty ships, and set them afloat, should furnish them with mariners, and shoo Roman citizens, such as had been slaves and were enfranchised: and that natural Romans, free-born should only be Captains and have the conduct of the said vessels. These two Duumvirs so parted and ordered betwix them the defence of the maritime coasts, with ten ships apiece: that the Cape of Minerva should be as it were the middle point and mark between them: so as the one should guard that part on the right hand as far as to Massilia; and the other the left

G side, even to Bonnum. This year were seen at Rome and reported from forraign parts many uncount and strange prodigies: In the Church-yards belonging to Vulcan and Concordia, it rained sheer blood: and the Bishops made relation, that the Spears [of Mars] shook and moved of their own accord.

Also at L. Junium the image of Juno Sospita stood near. Moreover, the plague seized to how in the country villages market Towns farms and places of frequent resort, yea, and within the City of Rome, that they were not able to furnish the funerals accordingly and bury the dead. The LL. of the Senate, being in great agonish and trouble, in regard of those fearful plagues and deaths of their people, obtained, That as well the Consul should kill greater beasts for sacrifice unto what God they thought good, as also the Decemviri should visit and peruse the propheticall books of Sibylla. And by vertue of their decree there was publick supplication proclaimed in Rome for one whole day, at all the altars and shrines of the gods and goddesses. By their counsel also and direction, both the Senate advised and the Consuls also published throughout all Italy for three daies space, solemn litanies and devout holy-daies. The rage of this pestilence was to great, that whereas there passed an act by the Senate to enrol 3000 footmen and three hundred horse from out of the Latins (in regard that thelanders of Corfica were revoked and the Iolians up in arms within Sardinia) with which power M. Pincius the Pretor was to sail over into Sardinia: the Consuls made report again unto them, that such numbers of people were dead already, and so many lay in, that it was not possible to levy that proportion of fighting men. So the Pretor had commission to furnish out that defect of souldiers, with a supply which he was to receive of C. Babius the Pro-consul, who then wintered at Pisa; and from them directly to take the same and pass over into Sardinia.

L. Demetrius the Pretor (unto whom the Province of Apulia was allotted) had a commission besides to make inquisition for the Bacchanals, for there remained yet some seeds of the former enormities, which began already the former year to sprout and bud forth. But L. Pappus the Pretor last before had entered into the enquiry and search of the matter, rather than effected ought and brought it to a final end: and therefore the LL. gave order to this new Pretor to cancel this mischief in the spring and breeding thereof, before it gat more head a second time, and upon growth spread farther. Moreover, the Consuls by the advice and authority of the Senat, prefetred certain laws unto the people, as touching the inordinat suit and ambitious seeking after offices of government. After all this, they brought into the Senat the forrein embassages; and gave audience first to them that came from the KK. to wit, Eumenes, Attius the Cappadocian, and Pharnaces of Parthia. But no other dispatch and answer they had than this. That they would send certain Delegates and commissioners, to hear, decide, and determine their controversies. After them the Ambassadors of the Lacedemonian ealles, and of the Achaeans, were admitted into the Senat house. The banished persons aforesaid were put in some good hope, that the Senat would write their letters to the Achaeans for their restoration. The Achaeans declared as touching the recovery of Messina and the pacification of all troubles there, with the great contentment of the LL. of the Senat. There arrived moreover two Embassadors from Philip King of the Macedonians, namely Philoteles and Apelles, about no suit that they had to the Senat, but sent rather as spies to understand and to learn somewhat as touching those points that Perseus had charged Demetrius with, and namely of certain speeches that he should have with the Romans, and especially with T. Quinctius, against his brother, about succession in the Kingdom. These twain were chosen by the King as indifferent persons, and nothing affectionat either to the one brother or the other: howbeit they were the ministers, consorts, and complices of Perseus, in his intended mischievous plot against his brother. Demetrius (as one ignorant of all designments against him, but only of the live wicked prank of Perseus which last brake out) at the first, was neither in great hope, nor yet in utter despair, to be reconciled unto his father. But afterwards, he had less confidence every day than other in the good affection of his father toward him, seeing his brother continually to buzz into his ears many matters, and possess his head with tales against him. And therefore he looked circumspectly about him that he trode not awry, and namely, that he let no words fall, or did any thing that might be offensive and breed more jealousy; and above all, he wholly forbore conference and commerce with the Romans; in such sort, that he would not have them so much as to write any letters unto him: knowing full well, that his fathers heart would be enflamed against him by such importations and informations especially.

Philip because he would provide that his souldiers and men of action should not degenerate and wax worie through idleness and disuse of arms and that under one he might avert from himself all suspicion that he intended any war against the Romans, appointed the City Strabi for the Rendezvous of his army, and marched into the quarters of Madock. A great desire he had to mount up the crest & top of the hill * Ennus because there was an opinion commonly received & which he had given credit unto, that from thence a man might discover within one prospect, the * Portick and Adriatick seas, the river * Iffra also and the Aspritor thus he thought, that the view of these places would stand him in no small stead in projecting & plotting the war against the Romans. When after diligent inquiry of them that knew those quarters well, as touching the aspect of that mountain, he had learned and found it cleer and certain, that there was no way at all for to conduct an army thither and that a few men & those nimble and lightly appointed should find enough to do and exceeding much difficulty to passe he taketh his younger son apart, whom he was resolved next to have with him in that expedition; and because he would seem to duple and multiply his discontented mind with some familiar and private speech first he demanded of him considering so great difficulties of the journey presented unto them, whether he were better to hold on the way still and follow his design, or give over? But if I should go forward (qd. he) I cannot forget that which

HA besell so Antigonus in the like case, who being upon a time much tossed at Sea in a boisterous tempest, and having with him in the same ship all those that were of his blood, is reported to have given this good advertisement and lesson to his children, that they should always remember, and also give their posterity warning never to venture all their goods in one bottom, nor to engage themselves together with their whole race and posterity in any peril and danger. Remembering therefore (said he) this good precept and counsel of his, I will not hazard both my sons at once in this present jeopardy which I see before mine eyes: but for as much as I propose to take mine elder son with me, I will lead my younger back into Macedony, for to uphold and maintain the hope of my posterity, and for the defence of my Kingdom in the meanwhile. Demetrius joined him (straight, and wist well enough that he was sent away for no other intent but that he should not be present in counsel, when upon the view of those places abovesaid, he was to devise and confide in what coast lay the needest and shortest way to the Adriatick Sea and to Italy, and what course they should plot for the management of the war. But there was no remedy he must not only then obey his father, but also soothe him up and seem to approve and like well of that which he said, for fear lest it might be thought, that it were against his stomach to yeeld obedience unto him, and so be held in more jealousy and suspicion than before. Howbeit, to the end that he might pass into Macedony with safety, Didas one of the Kings Deputies and L. Governor under him of Paeonia, was commanded to accompany and conduct him with a mean guard and convoy. Now was this Didas one of those conspirators that had sworn the death of Demetrius, whom Perseus had made sure to his private as he had many other of his fathers friends, even since that men began to make no doubt, unto whom Philip in affection was inclined, and whom he meant to make the heir apparent of the crown. And at this very instant Perseus had charged him and given him instructions, by all obsequious services to ingrate and wind himself into most familiar talk, and to come so neer within him, that he might draw from him all his secrets, & discover the very inward and hidden thoughts of his heart. Thus departed Demetrius attended with a train about him more dangerous to his person, than if he had travelled alone without any company. Philip first passed through Medea, and then forward over the desarts lying between Medea and Amant, and at the seventh daies march was come as far as to the foot of the mountain. Where after he had rested and staid one day, to make choite of those whom he minded to take up with him the morrow after he set forth & put himself in his way. At the first, the labour was not great, nor the pains much to overcome the pethermost hills; but the farther they went and the higher that they advanced the more wild and woody still they found every place; yea, and they met with many that had no passage at all. At length they were mounted to a pass or way so shadowed and dark, that for the trees standing so thick together, and their boughs plaited and interlaced one within another, scarcely or hardly could a man see the sky through them. But when they approached once the pitch and crest of the mountain, behold (nothing not lightly seen in other parts) they light upon so gross and thick a mist, which overspread and covered all that they had as much ado to march forward, as if they had travelled in the dark & mid-night. At last by the third daies end, they gaiped the very top of the mountain. Now when they were come down from thence again, they made no less report thereof than the common opinion was that went of it, which I believe truly they did of purpose, because they would not be mocked and scorned for this their foolish and vain voyage, rather than for that they could indeed within the same prospect and from one place view less mountains, and rivers, seas, and distant so far asunder. Much moiled they were all, and sore toiled in this onward way; but the King above the rest, by reason that he was far steeper in age, and unwieldy of body. Well after he had done sacrifice there upon two altars consecrated to Jupiter and the Sun, he descended in two daies, whereas he had made three of it in ascending; and that which he feared most, was the cold nights, which then in the beginning of the dog daies were like to those of midwinter in other places. Many difficulties he wrestled and strove withal during those daies, and being returned into his camp, he found no better. Nothing was there but extreme want & penury, as being pitched in a place compassed about on every side with desarts and wilderness. And therefore when he had staid there but one only day to rest and repose his men, whom he had taken with him in that journey, he hastned away, and in a running march, as if he had fled in rout, entered the country of the Dacæthæ. These Dacæthæ were his own confederate allies, but the Macedonians (such was their need and necessity) pillied and spoiled their confines, no less than if they had been professed enemies. For first they waited & destroyed their herds, granges, and farm houses, afterwards certain villages and villages also, robbing and sacking as they went, to the great dishonour of the King, who could not chuse but hear the piteous complaints & moans of his associates crying to the Gods, Phylons of alliance, and calling upon his name for help, but could have no redress and remedy. When he was purveyed of corn from thence, and returned into the country Medea, he began to assail a City which they call Parrus. Himself in person lay encamped in the avenue and ready way upon the plains, but he sent his son Perseus with a small company to fetch a compass and give the assault from the higher places that surrounded the Town. The Townsmen that hard bested with terror on every side for the present yeilded upon composition, and gave hostages; but after the army was retired, they forgetting their pledges, abandoned the City and fled to refuge into certain forts, houses, places and high mountains. Philip having weakened his soldiers with all manner of travel to no effect, and which continued more jealous and suspicion of his son Demetrius, by the long absence and late suggestions of Didas (the Governor of Pamphylus returned into Macellum. This Didas (as hath been said before) sent to conduct Demetrius home, abused the simplicity of the young Gentleman, who was nothing suspicious and wary. But being discontented and complained to him (as good cause he had) of those that were deceitful in nature and blood unto him: he, Phay, by flattery, by soothing him up, and hearing what he to be offended and grieved for his part at such hard usage, laid snares and grins, and in respect for him; and in conclusion, by his double diligence, and offering his voluntary service to do him pleasure, promising also to be true and fast unto him, yea, and to keep his counsel, fetched out of him the very secrets of his heart. Now had Demetrius a purpose with himself to flee to Rome, and to effectuate this designment of his, he was persuaded, that of a special grace and favour the Gods had sent and offered unto him this Didas the Pretor of Pamphylus to be his helper and assistant: for through his Province he conceived some hope to pass and escape with security. This intent and plot of his was both immediately disclosed to his brother Perseus, and also by him declared to his father. And first were letters hereof brought unto him, while he lay at the siege of Perrus. Afterwards Herodorus (the principal friend that Demetrius had) was committed to ward, and withal, order was taken to watch and observe Demetrius that he flattered not aside; but all underhand and close, without semblance of any such matter. These occurrences above all others, caused the King to have a dolorous and heavy return into Macellum. These new accusations thus presented, troubled him much: howbeit he thought good to expect the return of those whom he had sent to Rome as spies to hear all and find out the truth. In the anguish and agony of these cares and perplexities, when the King had continued certain months, in the end those Embassadors came home: who at first ere they set foot out of Macellum, had devised and framed before hand what reports they would make from Rome. These messengers, to make up the full measure of all their wicked and devilish practices, delivered also into the Kings hand a false and forged letter, sealed with a counterfeit signet of T. Quintus. The said letter was indited to this tenor and effect, That Quintus should seem for his own excuse to say, that albeit young Demetrius, carried away with an insatiable desire to be King, had slipped a little, and treated with him about some such matter, yet would he do nothing to prejudice any one about K. Philip; neither would he be thought or found a man to give any ungodly and unmerciful counsel. These letters struck it dead fore, and made the King believe, that all the former imputations fastned upon Demetrius were true and past all peradventure. Whereupon Herodorus presently was put to the rack and examined, but as yet he had endured insupportable pains a long time, and confessed nothing he did in the end under the tormentors hand. Perseus accused Demetrius again before his father, for that he intended and provided to take his flight through Pamphylus. And there came forth certain to testify against him, saying, that he had corrupted, inveigled and induced them to accompany him in that journey. But that which made most of all against him, was that false devised letter of T. Quintus. Howbeit there was no grievous sentence pronounced openly against him to the end, that rather by some covert and crafty means left some open punishment executed upon him, might reveal and discover his secret designment, of making war upon the Romans.

Philip himself taking his journey from Thessalonica to come to Demetrius, sent Demetrius his son to Aethrum, a City in Pamphylus, and the same Didas likewise accompany him: but Perseus he addressed to Amphipolis, for to receive the hostages of the Thracians. Now it is reported, that when Didas took his leave of him and departed, the King gave him in charge to kill his son Demetrius. Didas then, either purposing indeed or making semblance to sacrifice, invited Demetrius to the celebration and feast thereof; whereupon he came from Aethrum to Amphipolis. And (as men say) at this supper he met with a cup of poison. He had no sooner drunk it, but immediately he felt that he was sped: for within a while it began to work extremely, and for very dolor and pain, he was forced to rise from the Table and retire into his bed-chamber: where he piteously complained of the hard heart and cruelty of his father, of the murderous mind of the parricide his brother, and of the treacherous villainy of Didas: and all this while endured deadly wrings and torments in his belly. But afterwards there were sent into the chamber, one Thyrsus a Sabinian, and Alexander of Beribae, who wrapped his head and throat with the bed-cloths, and counterpoises of cupidity, and held them so hard, that they choked and smothered him and in the end stopped his breath that he died. Thus was this poor innocent young man presently made away: while enemies one single kind of death, could not consent and satisfy, baronely they must kill and murder them twice.

While these things hapned in Macedony, L. Emilius Paulus, who continued still in government after his Consulship expired, marched with his army against the Ligurians Inimicus in the beginning of the spring. So soon as he was entered into the confines of his enemies country, and there encamped; there came Embassadors unto him under colour of seeking peace, but indeed only to elude and spite. Paulus made them answer, That he could contract no accord with them, unless they yielded first: which they seemed not so much to refuse; but said, That they needed some time to persuade their nation unto it, being a rude and unskillful kind of people. And when they had ten daies more allowed to effect this, they requested more over that the Roman soldiers might not pass over the next hills adjoining either for feller or forage, forasmuch as those lands were the only tilled and well cultivated grounds of their apparement and territory. When they had obtained so much, they assembled all their forces on that side of the hills, from whence they had murdered.

A had averted the enemies, and suddenly with a mighty multitude charged upon the Roman camp, and assaulted all the avenues and gates thereof at once. With all forcible means they continued the assault in such sort, as the Romans had not so much as either time enough to set forth and display their ensigns, or room sufficient to put their army in order of battle; but were compelled to defend their camp more by standing thick thronged together against the enemies in the very gates than otherwise by hardy fighting. But about the going down of the sun, when the enemies were retired, Paulus dispatched two light horsemen with letters to M. Babius the Consul, as far as Pisa, that he should come away with all speed to succour him, being in time of true besieged. But Babius had delivered up his army before to M. Pinarus, the Pretor, as he went into Sardinia. Howbeit he both certified the Senat by his letters, that L. Emilius was invested by the Ligurians, and he wrote also to M. Cl. Marcellus, whose province was next adjoining, to bring over his forces (if he thought so good) out of Gaul in to Liguria, and deliver L. Emilius from siege. But alas, these succours should have come all too late; for the Ligurians the very next day returned and advanced against the camp. Emilius, albeit he not only knew that they would come, but also might have brought his power forth into the field and ranged them in array, yet he kept himself to close within the strength of his rampart, minding to hold off and not to fight, not till Babius might with his army come from Pisa. Now the letters of Babius caused great fear at Rome; and to muce the more, for that Marcellus being returned to the City, some few daies after he had made over his army unto Fabius, put them out of all hope, that the army which was in France could not possibly passe into Liguria, by reason of the war with the Ilirians, who impeached the planting of the colony at Aquilia; against whom Fabius was gone, and might not possibly retire from thence, now that the war was once begun. The only hope they had therefore of aiding Emilius was this, (and yet the same seemed to be with the least, considering the urgent necessity of the time) in case the Consuls made halt to go into their provinces: which to do all the L.L. of the Senat called aloud and earnestly unto them. But the Consuls denied flatly to stir one foot before the levy of souldiers was fully finished; alledging that it was not their slackness, but the violence of the plague, which caused it to be so late ere it were performed. Yet for all this, such was the general accord and consent of the Senat, that they could neither will nor chuse but go forth of the City in their rich coats of arms, and by proclamation to assigne a certain day, upon which all the souldiers whom they had enrolled should shew at Pisa: and commission they had to take up souldiers, all the country over as they went, to presse them forth presently and have them away. Moreover, the Pretors, Q. Postumus and Q. Fabius were both of them commanded, the one, namely, Postumus, to enrol in half two tumultuary legions of Roman citizens, and tender the military oath to all that were not above fiftie years old: and Fabius, to levy of the Latine allies fifteen thousand foot, and eight hundred horsemen. The two Duumvirs or Wardens for the navy and the ports were created, namely, C. Maturnus and C. Lucretius, who were soon provided of ships ready rigged, trimmed and furnished to their hands. And Maturnus, who had the charge of the coasts upon the gulf of Gaul, was commanded to bring his fleet with all speed possible along, to the tract of the Ligurians, if haply he might any way head L. Emilius and his army. Emilius after he perceived that no aid appeared from any place, supposing verily that the two horse men above said, were intercepted and staid by the way, thought good to put off no longer, but along with his own forces to trie the fortune of a fight. And thereupon before the enemies came (who now already began more coldly and heavily to assault them then before) he put his men in battell array at the four gates of the camp, to the end that upon the signal given, they should at once from all parts fall forth. To the four extraordinary cohorts, he adjoined two other, under the conduct of M. Valerius a Lieutenant, and commanded them to break forth at the false postern gate called Extranearia: within the gate Principalis on the right hand, he embattelled the Hastati or Travellers of the first legion, and the principes of the same legion in the rearward to second them, commanded both by M. Servilius and L. Salpinx, Kn. marshals, or Tribunes military. The third legion he marshalled full against the other gate Principalis on the left hand. This change only was here, for that the Principes were set in the front, and the Hastati behind in the tail of them. Sex. Julius Caesar and L. Aurelius Cotta, two military Tribunes had the leading of this legion. Q. Fulvius Flaccus a Lieutenant, having the conduct of the right wing, was placed at the gate Quartana. Two cohorts and the Tenth of two legions had commandment to stay behind for the defence of the camp. The General himself in person rode all about from gate to gate, exhorting and encouraging his men: using all the forcible means he possibly could devise, to provoke and whet the stomachs of his souldiers, and to give a point of edge to their courage and choler: one while reproaching his enemies for their falshood and treachery, who having craved peace and obtained truce: during the time of the said truce, against all law of nations were come to assault the camp: another while showing and declaring unto them what shame and indignity it was for the Roman army to be besieged by the Ligurians, who more truly may be accounted thieves and robbers, then good warlike enemies. (quoth he) you should escape from hence, not by your own vertues and valour, but through the help and succour of others, with what face shall any of you be able to meet, May, not such souldiers who have vanquished Ambrax, defeated Philip, and subdued Antiochus, the mightiest King, and greatest commanders of our age: but even them who many a time have turned and chased the very same Ligurians like brute beasts, over the wilds and forrests as they fled, and hewed them in peeces in the end.

That which the Spaniards, that which the Gauls, that which the Macedonians and Carthaginians had not enterprised, namely, to approach and enter upon the temple of the Roman camp, shall a Ligurian enemy adventure to do? Shall he of his own accord presume to besiege and assault our camp, whom heretofore when we beat all the blind bushes, by woods and thickets, to start him out, we had much ado to find, he lay so close and lurked so covertly? At these words the soldiers set up a conlonant cry in token of applause, and answered him with a general shout, saying, there was no fault on their part, seeing that no man had given them the signal to issue forth and make a sally. For let him but once say the word to sound the trumpet, he should see and find, that both Romans and Ligurians were the same still as before-time. Now the Ligurians kept two camps on the neer side of the mountains affront the Roman leaguer, from whence (for the first daies so soon as the sun was up) they used to advance their ensigns, and march forward well armed, and ranked in battell array; but then they put no armor upon their backs, nor took weapon in hand, before they had filled their bellies well with meat and their heads with wine: they came forth (I say) dispersed and out of order; as who hoped and trusted assuredly, that the enemies would not march under their ensigns without their rampier. Against them (coming thus in disorder) the Romans issued forth at once, out of all the gates in one instant with a mighty shout, which not only they who were within the camp set up, but also the lackies, scallions, landers, and other drudges that follow the camp redoubled. This was such an unlooked for occurrent to the Ligurians, that they were set in as great an affright therewith, as if they had been surprized & beset all about with suddain ambushments. For a smal while there was some shew of a conflict, such as it was; but anon they took their heels and fled for life; but as they fled, they left their lives K behind them in every place. Then the men of arms had the signal given to mount on horseback, to pursue them & not suffer one to escape alive; & so in this fearful rout they were driven to take their camp for safety; but in the end were diseized and turned out of it also. That day were slain of the Ligurians not so few as fifteen thousand, and 2500 taken prisoners. Within three daies after, the whole nation of the Ligurian Ingaunes, yeelded absolutely, and put in their bodages. A search was made for all the pilots and mariners, who had exercised piracy on the sea, and they were all laid up fast in prison. Specially C. Marius one of the Duumvirs or wardens of the navy, met with two and thirty ships of that sort, belonging to men of war upon the coast of Liguria, and boarded them. To carry these news to Rome, and letters to the Senat, L. Anulius Costa, and C. Sulpicius Costa were sent to Rome; who also were to require that L. Anulius (when his time was expired) might depart out of his province, and bring his soldiers from thence with him, and so discharge them of service. Both these demands were granted by the Senat, and a solemn procession besides was ordeined in all churches and chappels, and every shrine and altar for three daies space. The Pretors also were commanded, Pesulus, to call and dismiss the legions of the City, and Fabius, to remit the Latine allies the levying and mustering of their soldiers. Also there was order given to the Pretor of the City, for to writ unto the Coss, and give them to understand, that the Senat thought it meet and reason, that the sabbatory soldiers (who were enrolled in host for the suddain tumult and alarm) should with all speed be licensed to depart.

The same year the colony of Grassus was planted in the territory of Tuscan, which in times past was conquered from the Tarquinians, and five acres of land was let out to every man. The Triumvirs who had the charge thereof to distribute these lands, were C. Calpurnius Piso, P. Claudius Pulcher, and C. Terentius Varro. A year it was of note, in regard of the drought that hapned, and the dearth of corn and all other fruits of the earth. For recorded it is, that in six month space it never rained one drop.

The same year it fortun'd, that a certain plow-men and labourers plowed and digged some what deep within the ground, in the lands of L. Petilius a secretary, (which lands lay under the hill Capitulum) there were found two coffers of stone, each of them about eight foot long and four foot broad, the lids and covers whereof were bound and lodered with lead. Both these chests had a superscription upon them in Greek and Latine letters to this effect, That in the one of them lay buried Numa Pompilius the son of Pompey, sometime King of Rome; and in the other, were belovved the books of the said Numa. The owner of this ground opened these coffers by the advice and counsel of his friends; and that which carried the title and inscription of the Kings sepulture, was found empty, without any shew or token of the reliques of a mans body, or any thing else, by reason the bones and all were rotten and consumed, in continuance of time, after so many years past. In the other were found two fardels, wrapped within wax candles (or ear-cloths) containing either of them seven books; which were not only whole and sound, but also seemed very fresh and new. One even of them were written in Latine, as touching the Pontificall law; the other seven in Greek, entitled, The discipline or doctrine of Philosophy, in such thole daies might afford Kalerius Arca (saith moreover, That they were the books of Pythagoras, according to the common received opinion of Numa, that he was the disciple of Pythagoras; herein giving credit to a probable lie, resembling a truth. These books were first read by thole friends of his who were present when the chests were opened; but afterwards as they came into more mens hands to be read, it chanced that Q. Petilius the lord chief justice of the City, desirous to peruse these books, borrowed them of L. Petilius, with whom he was familiarly acquainted by reason that the above-said Quintus Petilius had chosen the fore-said Livius into the decury of the Scribes and secretaries. When after he had read the titles with the summaries and

A and contents of every chapter, and finding the most part thereof, tending directly to shew the state of the religion then established, said unto L. Furius, that he purposed to sing those books into the fire; before he did so, he would permit him to use what means he thought, by order of law, or otherwise would serve his turn to recover the said books out of his hands, for good leave he should have to take that course without his displeasure, or any breach of friendship between them. The Scribe or notary aforesaid goeth to the Tribunes for their assistance, the Tribunes put the matter over to the Senat, before whom the Pretor said plainly, that he was ready to take his corporall oath, if it were to put to it, that those books ought neither to be read nor kept. Whereupon the Senat judged, that for such a matter the offer only of the Pretors oath was sufficient, and that the books should be burned with all speed possible in the open place of assemblies called Comitia; but they awarded withall, that they should be paid unto Q. Furius, the right owner as much money for the books, as the Pretor and the more part of the Tribunes of the Commons esteemed them worth. The Scribe would touch none of money; but his books were burnt in the foresaid place before all the people in a light fire, made by the ordinary servitors attending upon the sacrifices.

The same summer there arose suddenly a great war in the higher Spain. The Celtiberians had gathered a power of five & thirty thousand men, a number more then lightly at any time before they had levied. Now was Q. Fulvius Flaccus lord Deputy of that province. He for his part, because he was advertised that the Celtiberians put their youth in arms, had raised and assembled as great side of the confederates, as he could, but nothing came neer to the enemy in numbers of soldiers. In the beginning of the Spring he led his army into Carpentania, and encamped before the town Ebura, after he had planted a mean garrison within it. A few daies after the Celtiberians pitched their tents within two miles from thence, under a little hill. When the Roman Pretor perceived they were come, he sent his brother Marcius Fulvius with two companies of the horsemen of allies in espial, to view the enemies camp, willing him to approach as neer to the trench and rampier as he could, and to see what compass the camp took, but to forbear skirmish, and in any hand to retire, in case he perceived the Cavalry of their enemies made out against him. According to this direction, he did in every respect. And so for certain daies together, there was nothing done, but only these two companies of horsemen shewing first and afterwards retiring back so soon as the Cavalry of the enemies issued out of their camp. At length the Celtiberians also came forth and advanced forward withall their power, as well horse as foot, and having let them in ordinance of battell, staid as it were in the midst between. The whole ground was a smooth and even plain, fit to join a battell in. There stood the Spaniards (I say) expecting their enemies: But the Roman Pretor kept his men within the rampier four daies together; and they likewise of the other side held the same place still in battell array. The Romans all that while skired not a foot. The Celtiberians then seeing the enemies refused fight, held themselves quiet also within their camp: only the horsemen rid forth, and they kept accorde guard, to be in readiness if peradventure the enemies should be bauld and come abroad. Both of the one side and other, they went out of the back side of their camp to purvey forage and fuel, and impeached not one another. The Roman Pretor, supposing now that after so many daies rest, the enemies were born in hand and hoped fully, that he would never begin fight, commanded L. Atilius to take with him the left wing of the Cavalry, and six thousand of the provincial auxiliaries, and to search a compass about the hill which stood behind the enemies, and from thence so soon as they heard a Cry, to run down again and charge upon their camp. And because they might not be discovered, in the night time they departed. Flaccus the next morning by peep of day, sent out C. Scribonium (a colonel of the allies) against the enemies camp, with the extraordinary horsemen of the left wing: whom when the Celtiberians beheld both approaching neer toward them & also more in number then usually they had been, they put forth all their Cavalry at once out of the gates: & withall gave the signal to the Infantry also to come abroad. Scribonius, according to the direction given, so soon as ever he heard the first noise and shout of the horsemen, turned the head of his horse and reared back full upon the camp: there with the enemies followed more freely & first the horsemen, and within a while the footmen also, making full account to be masters of the Roman legions that day, and verily now were they put past half a mile. When Flaccus supposed that they were trained far enough from their camp, for succouring it, he issued forth at once in three places, with his army arranged before in order of battell within, and caused them to let up a mighty cry, not only to animate the soldiers to the combat, but also that their fellows behind the hill might hear it. Who made no stay, but presently ran down and let upon the enemies camp as they had in charge, where there were left in guard not above five hundred armed men. By reason therefore, that they within were so few, the enemies without so many, and the enterprise so sudden and unlooked for, they were mightily terrified, and so in manner without any skirmish and resistance at all, their hold was forced and won. Atilius set on fire that part of the wall, which might easily be seen of them that were fighting in the plain. Now the Celtiberians, who were behind in the rearguard, were the first that discovered the flame, but afterwards it was noised and went current through the main battell, that their camp were set on fire, and all on a light fire. The enemies were greatly amazed, but the Romans much more animated. For now they might hear the shout of their fellows, having the upper hand, now might they see the fear of their enemies burning with bright flames. The Celtiberians for a while stood in idleness, doubtfull what to do : but afterwards, perceiving they had no piece of safe retreat, upon their H discomfiture they should fall to running away, they saw no other hope but in fighting again, and so they began to renew the skirmish afresh, with more resolution then before. First, as they were encountered and charged in the midst of their battel by the fifth legion : but against the left flank and wing, where they saw the soldiers of their own nation ranged (who came to aid the Romans) they made head, and advanced their ensignes with more boldnesse and confidence. And seeing that left wing of the Romans was at the point to have retreated, but that the seventh legion se-counded and succoured them : and withall they that were left within Ebura in garrison, came from the town in the very midst and hottest of the conflict ; and Acilius from another part played on their backs. Down went the Celtiberians along time, and were cut in peeces betwix. As many as remained, made shift to flee and escape on all hands into every quarter. The Cavalry was sent out after them two waies in severall bands : who also committed a great slaughter and execution. That day were slain of the enemies about 23000 4800 taken prisoners, with five hundred horse and above ; besides 88 military ensignes gotten from them and carried away. A great victory this was, but not without bloodshed of the Romans part : for of two legions there died somewhat more then two hundred, but of Latine allies 830, of forreign aids, much about 2400 lost their lives in the field. The Pretor then retired with his victorious army into his own camp. Acilius was commanded to abide still in that of their enemies, which he had forced and won. The next morrow they fell to gather up the spoils of their enemies : and those who had born themselves valiantly in that service among the rest, were rewarded with gifts in a full and frequent assembly of the whole army. After this, when the hurt and maimed were brought back into the town Ebura, the legions were led through the countrey Carpentania, towards Contrebia. This City when it was once besieged sent to the Celtiberians for succour : but they came not in time : not for any slacknesses of their part, but because after they were departed from home, & had entred on their journey, the foul waies hindred and staid them, which they were not able to pass for the continuall rain that fell : over and besides, the waters were out and the rivers swelled so high, that possibly they could not come forward : whereupon the besieged inhabitants being in despair of help, from their friends, rendred the town. Flaccus likewise was forced by the storm and tempestuous weather to put his army into the same City. Now the Celtiberians, who were on foot in their journey, and not aware that their friends had surrendered, at length having passed over the rivers (when the rain gave over and the weather took up) came to Contrebia ; but seeing no camp without the walls, and supposing that it was either removed to the other side, or the enemies dislodged and gone, they approached the town, and marched loosely and carelessly forward in disarray. The Romans sallied out upon them at two gates, fell upon them (disbanded as they were) and put them to the rout. But see what hapned : that thing which hindred them that they could not make head, resist, and settle themselves to begin fight (namely, because they came not together in one entire band, nor yet by great companies about their colours) the same stood them in good stead to save many of their lives that fled. For they ran so scattering, and were so spread all over the plaines, that in no place could the enemy meet with them in any number thick together, to compass them about on every side. Howbeit 12000 of them were killed, & above 3000 taken prisoners, besides 400 horse, 62 ensignes of war won from them. Those who after their struggling fight retired homeward, met with another troop of Celtiberians coming forward, unto whom they recounted the yeelding up of Contrebia and their own misfortune : by which means they caused them to turn and goe back againe, who immediately slipped away in their villages and forts.

 Then Flaccus departed from Contrebia, and conducted his legions through Celtiberia wasting and spoiling as he went : where he forced many castles until the greater part of that countrey was reduced under his obedience. These affairs passed in high Spain that year. As for the lower province, Manlius the Pretor fought fortunately in certain battells against the Portu-gals.

The same year a Colony of Latins was planted in Aquileia, within the territory of the Gauls, and thither were conducted three thousand footmen, and every one of them were endowed N with fifty acres of land. The Centurions besides had a hundred, and the horsemen a hundred and forty acres speece given unto them. And the Commissioners for this conduct and distribution were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. In which year also two Temples were dedicated, the one to Venus Erycina near the gate Collina (which L. Porcius Licinius the son of Lucius dedicated, being a Duumvir deputed for that purpose, and had been vowed before by L. Porcius the Consul in the Liguian war) the other to the goddess Pur, in the herb market : and of this chappell M. Acilius Glabrio the other Duumvir, had the dedication ; where, he erected and set up in the honor of his father Glabrio, a gulf statue, which was the first gilded image that ever was made in Italy. This Glabrio the father was he, who had vowed to edifie the said Temple that very day on which he fought the battell against K. Antiochus at Ther-mopyla, and by warrant from the Senat, had bargained for the building thereof at a price. And those dates wherein these holy houses were consecrated, L. Emilius Paulus the Proconsul, triumphed over the Liguian Ligurians. He had born before him in shew five and twenty golden Coronets, and besides them there was no gold or silver else carried in that triumph. But many principal Ligurians, men of mark, whom he took captive, were led before his chair. He death among his soldiers, 300 Asles speece. The name of this triumph of his, was such were received by

At this occasion, that the Ligurian Embassadors craved to have a perpetual peace with the Romans, saying, That their whole nation were resolved, never to take arms again, but by commandment and licence of the people of Rome. Q. Fabius the Pretor, returned this answer unto them by the advice of the Senat. That it was no newes to hear this language from the Ligurians; but it stood them upon and was becoming rather, to carry a new mind, and the mind agreeable to their speech: and therefore they should go to the Consuls, and to by them which they were enjoined; forasmuch as the Senat would believe none but the word only of the Consuls in the behalf of the Ligurians, as touching their true and sincere meaning to oblique peace. Thus was peace concluded with the Ligurians; but there was a battle fought in Corfica with the Islanders there, in which M. Finarius the Pretor slew 2000 of them in the field: which defeat compelled them to give hostages, and besides 100000 pound weight of wax. From thence the army was conducted into Sardinia, where passed some fortunate battles against the Nians, a nation at this day not fully quiered & appeased. In this very year also were the hundred hostages rendered back again to the Carthaginians; with whom the people of Rome made and maintained peace, as well for their own part, as in the behalf of K. Masinissa, who at that time with an armed garison, held the possession of that territory which had been in question. The Consuls in their province sat still and had nothing to do. M. Balbus was sent for to Rome, against the general assembly for the election of magistrates: who created Consuls, A. Posthumius Albinus Lucius and C. Calpurnius Piso. After this, were elected Pretors Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, A. Posthumius Albinus, P. Cornelius Mancinus, T. Minucius Mollitibus, A. Hostilius Mancinus, and C. Manius; and they all entered into their magistracy upon the 15 day of March.

In the beginning of that year wherein A. Posthumius Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso were Consuls: A. Posthumius the Consul brought into the Senat those persons who were come from Q. Fulvius Flaccus out of the hisher province of Spain: to wit, L. Minutius his Lieutenant general, and the two colonels, T. Manius and L. Massilius. These men after they had made report of two fields fortunately fought against the Celtiberians, of their countrey yielded and brought under their subjection; and that the term of government in that province was expired, and no more left to be done there: so as there was no need either of the ordinary mony which was wont to be sent for souldiers pay, or of corn to be caried unto the army for that year. requested of the Senat first, to regard of their happy successe, to yeeld honor and praise to the immortal gods: and then, that Q. Fulvius might depart and come his waies out of the province, and bring with him that army of his from thence, whose vall in service, both himself and also many Pretors before him had used: which (say they) was not only meet and convenient, but also requisite and needfull in a manner to be done: forasmuch as the souldiers were so stiffnecked and obstinate, that it seemed unpensible to hold them any longer in that province, but that they would be gone and depart without licence, if they were not dismissed: or else break out into some dangerous fire of a mutiny, if a man should go about to keep and hold them back by strong hands. The Senat gave order that Liguria should be the province for both Consuls: which done, the Pretors also cast lots for theirs. To A. Hostilius fell the civill jurisdiction over the citizens: and to Minutius over the forrainers. P. Cornelius had the government of Sicily: C. Manius of Sardinia. Unto A. Posthumius was allotted the farther part of Spain, and to Tib. Sempronius the nether. This Sempronius (because he was to succeed Q. Fulvius) fearing his province should be left naked and disurnished of the old souldiers, I demand (qd. he) of you, O L. Minutius, since you bring word that there is no more trouble behind of that province, whether you think that the Celtiberians will continue fast in their allegiance for ever, so as, that province may be protected and held in obedience without any army at all? And if you cannot undertake to assure us of the faith and loyalty of these Barbarians & do advise us in any hand to maintain an army in those parts, whether you will give counsell to the Senat, for to send a supply into Spain, that they only should be called and discharged, who have served out their full years required by law, and so that new and raw souldiers be mingled with the rest of the old? or that the old legions should full and whole be removed out of the province, and new legions enrolled, and sent thither in their stead? considering that the small account that usually is made of such fresh and untrained souldiers, were enough to induce and move even the more quiet and peaceable sort of Barbarians to rebel and make war again? Soon said it is, but not so easily done, to have made an end of all troubles in such a province, especially where the people are naturally inclined to war, and prone ever and anon to make insurrections. Some few Cities, as far as I can hear, and namely, those which being near unto the souldiers lying in winter garison, were by them held in awe and kept down, have yeilded and are become subject: but they that were farther off, be in arms still and have weapon in hand. Which being so, I tell you (my LL) even now before hand, that I will perform my service to the Commonwealth, with the help of that army which is there already at this present: but in case Flaccus bring away those legions with him, I will chuse those quarters which are in peace, to winter in, and not hazard my yong and new souldiers among them, to be presented to the devotion and mercy of most fierce and warlike enemies. The Lieutenant answered to these demands in this manner, That neither himself nor any man else was able for his life, to divine and foredeem what was in the heart of the Celtiberians now, and what they would mind and intend to do hereafter: and therefore he could not deny, but the better policy it was to send an army among those Barbarians, peaceable though they seemed to be at this present) because as yet they are inured to government, and cannot well skill of being subjects. But whether H it be more expedient to employ new forces, as the one, it is for him to speak and set down, who A upon his knowledge can say, how loyally the Celtiberians will carry themselves in time of peace, and is withall assured, that the souldiers will hold them content and quiet, if they be detained any longer in the province. But if a man may conjecture, and give a guess what they think in their heart, either by their grumbling words secretly one to another; or their speeches uttered in the presence and hearing of their General, when he maketh orations to them in publick audience; I tell you truly they have cryed out with open mouth, that either they will keep their Generrall with them in the province, or home they will with him into Italy. This debate between the Pretor and the Lieutenant, was interrupted and broken off, by a new matter propounded before the Senat by the Consuls, who thought it meet and reasonable, that order should be taken for I their own fortitude and setting forth with men, money, and munition to their provinces, before any thing were spoken or treat of, as touching the Pretor his army. So, ordained it was, that the Cons. should have their entire army of new souldiers, to wit, each of them two legions of Rom.

 citizens with their cavalry, together with the usual and accustomed number at all other times of Latine allies, namely, 15000 foot and 800 horse. And with this power they had in charge to make war against the Ligurian Apuans. As for P. Cornelius and M. Baebius, they continued still in place of command: and were willed to hold their provinces, untill the Consuls were thither come. Then they were commanded to discharge the army which they had, and so to return to Rome. After this, speech there was concerning the army of Tib. Sempronius; and the Consuls had warrant to enroll one new legion, consisting of five thousand and two hundred foot and 400 K horse: over and besides, 1000 footmen, and 50 horse of Roman citizens. Likewise the Latine nation was charged with a levy of 7000 foot and 300 horse. With which army it was thought good, that Tib. Sempronius should go into the higher province of Spain. As for Q. Fulvius, he was permitted to bring back with him (if he thought well thereof) all those souldiers, as well Romans as allies, which had been transported over into Spain, before the Consulship of Sp. Posthumus and Q. Marcius: and more then that (after a new supply was come) the surpluse in two legions above 1400 foot, and 600 horse, and the over-plus of 12000 footmen of Latins, and six hundred horsemen: and namely, those whose valourous service C. Fulvius had tried and found in two battles against the Celtiberians. Moreover, solemn processions and thanksgiving were by authority ordained for his happy managing of the affairs of the Common-weal; & then the rest of the Pre- L tors were sent into their provinces, Q. Fabius Buteo had his commission renewed to govern Gallia still. Thus it was agreed in the Senat-house, that there should be eight legions maintained and kept in pay that year, over and above the old army in Liguria, which was in good hope shortly to be dismissed. Howbeit even these forces (being no greater then they were) hardly could be made full and complete by reason of the pestilence which now three years had rained, and dispeopled the City of Rome, and all Italy. During which plague the Pretor T. Minutius, and not long after him, the Consul C. Calpurnius died: with many other brave and famous persons of each degree and quality. So, as at length these men began to hold this depopulation and calamity for a prodigious token and strange wonder. Whereupon C. Servilius the Arch-bishop was charged, to search out means for to appeale the wrath and anger of the gods; and the Decemvirs likewise to peruse M the books of Sibylla: the Cos. to vow certain presents and oblations, to Dan Apollo, Esculapius and Lady Salus, and to set up their images garnished with gold: which he vowed and erected accordingly. The Decemvirs proclaimed supplications & prayers two daies together for the health of the people, throughout the City, and in all market towns and places of frequent resort and assembly. Above twelve years of age, wore chaplets & garlands of flours upon their heads, & bare branches of lawre in their hands, whiles they were at their prayers & devotion. Moreover, there was crept into mens heads a suspicion that some devilish and wicked hand might be the cause of all this. Whereupon by an act of the Senat, a commission was granted out unto C. Claudius the Pre-tor (who was substituted and chosen in the room of T. Minutius) to make search and diligent inquiry after all confections of poison, & the practisers thereof, within the City, & for the compass N of ten miles about it every way: In like maner, to C. Manius, for to sit in the enquiry thereof (before he crossed over-sea into his province of Sardinia) in all the mart-towns and places of assembly which were more then ten miles off, from Rome. Of all others, the Consul his death was most suspected. For given out it was, that Quarta Hostilia his wife, had murdered him: but when he was seen once, that her own son Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was declared Consul in place of his father in law and mothers husband, the death of Piso the Consul began to be more infamous and suspicious a great deal then before. And witneses there came forth ready to depose, that after Albinus and Piso were pronounced Consuls (in which election the said Flaccus was rejected and suffered a repulle) his mother reproached him therewith, and laid it in his dish, that this was the third time that he sued for the Consulship and gone without: adding moreover, and willing him to be redy to stand for it again, for that she would work and bring it about, that within two months he should be Consul. Among other testimonies and depositions making for the cause and tending to the same, that speech of hers also, taking effect too truly and so just within the time, was thought sufficient to condemn Hostilia.

In the beginning of this spring, whiles the levy of souldiers staid the new Consul at Rome, whiles the death of the one and the choosing of the other into their place, caused all thing there

A to go more slowly forward, in the mean time Cornelius and Babinus who had done nothing worthy of the remembrance during the Consulship, led their armies against the Ligurian Apuani. These Ligurians, who before the coming of the Consul into the province looked for no way were surprized at unawares, and to the number of 15000 obstinately yielded: whom Cornelius and Babinus resolved (upon advice had first with the Senat by letters) to transport from the mountains into plains and champion country from their own home; to the end they should have no more hope to return; for otherwise they supposed the Ligurian war would never have an end. Now there was in the Samnitis country a certain territory belonging in common to the people of Rome, which sometimes had been in the tenure and possession of the Taurisines. In which place they being desirous to plant the Ligurian Apuani, published an edict, That they should descend down the mountains Apidi, together with their wives and children, and bring away with them all that ever they had. But the Ligurians sent their Ambassadors oftentimes to intreat that they might not be forced to abandon their domestical goods, the place of their nativity, and the sepulchres of their ancestors; and therewith promised to deliver up their armor, and to put in hostages. However, seeing they could not prevail, and having not strength and power enough to wage war again, they obeyed the edict and proclamation. So there was translated from thence to the publick charges of the City, to the number of four thousand persons free-born, together with their women and children: and unto them was allowance made of 30000 Sesterces, toward the building of new houses. And for to distribute and divide land among them, the same men (to wit, Cornelius and Babinus) had commission; who also removed them into those parts. However at the request of these twain, there were Quinquaginta or five commissioners assigned granted unto them by the Senat, by whose advice they might manage all. These affairs being finished, after they had brought with them to Rome their old army, they obtained of the Senat a grant to triumph. And these were the first that ever triumphed & made no war before. Only the enemies were led in show before their chariot; for nothing had they gained and won for to be carried or led in pomp, neither was there ought to be seen in their triumphs, which might be dealt and given among the soldiers.

The same year Fulvius Flaccus the Pretor in Spain, by occasion that his successor stayed long ere he came into the province, brought forth his army into the field out of his wintering camp, and began to waite and spoil the farther parts and territories of Celtiberia: from whence the inhabitants came not in to submit and do their homage and fealty. By which deed of his, he rather provoked and angered the barbarous people, then terrified them: for when they had secretly gathered together certain forces and companies, they beset and barred the passage Maunianum, by which they were assured that the Roman army would pass. As L. Posthumius Albinus was upon his journey into the nether province of Spain, Gracchus his colleague charged him to advertise Quintus Fabius for to bring his army to Tarracoe, for that he proposed there to discharge his old soldiers, to distribute the supply which he brought, & to range in order all his army by companies. Notice also was given to Flaccus of the very day (which was near at hand) upon which his successor would come. This new occurrent caused Flaccus to lay aside those enterprizes which he intended, and in all hast to withdraw his forces out of Celtiberia. The barbarous people knowing not the cause hereof, but supposing that he had some inkling of their revolt, and how they had in secret taken arms, and that thereupon he was sore afraid, guarded and stopped the passage so much more streightly. Now so soon as the Roman army was entered into the passe one morning betimes at the break of day, the enemies arose suddenly: & once out of two parts, and charged the Romans: which when Flaccus perceived, he gave commandment by the ministry of the Cetrurions, that every man should keep his place and stand his ground, to have his arms and weapons in readiness; by which means he appeased the tumult and affright in his host. Then after he had brought all his labouring beasts with the baggage, unto one place, he embattelled and put in array all his bands and companies, partly by himself in person, and partly by his Lieutenants and colonels, according as the ground and the time required, shewing no sign at all of fear, but putting his men in mind of the enemies, in these terms: "Ye have (quoth he) to do with those that twice already yielded have yielded unto us, who are inured and practised still in wickedness & perjury, not deterred in vertue and courage: those (I say) who are like to make our return home honorable and glorious, which otherwise would have been obscure and nothing memorable: so as we shall carry to Rome for a triumph, our swords all bloody and newly bathed in the green wounds and fresh massacre of our enemies; and beare away the spoils of their bodies, all embued and still dropping with their blood. Time would not permit him to say any more, for now the enemies advanced forward, and the charge was already given in the utmost skirts of the army, and anon the main battels encountered and joyned conflict. The fight was bet and cruell alike in all parts, but the fortune divers: for the Roman legions in the main battell fought valiantly, and the two wings of either hand did their devoir bravely. The auxiliary strangers had to deal with enemies armed in deed at all points like to themselves, but better soldiers by odds then they were, in such sort, as they were over-charged by them, and could not make good their ground. The Celtiberians perceiving they were not able to match the legions in ranged battell and close hand-fight, cast their companies into a pointed and coin-formed battailon, for to pierce perforce and enter upon their enemies in which manner of fight they are so strong, that it is not possible to withstand them, wherefore they gave their violent charge. And then the legions also were put in disarray,

and the whole main battell after a lost, was disbanded and broken. Which disorder and fear-H full trouble when Florentius perceived, he rode a gallop to the legionary men of arms: What? (quod) hegan to them) Is there no help at all in you? and shall this army here be thus defeated quietly and come to nought? Wherein they stood on all hands to him to give direction and speak only the word what he would have done, as he should see how they would belie themselves in the execution of his command. Many (quoth he) double your spurs, you that are the horsemen of two legions, and run your horses with full carrier against that wedge-formed battailon of the enemies, wherewith they presse upon our men; and this shall you perform with the more violence of your horses, if you disbridle them and let them have full head, and so let spurs and rush in among them: which we have read in stories that the Romans many a time have practised to their great praise and honour. No sooner said, but done it was, pluckt were the bridles over their horse heads: twice they ran through the mids of them to and fro from one side to another, brake all their lances upon the enemies, overthrew them, and made foul work and slaughter among them. When this pointed battailon of the Celtiberians was once broken, (even the whole and only hope they had,) then they began to fear and tremble, then were they at the point to quit the fight, and to look about them which way to take their flight. The extraordinary Cavalry in the out wings (seeing so brave a service performed by the Roman horsemen) were enkindled and incensed by their valorous example, and of their own accord without attendance of any mans commandments, charged upon their enemies, thus disordered and in disarray already. Then the Celtiberians ran away and fled on all hands. The Roman General seeing them once turn back and shew their hin-parts, vowed to build a chappell to Fortuna equitum, and to exhibit games in the honor of Imp. Opt. Max. The Celtiberians, thus disbanded and scattered in the rout all over the length of the streight passage, were killed and cut in peeces. It is recorded that there died that day seventeen thousand enemies, and were taken prisoners alive more then three thousand, together with 27 field ensigns, and well neer eleven hundred horses. For that day, the victorious army lodged within no camp stall: yet was not this victory so cleer, but it cost them the losse of some souldiers: for of the Romans were slain four hundred seventy and two; of allies (and namely of Latins) 1019; and together with them, aid souldiers three thousand. Thus the army having by this good hand recovered their ancient honor and glory, was conducted to Tarraco- ne, Sempronius the Pretor, (who was arrived two daies before) went out to meet Fulvius in the way as he came, and shewed how he rejoiced on his behalf, for this good managing and happy achieving the affairs of the commonwealth, which done, they agreed together with great accord as touching the souldiers, namely, whom to cull and send away, and whom to retain still in service. Then Fulvius having shipped the souldiers that were discharged, took his journey to Rome; and Sempronius conducted the legions into Celtiberia.

Both the Consuls led their forces into Liguria, and entred the countrey in two divers quarters.
Posthumius with the first legion and the third, beset and invested the two mountains Salis and Sufiventium, and so streightly he kept the narrow passes of those parts with his garrisons, that he cut them off from all victuals, and tamed them with extreme scarcity and want of all things.
Fulvius with the second legion and the fourth, after he had assailed the Apuan Ligurians from the coast of Pisa, received submission and homage of as many of them as inhabited about the river Adura, and when he had embarked upon seven thousand of them, besent them over to Naples, coasting along the Tuscan sea. From whence they were brought into the Samnits countrey, and a certain territory assigned them to inhabit amongst the rest of thir countrymen. As for A. Posthu- nius, he cut down the vineyards, and burnt the corn of the Ligurian mountainers, so long untill they were driven by all manner of calamities following war, to come in and submit, yea, and to deliver up their armor and weapons. From thence Posthumius departed and took the sea, because he would visit the coasts of the Ligurian Ingaunes and Intemelians. Now, before that these Consuls came to the army which was appointed to meet at Pisa, it chanced A. Posthumius & M.
Fulvius Nobilior, the brother of Q. Fulvius, were the commanders, and had the conduct thereof.
 This Fulvius was a Colonell of the second legion, who during the time of those months, wherein by turn he had the command and charge thereof, dismissed that legion, having bound the Centurions by an oath, that they should make payment back of their wage-mony well and truly to the Questors in the chamber and treasury of Rome. Notice hereof being given to A. Posthumius at Placentia, (for thither it hapned that he was gone) he rode after those called souldiers, and pursued them with a company of light horsemen. As many of them as he could overtake, after he had checked and rebuked them for their fault, he brought to Pisa; of the rest he gave information to the Consul. Who put the matter to question, and after it had been debated in council, an act of the Senat passed against the said M. Fulvius, that he should be confined and sent into Spain beyond new Carthage. And letters he had given him to carry from the Consul to P. Manlius into the farther province of Spain. As for the souldiers, they were commanded to return again to their colours, and for an ignominious disgrace of this legion, ordained it was, that for a full years pay they should be content and take up with six months wages. And loek what souldiers repaired not to the army accordingly, the Consul had warrant and commission to make sale of him and all that he had.

The same year L. Durenius, who was returned with ten ships to Brundisium from out of Illy- ria (where he sat as Pretor the former year) leaving his ships there in the rode, came to Rome where

A where, in discoursing of the acts by him done, he laid the whole fault of all the recovery and piracy at sea upon Gentius the King of the Illyrians, saying, that all the ships which had lien upon the coast of the Adriatick sea, came out of his realm. For which he had sent Embassadors to complain, but they could never find means to speak with the King about it. Now they were Embassadors arrived at Rome from Gentius, who avouched, that when the Romans came for to parle with the King, he hapned to be sick in the most remote parts of his kingdom: and therefore Gentius their King and master requested the Senat, not to give credit to those false accusations and forged slanders which his enemies had raised and informed against him. But Duros alleged moreover, that divers and sundry persons, as well citizens of Rome as Latine allies within his dominion, had received many wrongs: yea, and by report certain Roman citizens were staid and detained at Corcyra. Whereupon it was in counsell thought good that they should be brought to Rome, and that C. Claudius the Pretor should have the hearing of the matter, before such time no answer would be given unto King Gentius or his Embassadors.

B Among many others that the plague this year consumed, certain priests and prelates also died, and namely, L. Valerius Flaccus, a bishop, in whose room was chosen Q. Fabius Labeo. Also P. Manlius one of three Triumvirs for the celebration of the holy feasts. In whose stead Q. Fulvius the son of Marcus was elected Triumvir. He was at that time very young, and not out of his em- Prætextatus, brodered Prætexta. But as touching the King of sacrificers, who was to be chosen in place of Cornelius Dolabella, there was debate between C. Servilius the Archbishop, and Cornelius Dolabella one of the Duumvirs for the navy. For when the bishop would have had him to resign that office, that he might consecrate and inaugurate him the King sacrificer, he refused so to do. For which cause the bishop set a round fine on the Duumvir his head. Then Dolabella appealed to the people; and before them it was to be tried, whether the said fine should be taken off or paid? Now when most of the tribes called into the rails for to give their voices, advised the Duumvir to obey the bishop, and awarded the fine to be pardoned and remitted, in case he would give over that office which he had, behold it lightened at the very instant from heaven, which is the only ominous sign that interrupteth the assemblies of the people. Whereupon the Colledge of the bishops made temple of conscience to inaugurate Dolabella, but they consecrated P. Clodius Siculus, who had been sacred in the second place. In the end of the year C. Servilius Geminus likewise the Archbishop himself departed this world, who also was one of the ten Decemvirs deputed for the holy ceremonies. And Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was by the colledge of the bishops, elected bishop in his room. But M. Aemilius Lepidus was created the sovereign Pontifee, notwithstanding many notable persons made suit therefore. Likewise Q. Marcius Philippus a Decemvir for the holy mysteries, who chosen in his place. Moreover, there deceased Sp. Posthumus an Augur, in whose stead P. Scipio the son of Africanns was elected by the Augurs. The same year granted it was to the inhabitants of Cumes, at their own request and petition, that they might commonly speak Latine: as also to the publick criers, to make portsale of goods in the Latine tongue. The Senat gave thanks to the Pisans for the offer they made of lands, wherein to plant a Colony of Latins. And three Triumvirs or Commissioners for that business were created, namely, Q. Fabius Buteo, Marcus and Publius, both named Popilius, and both surnamed Lanus. Letters were brought from M. Manlius the Pretor (who having the government allotted unto him of Sardinia, had commission also to enquire after the practise of poisoning in all places, not within ten miles of the City of Rome) importing thus much, that he had condemned already 3000 persons, and that the informations and presentments multiplied daily, by reason of new matters discovered still, and therefore either he was to give over that inquisition, or to resign up his province Sardinia.

C D Q. Fulvius Flaccus returned out of Spain to Rome with great honour for his acts there achieved. Who remaining yet without the City, because of his triumph, was created Consul with L. Manlius Acidinus, and within few daies after, rode triumphant into Rome, accompanied with his soldiers, whom he had brought home with him. He carried in triumph 120 golden coronets. Moreover in gold 32 pound weight, besides 173200 peeces of coin in Olean silver. He dealt to his soldiers fifty Denarii peeces out of the booty and pillage which he had gotten. To every Centurion he gave it double, and to the gentlemen of Rome that served on horseback, triple. The like he did by the Latine allies, and to all in general he paid double wages. This year was the law first proposed by L. Iulius a Trib. of the Com. as touching the year of the age requisite and meet for to sue for any publick office, or to exercise the same. And hereupon it came, that the whole race of that family was surnamed Annales. Many years after there were created four Pretors according to the law Babin, which provided that there should be each other year four chosen. And these were they who were first elected, namely, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, L. Valerius Lavinius, Q. Fabius and M. Manlius, both named Manlius, and both surnamed Sevola.

Q Unto the Consuls Q. Fulvius and L. Manlius the government of the same provinces was ordained, which to those of the former years, with like numbers of horse and foot, as well citizens as allies. In both provinces of Spain, Tib. Sempronius and L. Posthumus continued still to have the command and conduct of the same armies which they had. And for to furnish them out, the Consuls were enjoined to enroll three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen of Romans, likewise five thousand foot of Latine allies and four hundred horse. P. Manlius Sevola by law had the civil jurisdiction within the City of Rome, and commission, to enquire into the devilish art of self poisoning both within the City, and within the compass of ten miles. Cn. Cornelius Scipio was lord chief justice in forrain pleas and causes, Q. Manlius Sevola was lord deputy of Sicily and Prætextatus, that he was under 17 years of age, and so Livy useth this word in the end of the 22 book: for Prætextatus was Puerilis habitus Tacitus 12. lib. and upon this it should seem Lex Julia annalis, or annalis for the redresse of that disorder.

Which were sent unto him from princes and Cities, to set his triumph these were called corona triumphales, & hereof cometh the gold coronarium. The law is called Lex Julia annalis or Annalis.

and C. Fulvius in Sardinia. Q. Fulvius the Consul, before that he went in hand with any affairs of State, laid he would both discharge himself and also the City of the duty to Godward, in performing the vowes which he had made. He declared that on that very day wherein he fought his last battell with the Celtiberians, he had made a vow to exhibit games to the honour of that most mighty and gracious god Jupiter, and likewise to build a temple to Fortuna Augusta; and how thereto the Spaniards had contributed certain sums of money. So a decree passed, that those plaies should be set forth: and two Dumvirs chosen, to give order and bargain for the edification of the same temple. Likewise there was set down a certain sum of money to be disbursed for the defraying of the charges: to wit, not exceeding that sum in the solemnity of the plaies, which was allowed unto Fulvius Nobilior, when he exhibited the like sports after the end of the Atolion war. Item, that for these games he should not seek or send for, gather and raise, receive or do any thing, contrary to the Act of the Senat, which in the time of L. Emilius and Cn. Babius Consuls was made as touching such pastimes. This decree the Senat ordered, by occasion of the superfluous and excessive expenses employed about the plaies of T. Sempronius the Aedile; which were very chargeable not only to Italy and the Latine allies, but also to foreign provinces. The winter this year was very sharp, by reason of snow, and all manner of tempestuous weather. The trees that were tender and subject to frost and cold, were all blasted and killed: besides the winter season continued much longer then ordinary in other years. And thereupon the festivall solemnity of the Latine holidays were to troubled and disordered by a suddain and insupportable storm and tempest upon the hill [Alba] that by an ordinance of the Bishops, it was celebrated again the second time. The same tempest cast down certain images in the Capitol, and disfigured very many places with thunderbolts and flashes of lightning. It overthrew the temple of Jupiter in Tarracina, the white temple at Capua: Item, the gate there called Romanus and the battlements of the wals in divers places. Among these wondrous prodigies it was reported also from Reate, that a mule was foaled with three feet. For this cause the Decemvirs were commanded to go to the books of Sibylla: and out of that learning, they shewed to what gods sacrifices should be made, & what number of beasts was to be killed. And because many places were with lightning defaced, they ordained that a solemn supplication should be holden one whole day in the temple of Jupiter. This done, the foresaid games and plaies which Q. Fulvius the Consul had vowed, were with great magnificence exhibited for ten daies together. After this followed the election of the Censors, wherein M. Emilius Lepidus the Arch-bishop, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, who had triumphed over the Atolians, were created. Now between these two men, there had been notorious enmity, oftentimes testified and shewed in many sharp and bitter debates, both the Senat, and also before the people. When this election was ended, the two Censors according to the ancient use and custome, sat upon their ivory chairs of estate in Mars field, near the altar of Mars. To whom there soon repaired thither, the principal Senators, accompanied with a troop besides of citizens: and among the rest, Q. Cassius Metellus made a speech to this effect.

"My masters, you that are Censors, we have not forgotten that you are while we are chosen by the universal body of the people of Rome, to be superintendents and wardens over us for our manners and behavior: and that it becometh us to be taught, admonished, & directed by you, and not you by us. Howbeit we ought to tell and declare what there is in you, that either is offensive to all good men, or at leastwise which they wish were amended. When we behold and consider you severally part, either you, O M. Emilius, or you M. Fulvius, we have not this day in the City of Rome any men, whom if we were called to a new scrutiny for to passe our voices again, we would prefer before you to this office and place of dignity. But when we reason both together, we cannot chuse but much doubt and fear that ye are very badly matched and coupled as companions in government: & that the common-weal shall not receive so much good by this. That ye please and like us all so well, as sustain harm in this, That you dislike and dislike one another. These many years together, there hath been great heart-burning and much malice between you and the same must needs be grievous and hurtfull unto your selves: but now it is to be feared that from this day forward, that rancor will be more prejudicial to us & the common-weal, then unto you. Upon what motives and cause we are thus fearful, much we could say, but that peradventure your irreconcilable anger is such, as hath snared and possessed wholly your spirits and minds already. Their quarrels, jars, and grudges of yours, we all in general would request you heartily to end this day, and in this very temple wherein we are assembled: and since the people of Rome by their voices have conjoynd you in one office, suffer your selves by us to be linked & reconciled in perfect atonement. With one mind and accord, with one heart, so counsel chuse the Senat; review the Cavalry and Knight-hood of Rome; number the citizens; assesse their goods; purge and cleanse the City: & finally consummate the solemnity of the census with a sacrifice. And whereas in all your prayers well meet, ye shall make this ordinary form of words, That this thing, or that, may fall out in the end well and happily, to my self and to my people. See that you wish the same truly, sincerely and from the very heart, that whatsoever ye shall pray unto the gods for, we men may beleieve and all the world see, that you desire the same to be effected indeed. T. Tullius & Romulus in this very City reigned together with great unity & concord, in the midst whereof even in the very market place, they had encountered and joind battell together as mortal enemies with their cruell armies. What? now enemies only have an end, but wars also. And many a time most venomous and spitefull foes become faithful allies;

The Oration
of Metellus, to the Censors.

- A yes, and other wiles over neighbours and fellow citizens. The Albans after their subversion and utter ruin of their City, were brought over to inhabit Rome. The Latins & Sabines both, were endenizen'd Romans. An old saying it is, and not so old as true, and for the truth, become a common proverb, that enemies ought to be transitory and soon die, whereas friendship should continue & live for ever. At these words, there arose a confused bruit, among them there assembled, in token of their consent and approbation: and anon were heard the distinct voices of them all in general, crying and requesting of the Censors the same; which making one entire sound, brake off the speech of Mucius. Then Emilius among other matters complained that M. Falerius had twice put him, besides the Consulship, which other wise he was sure of. And Falerius on the other side found himself grieved, that he evermore by Emilius had been provoked, and that he
- B had waged law by stipulation against him to his dishonor and disgrace. Yet both of them made fair and shewed, that if the one were as willing as the other, they would relent and be over-ruled by so many honorable personages of the City. So, at the instant request of all them that were present, they shook hands and thereby assured one another to forgive and forget all matters past, and truly to make an end of malice, and be perfect friends again: whereupon they were much commend-ed by the whole assembly, and conducted by them into the Capitol. Where the Senat approved and highly praised, as well the careful industry of the principal citizens, in effecting this so weighty a matter, as also the good nature and flexibility of the two Censors. Who afterwards when they required to have a certain sum of pecuniy assigned unto them for to employ in the publick edifices and other works of the City, were allowed by their decree, the full rent and revenues of one whole year.
- C The same year L. Posthumus and Tib. Sempronius the Pro-Pretors in Spain agreed together that Albinus should make an expedition against the Vaccii through Lusitania, and so return from thence into Celsiberia. But Gracchus went as far as the utmost quarter of Celsiberia, for that in those parts there was the greater war. And first he forced the City Munda, which he surprised suddenly in the night at unawares. Then, after he had received hostages, and put a garriſon there, he went forward assaulting forts and burning the villages, untill he came to another City of exceeding strength, which the Celsiberians call Corduba: where, as he was about to approach the walls with his engines of battery, there came unto him orators out of the City, who like good plain men of the old world, made a speech unto him, nothing dissembling but that they would war and be revenged, if their strength and forces were sufficient. For they requested leave to pass
- D to the Celsiberian camp, there to receive aid and succour; but if they could not speed, then they would consult apart by themselves what to do. Good leave they had of Gracchus; and some few daies after, they brought with them ten Orators more. About noone-tide it was of the day, and the first thing that they craved at the Pretor his hand was this, That he would make them to drink before they parted. When they had once quaffed and caroused round, they called again for more: whereat, all that were present and stood about them, laughed heartily, to see them so rude and uncivil, and altogether without good manners. But afterwards, the eldest man of the company began in this wise: We are sent (quoth he) unto you from our nation, to know what added means hath need you to levy war against us? To this demand Gracchus answered, That he came with the confidence that he had in a brave and valiant army; which (if they were so delirious) he would do them the favour to see, that they might be able to make more certain report to their countrymen upon their own knowledge. And with that, he commanded the colonels and knight marshals, to put in arms and embattell all the bands and companies, as well foot as horse; and then armed as they were to charge one upon another in manner of a battel. These Embassadors after they had overseen this sight, were sent away: who went directly to the Celsiberians their neighbors, and frighted them for sending any succour to the City besieged. The rowmen witho having in vain let fire-lights in the night time aloft upon their towers, which was the signal agreed upon between them) and seeing themselves destitute of the only hope they had of aid, yielded by composition. So they were enjoined to make payment of four and twenty hundred thousand Sesterces; and to deliver forty of their noblest gentlemen and best men of arms; not by way
- F of hostages (for commanded they were to serve in the wars); and yet in truth, they stood for a pawn of assurance for their safety. From thence anon he marched to the City Alba, where the Celsiberians lay encamped, and from whom of late the Embassadors afore said came: whom, for certain daies he provoked to fight, making small skirmishes, by sending out against their camp a guard of light-armed vanquiers, to the end that scuffling together every day more then other he might train them all forth of their camp at length. And when he perceived once that his design had taken effect, he commanded the captains of the auxiliary souldiers, that after some short skirmish, they should make semblant as if they were overcharged with numbers, and so at once turn their backs, and flie as fast as they could to their own camp: himself in the mean while put his men in battell array within the rampier at every gate. Long it was not, but he might see his own bands and companies retiring back on set purpose, and running away, and after them the barbarous enemies following as hard as they could in chase. Now had he his army embattel- led for the purpose, and ready to receive them: and therefore he made no longer stay then only to suffer his friends and allies to enter at liberty into the camp, but he let up a loud cry, and at one instant issued forth at all the gates. The enemies were not able to endure this unexpected violent charges: and so they that were come to assail the camp of others, could not so much as de- fend

send their own: for presently they were discomfited and put to flight; and within a while driven for very fear into their hold, and in the end turned out of it also. That day good number of men left their carriages in the field, 320 were taken prisoners, together with 125 horse: & 4000 Romans. Of the Roman army, there died not above 100. Presently after this battel, Gracchus marched with his legions to wait and spoil the country of Celtiberia: and as he made his march all places as he went, with driving booties, & with harrying & carrying all that ever he could come by, the Cities and States of the country, some submitted willingly of their own accord: others for constraint & fear received the yoke of subjection: so as in few daies space he became master of an 103 towns that yielded unto him. A mighty rich pillage he gat in this expedition. After this he marched back again towards the City Aler from whence he came, and began to besiege and assail the town. The inhabitants endured the first assault of the enemies, but afterwards seeing their town not only assailed by force of arms, but also shaken with engines and instruments of battery, distrusting the strength of the City, they retired all within their fortresse: from whence to the end, (having sent their Orators before-hand) they & all that ever they had, were at the devotion of the Romans. A great booty there was gotten, and many noble gentlemen taken prisoners amongst whom were two sons and one daughter of Thurris. This Thurris was a prince and great lord of those parts, and simply the mightiest potentat of all the Spaniards by many degrees, who being advertised of the hard hap and calamity fallen upon his children, sent unto Gracchus into the camp for a safe-conduct, and thither he came himself in person. And first he demanded, Whether he could grant unto him and his their lives? The Pretor answered, That they should live. Then he demanded again, If he might bear arms and serve under the Romans? and when Gracchus permitted that also; Then will I follow you (quoth he) against mine old friends and allies, since they disdain to respect and regard me. From this time forward he took part with the Romans: and in many journeyes he bare himself loyally and valiantly in their wars, and much advanced the Roman State. After this, Ergavica (a noble, rich and mighty City) affrighted at the calamities of other neighbor towns and States about them, set the gates open for to receive the Romans. Some Authors have written, that these towns and Cities yielded not bona fide and in sincerity of heart: but that so soon as he had withdrawn the legions out of any quarter, suddenly from that part they revolted: also, that afterwards, he fought a cruell battel near the mountain Cantus with the Celtiberians, from the break of day until noon: in which conflict there were many slain both of the one side and the other: neither did the Romans any other great deed (as they make boast) at Ergavica that day to testifie their victory, but kept the field, and challenged them out of their camp to fight. Moreover, that the next morrow all the day long, they gathered up the spoils of the dead: & on the third day strook a second battel, which was greater than the other: & then at length, the Celtiberians without all doubt lost the field cleer, inasmuch as their camp was ravished. Furthermore, that there died of the enemies that day 2200, and not so few as 300 taken prisoners, and wel-near as many horse, besides the winning of 72 military ensignes: and so the war came to a finall end, the Celtiberians made peace indeed, continued fast and firm therein with all loyalty, and were got so sickle & unconstant as before. They write moreover, that the same summer L. Postumius fought a brave battell with the Paces in the latter province of Spain, where he put to the sword 35000 enemies, & forced their camp. But it soundeth more like a truth, that he came not timely enough into that province, for to perform any such exploits during that summer season.

The Censors made a review and new choice of Senators in good concord and faithful unity: for the president of the Senat was chosen, M. Aemilius Lepidus the Censor himself, who also was the high priest or Arch-bishop. Three Senators were called and deprived their places: one Lepidus held some in, whom the colleague over-passed and left out. Of that portion of money which out of the main allowance was divided between them, they caused their works following to be made. Lepidus for his part raised the great causey or wharf at Tarracina, which was a peece of work nothing acceptable to the people, for that he had himself lands and possessions there of his own, and seemed to sale his privat expenses, under colour of doing a publick work with the Citizens money. He built a Theatre, a fore-stage or a vane-scaffold near the temple of Apollon. He bargained with the Publicans or Undertakers for the polishing, blanching and whitening of the temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, and likewise of the pillars about it. From these pillars he removed the Images and Statues, which seemed to have been unhandsomely set one against another, and out of all order. Likewise he took from thence, the targets and field-ensignes of all sorts, that were there set up and fastned. But M. Fulvius put forth to making more works in number, and more of better and greater use. To wit, a peer, and certain main piles within the river Tyberis, upon which piles, certain years after P. Scipio Africanus and L. Mummius being Censors, took order for arches to be founded and erected. Item, a stately hall or palace behind the new shops of the bankers, Item A fish market, with others shops round about him, which he sold to particular persons. Item, a market place, and a porch or gallery without the gate Torgemina, and another behind the arsenal, and near the temple of Hercules. Item, near Tyber, and behind the church of the god Neptun, he caused to be built the chappell of Apollon the Physitian. Now they had besides another flock of money in common, which they employed in taking order for water to be conveyed into the City, and certain vaults to be made. But this work was impeached by M. Licinius Crassus, who would not suffer the water to passe through his ground. Over and besides these same Censors, instituted certain rents for portage, & pondage, & divers other imposts. Many chappells & publick in the tenure and occupation of private persons; they took order to be reduced to the use of the people in common, and to be common for all common. They changed the order of giving voices, and caused to enroll the tribes according to sundry quarters and divisions; having regard withall of the degrees of men, of their studies, mysteries and occupations. Also the one of the Censors M. Aemilius lived unto the Senate; this allowance should be made unto him of money for the games and plaies at the dedication of the Temple of Queen Juno and Diana, which in the Ligurian war he had rowed eight years before; and although there was unto him twenty thousand Aſes, so he dedicated both those Temples within the circuit of the place of Plaminius. Also he exhibited Stage plaies three daies together after the dedication of the Temple of Juno, and two daies after the other of Diana; and every of those daies within the circuit Plaminius.

The same Censor dedicated in Asia fields a Chappell to the sea gods; vowed by L. Aemilius Regillus eleven years before, in a navall battell at sea, against the Captains of K. Antiochus. Over the gates of which Chappell there was fixed a table with this title: For the appeasing and composing of a great war between two Kings, the head of the sea gods, as far to make peace. The consuls when L. Aemilius Regillus the Prator, the son of M. Under the charge, command, and government, happy fortune, and conduct of him between Ephesus, Sardos, and Chios, the fleet of King Antiochus the eleventh daies before the Kalends of February was vanquished, discomfited, taken, destroyed, and put to flight; and there upon the same day two and forty Gallies were taken, with all the mariners and prisoners within them. After which fight King Antiochus and his Realm, for consideration hereof, vowed a Temple to the Sea gods, assisting unto him in achieving the navall victory. Another table likewise with the very same inscription, was set up and fastned over the gates of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol. Within two daies after that the Censors had chosen a new Senat; Q. Fulvius the Consul made an expedition against the Ligurians; and after he had passed with his army over wilds and mountains, where no tracks led them, through straights and passes of so forest, he fought a pitched battell with the enemies, and not only won the field, but also in one and the self same day forced their camp. Whereupon three thousand and two hundred of the enemies, and all that quarter of Liguria yielded unto him. Then the Consul placed there that had surrendered, in the plains and champion country, and planted garisons upon the mountains. Letters hereof with great speed came to Rome: whereupon there were ordained processions for three daies. During which time of procession, the Prator celebrated sacrifices, and killed forty greater beasts. But the other Consul

A. Atilius did no exploit worth remembrance in Liguria. Three thousand Transalpine Frenchmen passed over the Alps into Italy, in peaceable manner marching without any hostility or harm doing, and requested of the Consul and the Senat a territory to inhabit, where they might remain quietly under the feignory of the Romans. But the Senat commanded them to avoid out of Italy, and gave the Consul Q. Fulvius in charge to make search and enquiry into this matter, yea, and to proceed against them who had been the captains and counsellors to perswade them to pass over the Alps.

This very year died Philip King of the Macedonians, worn away to nothing, partly for age, and partly with grief of heart after the death of his son Demetrius. It is reported that he kept his winter in Demetrius, tormented with anguish of mind for the loss and miss of his son, disquieted with remorse and repentance for his cruelty against him, which stung and pricked his guilty conscience. Besides, he saw his other son (who now was the undoubted heir apparent of the Crown, as well in his own opinion as in the conceit of others) how all men turned their eyes and courted to him. He considered withall how his old age was despised and forlorn; while some expected his death, others did not so much as look for it; which was the greatest grief and trouble of all other. And together with him, there was Antigonus the son of Echecrates, bearing the name of his uncle Antigonus by the fathers side, who had been guardian to Philip. This Antigonus the elder had been a man of princely port and regal majesty, renowned also for a brave conflict and noble battell against Seleucus the Lacedemonian. And him the Greeks for distinction sake from other KK, of that name, surnamed Tutor. His nephew or brothers son (I say) Antigonus, of all the honourable friends that Philip had, was the only man that continued fast and firm unto him without all corruption. But this his loyalty and fidelity, and truth caused Perseus to be no friend of his; but rather the most mortal enemy that he had in the world. This said Antigonus forecasting in his spirit, in what dangerous straits he should stand, when the inheritance of the kingdom were devolved upon Perseus, waiting his first time and opportunity; when he perceived that the Kings mind was troubled, and that now and then he looked deep sigh for sorrow that his son was dead; one while would give ear only to the Kings words, when he also would find some talk and minister occasion to speak of it he set forth his and unadvisedly committed. Oftentimes he followed and seconded him in his thoughts and complaints, and would be thought to lament with him for company. And (as Tutor much swifter to give many signs and tokens of her self coming to light) he would enforce and help forth and enlarge small things what he could, to the end that all might the sooner be discovered and break forth. The chief ministers and instruments of this villanous fact, were Appellus and Philinus, who were the Embassadors sent to Rome, and had brought those pernicious letters, under the name of Flaminius, which wrought the death of Demetrius. For commonly it was given out through the Kings Court, that those were falsified letters, forged by his Secretary and sealed with a counterfeit signet. But the thing being rather deeply suspected, than apparently detected, it advanced that Antigonus upon a time met with Xychar, and laying hold upon him, arrested his body, and brought him into the Kings house; and when he had lett him in the safe custody of certain persons, he went himself directly to Philip. "It should seem to me, & if it please your grace (quoth he) by many words which I have observed, that you would spend a great deal to know the whole truth as touching your two sons, and be resolved whether of them it was that laid wait to take away the life of the other. Now the only man of all other that can undo the knot and clear this doubt, is in your hands forth coming, and that is Xychar. Herewith he advised the King to call before him the said party, since that (as it fell out) he was already brought into the Court. Sent for he was and presented before the King; and being asked the question he denied every thing at the first, but with such inconstancy, as it appeared evidently, that upon some little fear of torture offered unto him, he would be ready to bewray all: for at the very sight of the tormentor and the scourges, he relented. Then he disclosed and shewed in order the whole proceeding and manner of this wicked practice and villany, how it was wrought as well as by the ambassadors as also by his own self their minister. Immediately there were some of purpose sent to apprehend the said ambassadors. And Philocles who was present in the way, they surprised and took of a sudden: as for Apelles (who had been sent to pursue one Chareas) being advertised how that Xychar had bewraied & told all, sailed over into Italy. As concerning Philocles, there is no certainty known. Some report, that at the beginning he denied the matter stoutly: but after that Xychar was brought to his face and confronted him, he stood no longer in it. Others say again that being put to torture he endured the pains, and continued still in the denial. Philip sorrow and grief was by this means renewed and redoubled, repuring himself more unhappy in his sons, and his misery the greater, in that one of them was now dead and gone. Perseus being certified that all was discovered, took himself for a greater and mightier person, than to fear and think it needfull for him to flie upon it. And therefore he thought only to keep far enough out of the way, purposing to stand upon his guard all the while that his father lived, and avoid the flaming fire (as it were) of his burning choler. Philip seeing that he could not possibly come by his person, nor to execute justice, thought upon that which only remained to be done, and studied how Perseus besides impunity, should not be recompensed and rewarded also for that his wickedness. He called therefore Antigonus before him, unto whom he was bounden and beholden already, for bringing to light the unnatural murder committed upon Demetrius his son; and of whom he conceived this opinion, in regard of the fresh and late glory of his uncle Antigonus, that the Macedonians should have no cause to be ashamed or repent, if they had had him for to be their King. And in this wise he brake with him: "Since my unhappy fortune is such (quoth he) O Antigonus, that I ought (contrary to all other fathers) to wish my self childless, I have a mind and purpose to make over unto you that kingdom, which I received at the hands of your uncle, which he preserved and kept yea, and augmented for my behoof during the time of my nonage; & wherein (whiles I was under his guardianship) he bare himself not only valiant, but also true and faithfull unto me. No man I have but you, whom I can esteem worthy to wear the Crown; and if I knew of none at all, yet had I rather that both he and the Realm perished and were extinct, for ever than Perseus should enjoy it as the guerdon of his ungracious & devilish fact. I shall imagine yet that Demetrius is risen from death to life, I shall think that I have the fruition of him again if I leave you in this place, you, I say, the only man of all others that wept for the death of the poor innocent young man, and lamented for my unhappy error and unfortunate trespass. After this speech with Antigonus, he never ceased to entertain and grace him in the face of the world with all kind of honour that he could devise. For seeing that Perseus was in Thrace, Philip went in progress to every City of Macedony, and recommended Antigonus to all the Princes and States thereof. And without all doubt, if God had given him longer life but a little, he would have enstalled him in full possession of the kingdom. Well, to return again unto Demetrius; where he wintered (as before is said) he departed from thence, and so journeyed a long time in Thessalonica. From thence after he was come to Amphipolis, he was surprised with a grievous malady. Howbeit, certain it was and very apparant, that he was more sick in mind than body; and that ever and anon the remembrance and object, the apparition and ghost of his son, whom he caused (innocent as he was) to be put to death, followed and haunted him so continually with care and grief, that he was out of all sleep, and could not lay his eyes together: yea, it drave him into raving, cursing, and execration of Perseus his other son; and so he ended his daies. But although Philip died somewhat with the soonest for Antigonus, yet he would have gone very near to have slept into his thron, if either the Kings death had immediately been divulged abroad, or that Antigonus had then been about the Court that he might have had intelligence thereof. For Calligenes the Kings Physician, who had the cure of him, staid not untill the breath was fully out of the Kings body; but so soon as he perceived that his state was desperat, upon the first deadly signs that he observed, sent messengers post to Perseus, who were set of purpose in places convenient, according as it was complotted between them twain: but he concealed the Kings death from all them that were not of the household untill he was come. By which means Perseus surprised them all before they looked for him, or knew abroad that the King was departed, and thus he took the Crown upon him by policy, which he had purchased with mischief.

The death of Philip fell out very well to give some delay and respite, and to gather more forces for the waging of war: for the nation of the Bactaria having been a long time solicited thereto, departed out of their own country, and with a great power as well of foot as horse, came on this the river. Now there were advised before to advise the King hereof, but they were and this was a nobleman among the Bastarnians. And having been full against his will bound in embassage & sent with Enus to raise the Bastarnians. Now first, for fear from Philip they met with news (but very uncertain) of the Kings death which occasioned troubled the whole count of their designs. For thus it was concluded that Philip should give the Bastarnians safe passage through Thrace and find them victuals: to the effecting and performing whereof, he had entertained the peers and principal States of those quarters with presents, and assured them upon his fidelity, that the Bastarnians should pass through their country peaceably without any harm doing. Now his intent and full purpose was, to extinguish utterly the nation of the Dardanians, and to plant the Bastarnians in their country. Hereby he aimed at a twofold commodity: the one was this; that the Dardanians (a people most malicious ever to the Macedonians, and who always in time of the troubles and adversities of the KK. took their vantage to annoy them) might be rooted out: the other, that the said Philip leaving their wives and children in Darda-nia, might be sent to waste and spoil Italy. Now were they to pass to the Adriatick sea and so to Rome by the way of the Scordiscians (for other way there was none to lead an army) and soon would they thought he grant passage unto the Bastarnians: for they differed not at all, either in language, or manners & fashions: and more than that, they were like enough to joyn with them in the expedition, seeing they went to the conquest and pillage of a most rich and wealthy nation.

 These designments were accommodated and fitted to what events soever should happen. For in case the Bastarnians should happen to be defeated by the Romans and put all to the sword: yet this would be a comfort again; that the Dardanians were consumed from the face of the earth, that he should meet with a booty of that which the Bastarnians left behind them: and finally, have the possession free and entire to himself of all Dardania. But in case their fortune were so have the upper hand, then whiles the Romans were averted from him, and amused upon the war with the Bastarnians, he should be able to recover whatsoever he had lost in Greece. This had been the design projected by K. Philip. So they entered peaceably, and marched without hostility, under the word and promise of Cotta & Antigonus. But shortly after that news came of the death of Philip, neither were the Thracians so tractable and easie to be dealt withall in commerce and traffick: nor the Bastarnians could be content with that which they bought with their money, or be kept in order as they marched, but that they would break their ranks & run out of the direct way. Hereupon they began to do wrong & injury on both sides one unto another which encreasing daily more & more to outrages, kindled the fire of an open war. In the end, the Thracians unable to endure the violence & multitudes of these enemies, leaving their villages in the plains beneath, retired to an exceeding high mountain, called Danua. To which place, when the Bastar-nians would have gone: behold now withstanding they approached to the tops and ridge of the hill, they were surprised with a storm, much like to that wherewith the Gauls (as it is reported) perished at what time as they were a spoiling and pilling the Temple at Delphi. For they were not only drenched first with showers of rain pouring upon them, pelted afterwards with thick storms of hailstones, stricken with great cracks of thunder, and blasted with gleams of lightning that daz-led their eye-sight: but also the lightning flashed so upon them on every side, that it seemed they were charged and shot directly against their bodies: so as not only the common soldiers, but also the principal leaders and captains themselves were smitten down therewith and overthrown.
 Whereupon when they were scattered & would have fled down the hill, from the exceeding steep rocks they tumbled down they knew not how with their heads forward. And albeit the Thraci-ans pursued them thus scared and affrighted, yet they had nothing in their mouth, but that the gods forced them to run away, and that the sky fell upon them. Being thus disparted with this tempestuous storm, and returned as it were out of shipwrack into the camp from whence they set forth, as most of them but half armed, they began to debate in council what to do. Hereupon arose some dissension among them: whiles part were of opinion to return back into their own country, and part advised to follow the way still and pierce forward into Dardania. About 20000 persons went through under the conduct of Glydicius: the rest of the multitude returned the same way they came into the parts beyond Danubim. Perseus being possessed of the kingdom, now commanded Antigonus to be put to death: and whiles he was setting the States in order, and establishing himself in his own seat, he sent embassadors to Rome, to renew the amity that his father had with the Romans, as also to request that he might be stiled with the name of King by the Senate of Rome. And these were the affairs in Macedonia that year.
Q. Fulvius the other Consul triumphed over the Ligurians: and known it was for certain, that this triumph was granted unto him more for favour, than for any great exploit of his that might deserve such honour. He carried in show a mighty dead of the enemies arm'd but little or no many at all. Howbeit he dealt among his soldiers thirty Asces apiece: to every Centurion he gave twice as much, and to each Gentleman serving on horseback, the same threelfold. There was nothing in this triumph more memorable and worthy the noting, than this, that as it fell out, he triumphed now the very same day that he had the year before upon his Basarothip. After his triumph, he published the general assembly for the election of Magistrates, which were created Consul M. Junius Brutus, and M. Atilius. This done, when there had been three of the Private elected a sudden tempest brake up and dissolved the assembly. The morrow after which was now done full before the Ides of March, the other three were chosen, namely, M. Aulus, Titus, and Chiron.

Curvus, T. Claudius Nero, and T. Pomponius Capuo. The Roman games were exhibited again the second time, by the two Aediles of the Chair, Cn. Servilius Capio, and Ap. Claudius Cens. by occasion of certain prodigies that hapned: for there was an earthquake; and in the publick pavilions and tabernacles, where the sacred beds of the gods were solemnly spread, the heads of the gods which were laid in those beds, turned away of their own accord, and the wooll together with the other coverlets which were laid before Jupiter fell down. It was taken also for a prodigious wonder, that the mice and rats had gnawn and tasted before of the olives upon the table [of Jupiter]; for the satisfaction and expiation of which prodigies, nothing else was done, but the solemnizing of those games and plaies again, as is aforesaid.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and fortieth Book.

The fire in the Temple of Vesta went out. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus the Pro-Consul, vanquished the Celtiberians, and received their submission, and for a memoriall of the worthy deeds by him achieved, he built a town in Spain called Gracchuris. Posthumius Albinus the Pro-Consul, subdued the Vaccæans and Lusitans: and both of them triumphed. Antiochus, the son of King Antiochus, whom his father had given in hostage to the Romans, after the death of his brother Seleucus, who succeeded his father late deceased, was sent from Rome into the Realm of Syria. The Censors held a review and numbering of the Citizens, and solemnly purged the City. There were enrolled in their books, of Roman Citizens 273344. Q. Voconius Saxa, a Tribune of the Commons, published a Law, That no man should make a woman to be his full heir. M. Cato was the man that perswaded and spoke for this Law; and his Oration is extant. Moreover, this book containeth the wars and exploits of many Captains against the Ligurians, Istrians, Sardinians, and Celtiberians: also the occasions and causes of the Macedonian war, which Perseus the son of Philip began: for he had sent an embassage to the Carthaginians, which they gave audience unto in the night season. Other States also and Cities of Greece he solicited. This Perseus, setting religion aside (for many stately and magnificent Temples he built in divers places, and namely, at Athens, to Jupiter Olympius; and at Antiochia, to Jup. Capitolinus) was otherwise a King of most base demeanour and carriage.

The one and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

The beginning of this book, and the greater part thereof immediately ensuing is lost. Im-premis, As touching the disposition of the Provinces by lot, as well of Consuls as Prators; and namely, how the government of Gaul fell to A. Manlius, and of Liguria to M. Junius; and how of the Prators, M. Titinius was assigned to the hither Province of Spain, and T. Pontius to the farther; Nero to Etruria, T. Eburus to Sardinia. Item, as concerning the fire of Vesta, the exploits of T. Gracchus and L. Albinus in Biscay and Portugal; the survey and raising of women, mentioned in Cicero, in S. Augustine de Civitate Dei; and others: finally, of the acts achieved by M. Junius about Genoway. And thus it sheweth a pretence and broken front as ye see, To have armed the same, which in peace he had received of his father: and for that cause it is said, That he was passing well beloved of the youth and lusty gallants, who desired nothing more than to spoil and raise booties.

Now when the Consul was in deliberation with his councill, as touching war in Istria, some were of opinion, to proceed thereunto incontinently: before that the enemies could assemble their forces; others advised, to consult first with the Senate: but their counsel importeth, who were for speedy expedition. So the Consul dislodged from Aquileia, and encamped near the Lake Tima- on, which lieth hard by the sea. Thither came Caius Furius (one of the navall Duumvirs) with ten ships: for two such Duumvirs or wardens had been chosen; to make head against the Ilyrian fleet: who with twenty ships in all, keeping the upper sea, were to guard the sea-coasts, so as they had Ancona (as it were) the middle center between: for L. Cornelius took the charge of all that lay on the right hand thereof, as far as to Tarentum; and C. Furius of the left, unto Aquileia. These ten vessels (I say) were sent to the near port, against the marches of Istria, with other ships of burden fraughted with store of victuals and provision. The Consul followed after with his legions, and pitched his camp five miles from the sea. And within a short time there was a good and frequent market kept in the port, from whence there was conveyed all manner of provision into the camp. And to the end that this might hold in more security, good guards were set about the camp

A on every side. Toward Istria there was one standing frontier garrison, consisting of a cohort of Placentins, levied on a sudden, opposed and lodged between the sea and the camp. And to the end the same might serve for a guard to defend Adria, that watched it the river. M. Eburius (a Colonel of the two legions) was commanded to lead two squadrons of soldiers out of the second legion, T. and C. both Eburii (Colonels likewise) had led the third legion, by the way that goeth to Aquileia, which should guard the forragers and fellows. From which quarter about a mile distant was the camp of the French. And a certain petty King there was among them, one Carnilius, having the conduct of three thousand armed soldiers, or somewhat more. So soon as the Romans were approached, the lake Timone with their camp, the Istrians let them down secretly in a close place behind a little hill; and from thence followed the Roman army as it marched.

B By crooks and crooked waies, espying and lying for all advantages that might be presented: for intelligence they had of all that was done either at sea or by land. And when they perceived upon a time the corps de guard before the camp feeble and weak, and that there was a great number of unarmed Merchants between the camp and the sea, without any defence at all either from land or water, they ran at once upon the foresaid guards, to wit, the Placentine cohort, and also the squadrons of the second legion. Now their enterprise at the beginning was covered and hidden by occasion of a morning mist, which at the first warmth of the sun brake and scattered away, and then began somewhat to appear through it: but the light was not yet clear and come to the full; by reason whereof every thing (as commonly in such a case) shewed far bigger than it was. And this at that time mightily deceived the Romans, causing the army of the enemies to seem the greater by many degrees. At which sight, the soldiers of the one guard as well as the other being affrighted, fled into the camp with a great tumult and alarm, and there caused far more fear than they brought with them: for neither were they able to tell why they fled thus as they did, nor give a ready answer to those that asked them the question. Over and besides, a great noise they heard from the camp gates, as where there was no sufficient guard to sustain the first assault. Besides, their running thus in a throng together in the dark, while one tumbled upon another, made such a confusion, that they knew not whether the enemy was within the rampier or no. No other cry was heard but this: To sea. To sea. For by occasion that one soldier at adventure began to set up that note, all the camp presently rung again therewith, from one end to the other. Whereupon at first, (as if they had been commanded so to do) to the sea they ran, some few armed, but the most part without any armour or weapons: afterwards more, and consequently at last in manner all; yea, and the Consul himself, seeing that he laboured in vain to reclaim them back he fled, and could prevail neither by command nor authority, nor yet with orders in the end, only M. Licinius Scabro (a Tribune or Colonel of the third legion, abandoned of his own legion) remained behind with three ensigns and no more. The Istrians finding him alone, (for no man else was seen in arms to make resistance) entred joyntly into the camp ran upon him (as he was embattelling his soldiers and encouraging them in the quarter about the Prator his lodging) surprised, and with numbers over-charged him. The skirmish and fight was more cruell, than for proportion of so few defendants: and not ended, before that the Tribune himself and those about him, were slain every man. The Generall his pavilion and all about it, was overthrowen: which

C when the enemy had ransacked and rifled of all that was there, they went as far as the treasurers lodgings, the market place, and to the gate Quimana: where they found abundance of all things set out ready for their hands, and within the treasurers pavilion the tables spread and covered with good wines and meat upon them. Then their chief Lord & Leader (the petty King aforesaid) made no more ado but sat him down, fell to his victuals and made good cheer; and anon all the rest following his example, did so likewise, and never once thought of arms, or of enemies, and like to those who were not wont to fare so well and feed liberally, they greedily overcharged their bellies with wine and viands: but the Romans all the while stood in far other terms. They trembled, they were trustily to their business both on land and sea. Down went the shipsmen and sailors with their sails and booths; and look what provision of victuals or other things were set forth also upon the strand and shore, they harried and hurried a shipboard: the soldiers all affrighted ran amaine to the sea-side, for to be embarked. The mariners fearing lest their vessels should be overcharged, some put back the press and withstood them for coming in, others shove off from the wharf, and lanced into the deep. Hereupon began a brail and broil, and from that they fell together by the ears, soldiers and mariners, one with another: some went away with knocks and wounds, and others left their lives behind them: untill at length by the Consul his commandment the fleet was retired far from the land. Which done, he began to sort the armed and unarmed apart. And hardly were there (of so great a multitude) twelve hundred found with armor about them, and very few horsemen that had brought their horses with them. All the rest were a confused and disordered company, resembling the rascall sort of camp-followers, hurriers, squallers, fencers, fustions, and lackies: who had been a ready booty to have preyed upon, in case the enemies could have thought upon any sort of arms. Then at last came a messenger to recall the third legion, and to surprise the guard of the Gauls: and with that, from all parts they began to return again toward their own camp, for to recover it, and wipe away and blot out the shamefull stain and dishonour which they had received. The Colonels of the third legion commanded the soldiers to throw down upon the ground their forrage and fewell, they charged the Centurions to set the elder and unwieldy soldiers two and two upon the horses and labouring beasts which they had discharged of their load: and willed the horsemen to take up behind them every one a young infantryman: shewing what an honour it would be to the third legion, for to regain by their valour the camp, which had been lost by the cowardice and fear of those in the second: and easily (say they) may it be won again, if the Barbarians, while they are encumbered with the pillage, might be surprised at their wares, and be taken themselves like as they overtook others before. This exhortation was received with great alacrity and contentment of the souldiers. Alost were the ensignes borne and advanced apace, neither staid the post-ensignes one whit for the souldiers. Howbeit the Col. and those companies which were brought from the sea, came first to the rampier. L. Atius a principall Centurion of the second legion, not only encouraged the souldiers, but made remonstrance unto them, That if the Istrians these victories, had ever meant to guard and keep the camp with the same force of arms by which they had won it, they would at the first have pursued the enemies to the sea, so soon as they had turned them out of their tents: and afterwards have set a good corps de guard, at leastwise before the rampier and the avenues thereof: but like enough it is (saith he) that with guzzling wine they were dead asleepe like beasts. And herewith he commanded As Baculonium his own ensign-bearer, a man of approved valour and singular prowles, to advance his banner forward. Mary, that I shall (quoth he) full soon, if you will follow me alone that the thing may be done more quickly. With that he forced his whole strength, and having flung the ensign over the trench into the camp, he was the first himself that entred at the camp gate. On another part likewise T. and C. both Ælii, and Colonels of the third legion, were come with their Cavalry: then presently followed those also whom they had horsed two by two upon the labouring jades and wagons of carriage, and after them the Col. with his whole army. But of the Istrians some few there were (such as were not stark drunk) whose wits and memory served them to run away: the rest were dead asleepe indeed, and never awoke again. So the Romans recovered all their goods, save only the wine and victuals which was devoured and consumed. The Roman souldiers who were crazy and sick and had been left in the camp, after they perceived their own fellows within the rampier, found their hands again, caught up weapons, and made a great slaughter and execution. But above all others C. Popilius, intitled Sabellus, a Gentleman and Cavalier of Rome, bare himself most bravely that day, who being left in the camp (because he was hurt and maimed in one of his feet) slew the greatest number of the enemies by far. Eight thousand Istrians fell upon the edge of the sword, and not one taken prisoner alive: for the choler and despitous indignation of the souldiers was such, as they had no mind at all of prizes and booties. Howbeit the King of the Istrians, drunk as he was, had good fortune as to be taken from the very boord where he sat, and hastily mounted on horseback by his men, and so fled a way and escaped. Of the winners there perished in all two hundred thirty seven souldiers: and of them, more died in their morning flight than in the recovery of their camp. Now it chanced so, that C. and L. both named Gavilii, new Coloners and inhabitants of Aquileia as they came with victuals, had like to have stumbled ignorantly upon the camp, when it was taken & possessed by the Istrians. They being retired back in great haste to Aquileia, leaving their carriage behind them, let all on a fright & uproar, not only at Aquileia but also at Rome within few daies after: for thither was the rumour run, That not only the camp was forced by the enemies, and (which was true indeed) the Romans put to flight, but that all was lost, and the army utterly defeated. Whereupon, as the manner was in all sudden tumults and alarms, wits went forth for musters and levies of souldiers, extraordinarily, not in the City only, but also throughout all Italy. Two legions of Roman Citizens were enrolled, and the Latine allies were commanded to set out 10000 foot with 200 horse. M. Junius the Col. had commandment to pass over into Gallia, and to levy of the Cities and States of that Province, as many as they were able to make and furnish. It was ordained withall, that T. Claudius the Prator should make proclamation, that the souldiers of the fourth legion, and of the Latine allies five thousand foot and two hundred and fifty horse, should meet together at Pisa, and that in the absence of the Col. he should defend that Province: also that M. Titinius the Prator should appoint the Quintus as Arminius: that the first legion and the like number of allies, as well foot as horse, should there assemble. Then Nero took his journey, clad in his rich coat of arms, toward Pisa his Province. And Titinius having to Arminius Caius Cassius a Colonel, to take the conduct of the legion there, took musters at Rome. M. Junius the Col. passed out of Liguria into Gaul and arrived at Aquileia, having levied aid souldiers as he went, of all the Cities of Gaul and the Colonies, to be in readinesse of hand. There he was certified that the army was safe and sound: whereupon he dispatched his letter to Rome to advertise them that they should not trouble themselves any more in this false alarm, and himself after he had discharged the Gauls of those aids which he had imposed upon them, went roundly companion in government. Great was the joy at Rome, coming thus as it did unlooked for. The musters were laid aside, the souldiers discharged who were enrolled and had taken their military oath, and the army visited with the plague at Arminius was dismissed and sent home. The Istrians albeit they were encamped with a great strength of armed men, not far from the Col. his camp, after they heard once that the Consul was come with a new army, disbanded and slip every man away on all sides to their severall Cities, and the Consuls retired with their legions to Aquileia there to winter.

When these troubles of Istria were thus at length appeased, there went forth a bill of the Senat, That the Col. should agree between themselves, whether of them twain was to return to Rome.

for to hold the assembly for election of Magistrates. At what time as M. Licinius Nerva, and C. Papirius Turdus, two Tribunes of the Commons, in all their Orations to the people, inveighed bitterly against M. Junius in his absence, and promulged a Law to this effect, That after the Ides of March (for the Coll. had their governments already prolonged for one whole year) he should continue no longer in place, so the end that so soon as he was out of his office, he might presently be called to his answer judicially. Quintus Fabius, one of their Collegues, withstood this bill by them proposed, and after much debate and contention prevailed so much, that it passed not.

About the same time Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, and L. Posthumus Albinus, being returned out of Spain to Rome, had audience given them by the Prator M. Titinius in the Temple of Bellona, there to discourse of the wars by them achieved, to demand their deserved honours, to the end that praise and thanksgiving also should be rendered to the immortall gods. Moreover, at the very same time intelligence was given by letters from T. Eburnus the Prator, which his son brought and shewed to the Senat, of great troubles in Sardinia. Namely, that the Ilians, joyning unto them the strength of the Balari, had invaded the province standing in peaceable terms: neither was he able to make head against them, but in so feeble an army as he had, the same wasted and consumed much with the pestilence. The same news related the Embassadors likewise of the Sardinians, making humble suit to the Senat, to relieve and succour their Cities at least wise, for that their villages and country towns were already past help. This embassage, with all other matters concerning Sardinia, put over to the new Magistrates; as also an embassage also was presented unto them from the Lycians, who complained grievously of the Rhodians, unto whom they had been annexed and made subjects by L. Cornelius Scipio. Indeed (say they) we lived sometime under the seignory of K. Antiochus, but that servitude of ours under the K. compared to this present state and condition wherein we now are, seemed unto us an excellent liberty: for not only are we now yoked, and kept under publike authority in general, by taxes, levies and impositions, but every one in particular endureth meer bondage and slavery. Our selves are abused, yea, and our wives and children suffer villanies before our eyes: upon our bodies, our backs and chests they work upon, and discharge their humour of cruelty: in our good name (an indignity unsupportable) we are distressed, depraved, and defamed: yea openly in the face of the world, they cease not to commit outrages against us, even to usurp and extend their authority over us, and to try matters upon us with extremity: to the end that we Lycians might be put of all doubt, that there is no difference between us and slaves bought and sold for silver in open market. The Senat moved with these remonstrances by the Lycians, addressed their letters to the Rhodians to this effect, that it was no part of their meaning and intent, that the Lycians should be slaves to the Rhodians: or that any other born free, should be enthrall'd by any person: but their will was, that the Lycians should in such terms live under the government and protection of the Rhodians, that both States, the one as well as the other, might range and frame themselves like good associates under the Dominion and Empire of Rome.

After this followed two triumphs over Spain, one immediately upon another: first, Sempronius Gracchus over the Celtiberians: and the morrow after L. Posthumus Albinus over the Lusitanians and other Spaniards of those parts. Tib. Gracchus carried in shew 4000 pound weight of silver, and Albinus twenty thousand. Both of them divided among their souldiers twenty five Denarii apiece, to each Centurion the same double, and treble to every horseman. Thus did they also by allies as well as by Romans.

It forthwith about that time, that M. Junius the Consul, came out of Istria to Rome, by occasion of the election which was to be holden: and when the two Tribunes of the Commons, Papirius and Licinius, had in the presence of the Senat barked and wearied him with interrogatories, as touching the affairs passed in Istria, they brought him forth also before the body of the people. To which questions after that the Consul had answered, how he had not been above 11 daies in the Province, and as for the things that happened in his absence, he knew no otherwise than they did, only by the common bruit and report: then they went on urging him still, and asking how it came to pass, that M. Junius rather came not to Rome, to give account unto the State, why he pulled one of Gaul which was his allotted Province into Istria? and to shew, when it was that either the Senat decreed, or the people of Rome granted by their voices to enterprise that war. But happily it may be said (so he) that albeit the war was undertaken only upon his own head, whom yet no doubt, executed it was right worthily with policy and valour. Nay, I was but for to answer, and hard it is to say, whether it were begun more lewdly, than managed inconsiderately. Two entire cohortes were on a sudden at unawares surprized by the Istrians, the Roman camp was forced to be taken with all the strength of horse and foot that was therein: the rest scattered without arms, and the Consul himself was the foremost man that ran away to the sea-side, where the ships: and finally he should render an account of all these matters, when he is a private person again, since that he should not do it being Consul. This storm past, the general assembly for the Magistrates election was holden: wherein were created Coll. C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. The next day following were the Praetors chosen to wit, P. Aelius Tiberius the second time, C. Quintus Plaminus, C. Numisus, C. Mummius, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Pulcherus Domitius. The civil jurisdiction of the City fell to Tiberius, the forrains to Quintus. The government of Sicily was allotted to Numisus, of Sardinia to Mummius. Howbeit, this Province by reason of the great war therein became the charge of the Col. And by lot it fell to Gracchus.

but Istria to Claudius his Colleague. Gaul was divided into two Provinces: whereof Sulp by lot obtained one, and Levinus the other.

Upon the Ides of March, on which day Sempronius and Claudius entered their Consulship, moved it was only in the Senat, as touching Sardinia and Istria, and the enemies to both those Provinces, who there had levied war. But the morrow after, the Embassadors of the Sardinians being referred over to the new Magistrate, and L. Minutius Thermus who had been Lieutenant to the Consul Manlius in Istria, entered into the Senat-house. By them the Senat was informed how dangerous the wars were in those Provinces. Moved likewise were the Senators by the embassies of the Latine allies, who in the end were admitted into the Senat, after they had importuned the Censors and Consuls of the former year: the sum of their complaint was this, That their own Citizens being once enrolled at Rome, were most of them departed and removed thither to dwell: which if it might be suffered, within few reviews and cessings it would come to pass, that their Cities should be dispeopled and desolat, their villages and fields desart and waste, and able to set out no souldiers for the wars. Semblably the Samnites and Pelignians complained, that four thousand households were gone from them, and retired to Fregella: and yet neither the one nation or the other, were set at a less proportion of souldiers in all their levies. Two cautelous means and devices there were brought up, whereby men changed thus their Cities at pleasure. The Law granted this indulgence to the allies of the Latine nation, as many as left issue of their race behind them in their house, That they should be reputed Citizens of Rome. By abusing this Law, some did injury to their allies, other wronged the people of Rome: for, both they that were to leave such issue at home, gave their children, as it were, in villenage to some Roman Citizen or other whom they liked of; with condition to manumise and make them free, that they might be Tribes or enfranchised Citizens. And they also who wanted issue to leave behind them, were held as Citizens of Rome. But in process of time without any of these colourable pretences of right, without regard of law and respect of issue, they crept in and had the benefit of the Burgesie and freedom of Rome by their transmigration thither to inhabit, by enrolment in the reviews. To meet with these practises, the embassadors craved a remedy for the time to come: as also that they would peremptorily command all their allies to repair again to their own Cities: with an expresse inhibition, that no man should receive any other to be his vassall and villain, and so to alienate him, with intention by that means to change the City wherein he lived: and that who soever became Citizens of Rome after that manner, should not be counted for a Citizen. These propositions were granted by the Senat. Then were decrees passed for those provinces of Istria and Sardinia which were in arms, to wit, for the enrolling of two legions into Sardinia, having either of them five thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred horse, besides twelve thousand footmen, and 600 horsemen of the Latine allies; and ten quinquiremes or galleaces, with five banks of oars, in case the Generall would warp them out of the arsenal. The like number as well of the Infantry as Cavalry, was assigned for Istria. The Consuls also were enjoined to send to M. Titinius in Spain one legion with three hundred horse, besides 5000 footmen of allies, and 250 horsemen.

Before that the Consuls cast lots for their Provinces, certain prodigies were reported. Namely, that in the territory of Crustumium, there fell from heaven a stone in the lake of Mars: That in the territory of Rome, there was an infant born like a very stump, without head, feet, or hands: and a snake or serpent seen four-footed. That in the market-place of Capua, many houses were smitten with thunderbolts and lightning. Also at Patrol two ships were set on fire by lightning, and burnt. Whiles these prodigious wonders were by others related, there was seen a wolf also in the day time at Rome, which having entred at the gate Collina, after much courting and hunting, with much ado and noise of them that followed the chace, escaped away from them all, and passed through the Esquiline gate. In regard of these strange tokens, the Cons. killed greater beasts for sacrifice: and for one whole day, a solemn supplication and prayers were made at all the shrines and altars of the gods. These sacrifices done and past, accordingly as it appertained, the Cons. cast lots for their provinces: and to Claudius, befell Istria, to Sempronius, Sardinia.

After this, C. Claudius published a Law by virtue of an ordinance of the Senat, in favour of allies: and proclaimed, That those allies, and namely, of the Latine nation, who either themselves or their ancestors, had been enrolled among the Latine allies, during the Censorship of Marcus Claudius, and Titus Quintius, or any time afterwards, should make return every man into his own City, before the first day of November next ensuing. And Lucius Mummius the Praetor had in commission to enquire and search for those that returned not accordingly. To this Law and Edict above said of the Consul, an act also of the Senat was adjoynd, That the Dictator, Consul, Interregent, Censor, and Lord chief Justice in the Common Pleas for the time being, should endeavour and take order, that who soever were manumised and made free, should take an oath, That he who manumised or enfranchised him, did it not with an intent, for to exchange the City wherein he was: and look who would not thus swear, him they thought not worthy to be manumised. But his charge and jurisdiction was afterwards committed to C. Claudius the Consul.

Whiles these affairs passed at Rome, M. Junius and A. Manlius, who had been Consuls the year before, having wintered in Ardea, in the beginning of the Spring entered with an army into the frontiers of Istria. Where as they made waste and spoil far and near as they went, the

Istrians

A Istrians entred into a commotion and took arms, rather upon grief of heart and indignation to see their goods thus pilld and ransacked, than for any assured hope they had of their insufficiency to make head against two armies. Having therefore raised a multitude of their able youth from all their Cities and States, they assembled in haste a sudden and tumultuary army, which at the first gave battell, and fought more in heat of courage, than with persistance of resolution. In conflict there were slain of them to the number of four thousand; the rest abandoned all war, and fled here and there into their Cities. From thence they sent ambassadors first into the Roman camp to crave peace, and then the hostages which were demanded. After intelligence given at Rome of these news by the letters of the Pro-Consuls, C. Claudius the Consul fearing lest this occurrence might put him by the government of his Province and the conduct of the army, without solemn prayers and vows made, without his Lictors clad in their coats of arms, departed suddenly in great haste (all of the head) by night towards his Province, and made no man privy thereto, but only his Collegue. His voyage thither was not so rash and inconsiderate, but his carriage there was more foolish and undiscereet: for being thither come, he assembled a generall audience, where, after he had very unreasonably reproached Manlius for his running away out of the camp, (to the great discontentment of the souldiers, who were the first that fled;) and with opprobrious terms shaken up M. Junius also for taking part in this dishonour with his companion: in the end he commanded them both to avoid out of the Province. Whereupon the souldiers made answer again, and said, That they would then obey the Consuls commandment, when (according to the ancient custome of their fore-fathers) he had made his solemn vows within the Capitoll.

C and then taken his leave and departed out of the City, accompanied with his Lictors in their rich coats of arms, warlike. Hereat he was so far enraged with anger, that he called upon the treasures deputy belonging to Manlius, for chains and gyves, and menaced to send Junius and Manlius both bound to Rome. But the deputy likewise made as little reckoning of the Consuls commandment: and the more animated he was to disobey the Consul, by reason that he was backed by the whole host round about him; who as they supported the cause of their Captains and Leaders, so they hated the Consul at the heart. In conclusion, the Consul being loaden and wearied with the contumelious and railing behaviour of every one in particular, and with the frumps and taunts of the multitude in generall (for they stuck not over and besides to mock him and make a laughing stock of him) he went his waies again to Aquileia, in the same ship wherein he came.

D From thence he wrote unto his Collegue by an Edict, to charge those new souldiers who were enrolled for Istria, to meet at Aquileia: to the end, that no business should keep him at Rome, but that with all speed he might depart from the City in his coat of arms, and after he had conceived and pronounced his vows accordingly. His companion in office was well content, and did all these things requirit full willingly: and a short day was assigned for the assembling of the souldiers at the Rendezvous abovenamed. But Claudius was at Rome well-near as soon as his letters; where, at his first coming, he made an Oration in the publike audience of the people, as touching the demeanor of Manlius and Junius: and having staid no longer than three daies at Rome, he set out with his Lictors formally in their coat-armour, when he had made his vows solemnly in the Capitoll, and so departed into his Province again with as much celerity and haste (if not more) as he came from thence.

E Some few daies before, Junius and Manlius began to assault by all forcible means the town Nesatium, into which the principall persons of the Istrians, and Epulo their King, were retired. Claudius, with his two new legions, presented himself before the town; and after he had discharged the old armies and their commanders, laid siege unto it, and intended to force it with mantlets and engins of battery. The course also of the river which ran along beside the walls, and not only impeached the assailants but yielded water unto the besieged, he diverted into another new channell, and bestowed many daies work thereabout. This mightily affrighted the barbarous people, to see how they were cut off from water. Howbeit, they never thought of peace for all this, but fell in hand to kill their wives and children: and when they had so done (because they would present to the view of their enemies, so horrible a sight and fearfull spectacle) they massacred them upon the walls openly in their sight, and then threw them headlong down. While the silly women and poor infants (amidst their pitious and lamentable cries) were thus cruelly murdered, the Roman souldiers mounted over their walls and entred into the City. Their King when he once perceived (by the fearfull outcries of those who fled) that the town was lost: for fear he should be taken alive, stabbed himself with his dagger to the heart. All the rest were either taken prisoners or killed. After this, two other towns, Murina and Esperia, were won by assault and rased. The pillage was greater than a man would have looked for in so poor a nation: which was bestowed every whit upon the souldiers. Five thousand six hundred and two and thirty persons were sold out right in port-sale under the gairland. The Captains of this war were first scourged with rods and then beheaded. Thus Istria, by the ruin of three towns and the death of their King, was appeased: and all the Cities and States thereof from every quarter, came in with their hostages, made submission and did fealty and homage to the Romans.

G The Istrians war was no sooner ended, but the Ligurians began to complot for to take arms and enter into rebellion. T. Claudius the Pro-Cos. (who the former year had been Praetor) was governor and commander at that time of Pisa with a garrison of one legion. The Senat being advertised thereof by his letters, thought good to send the very same letters to C. Claudius (for the other Consul Consul was already passed over into Sardinia: and withall, a decree was granted unto this effect. That considering he had performed his commission in Istria, so as there remained no more for him to do there, he should (if he thought so good) transport his army into Liguria. Moreover upon the Consul his letters, wherein he wrote what exploits he had achieved in Istria, there was ordained a solemn procession for two daies together. Semblably, the other Consul Tib. Sempronius, managed his affairs as happily in Sardinia: he entred with an army into the country of the Sardinian Ilians. Great aide were come from the Balarans to relieve and succour those Ilians: with both these nations he fought a battell in pitched field. The enemies were discomfited and put to flight, turned out of their camp, and 12000 armed men slain. The morrow after, the Consul commanded all their armor and weapons to be gathered together and laid on an heap: and this he burned as a sacrifice to the honour of Vulcan. Which done, he retired with his victorious army into the affociat Cities, there to pass the winter.

C. Claudius likewise, upon receipt of the letters of T. Claudius, and the commission directed from the Senat, marched with his legions out of Istria into Liguria: where, the enemies were come down into the plains, and lay encamped near the river Scutenna. In which place there was a battell fought: 15000 of them were put to the sword, and not so few as 700 taken prisoners, either in the conflict, or within the Camp: for that also was forced and won: besides, 51 ensignes they left. The Ligurians, as many as escaped the execution, fled on all sides to the mountains for refuge: and notwithstanding that the Consul spoiled and wasted their champaign country, there was not one man made shew of arms. Thus Claudius having in one year vanquished and subdued two nations, and in one Consulship (a rare felicity in any other man) reduced other two Provinces into quietness and peace, returned to Rome.

Certain prodigious and monstrous sights were that year reported, to wit, in the territory of Crustumium, a certain soul, called Sangualis, with her bill pierced into a sacred stone. In Campania a Breef spake: at Syracusa a bull that strayed out of the fields from the herd, leapt the brazen cow, there in the City, and did his kind. In the territory of Crustumium, there was a supplication and procession holden one day long in the very place of the foresaid prodigious sign. In Campania, the heifer or cow aforesaid, was put out to be kept and fed at the charges of the City. Last of all the prodigy of Syracusa, was expiat by a purgatory sacrifice, by direction from the soothsayers to what gods, supplications & sacrifice should be made. That year died M. Claudius Marcellus the Bishop, who had been Cos, and Censor. In his stead M. Marcellus his son was consecrated Bishop. Likewise in the same year, there was a Colony of 2000 Citizens of Rome planted at Luca. The Triumvirs of the Commissioners who had the conduct and placing of them, were P. Elius, L. Egilius, and Ca. Sicinius: one and fifty acres of land and an half was set out for them apiece to occupy out of the territory late conquered from the Ligurians, and which had been sometime the possession of the *Tuscan*s, before it was holden by the Ligurians.

Then came the Consul C. Claudius to the City of Rome, where after he had discoursed before the Senat, as touching the prosperous execution of his affairs, as well in Istria as Liguria. & there upon demanded a triumph, he soon obtained that honour: and during his Magistracy triumphed at once over these two nations. In which solemnity of his triumph, he carried in shew 307000 Deniers, and 85702 Victoriats. He gave to every common [Roman] souldier fifteen Denarii a peece, a double proportion to the Centuriens, and thrice as much to every horseman. But upon the allies he bestowed less by the one moiety than to natural Citizens: and therefore, as they followed his chariot, they were silent and said never a word: a man that had seen them would have said they were discontent.

During the time of this triumph, the Ligurians perceiving that not only the Consul his army was brought home to Rome, but the legion also at Pisa discharged by T. Claudius: thinking now all fear past and overblown, secretly levied a power: and having passed over the cross frontiers, by travelling the waies through the mountains, descended into the downs, and wasted the demains of Modena, and by sudden assault surprised the very Colony. The news hereof was so soon arrived at Rome, but the Senat commanded C. Claudius the Consul to hold the high Court for the solemn election, with all convenient speed: that so soon as new annual Magistrates were created, he might return into his Province, and perforce recover this Colony out of their hands. So according to the advice and ordinance of the Senat the said assembly was holden: wherein were elected Consuls Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, and Q. Publilius Philinus. Then were the Prators afterwards chosen, to wit, M. Popilius Lenax, P. Licinius Crassus, M. Cornelius Scipio, L. Pappus Musa, M. Alburnus, and L. Aquilius Gallus. The Consul C. Claudius had his Patent sealed again for one year longer, to continue in command of the army, and government of the Province Gallia. And for fear lest the Hispanians likewise should follow the example of the Ligurians, he had commission to lend those allies of the Latine nation, whom he had brought out of his Province for to solemnize his triumph,

Upon that very day, on which the Consuls, Cn. Cornelius and Quintus Publilius entered their Magistracy, and sacrificed each of them an ox as the manner was, in the honour of Jupiter. In that beast which Q. Publilius caused to be slain, the liver was found headless. When he had reported this accident unto the Senat, he was enjoyned to sacrifice another beest for to appeale the wrath of the gods. Moved then it was in the Senat house as concerning the Provinces, and a decree passed, that both Consuls should be sent to Pisa, and against the Ligurians: but order was given, that

* Vilfortius, the same that Quintarius, i. e. half Denarius. It had the Image of Vulcan stamped upon it.

A that whether of them had the charge of Pisa allotted unto him, he should (when the time came) repair to Rome against the election of yearly Magistrates. Moreover, there was another branch of this decree, that either of them should enroll two new legions, and three hundred horsemen and levy of the Latine allies ten thousand foot souldiers, and six hundred horse. And T. Claudius continued still in full command, until such time as the Consul was arrived in his Province. While these matters were thus debated, and passed in the Councill-House, Cn. Cornelius was called forth by a bailiff or usher. And within a while after he was gone out of the Temple, he returned thither again with an heavy and dismaied countenance, and declared unto the LL. of the Senat, that the liver of that ox which he also had killed for sacrifice, a beast of six years old and well liking, was consumed and come to nothing; and when he hardly beleaved the Minister attending upon the

B sacrifice, who told him hereof, that himself caused the water to be poured forth of the pot where in the tripes and inward parts were sodden, where he saw the rest of the tripes and entrails full and whole, but all the liver wasted away, after a wonderful and miraculous manner, not to be spoken. The LL. were much terrified and amazed at this prodigious object, and the more perplexed were they, for that the other Consul likewise related unto them, how in regard that in his sacrifice the liver wanted an head, he had killed three oxen more, one after another, and yet could not procure the favour and grace of the gods. Hereupon the Senat commanded him still to sacrifice these greater beasts, until such time as he had his desire, and the gods were pleased again. Now it is said, that all the other gods were well enough contented, and their ire mitigated and appeased, only the goddesses Saturnus, Petalus could not be reconciled unto, for all that ever he might do. Then

* H. alth.

C the Cons. and Prators committed the disposition of their Provinces to the arbitrement of the lots. Pisa fell to Cornelius, and Liguria to Petalus. As for the Prators, L. Papyrius Mafso was Lord chief Justice by lot appointed, within the City of all Citizens pleas, and M. Aburius had the jurisdiction over strangers. M. Cornelius Scipio M. Liginensis had the charge to govern the lower Spain, and Lucius Aquilius Gallus, Sicily. The two Prators behind, requested earnestly that they might not be sent into their Provinces, and namely, M. Popilius into Sardinia: alledging, that Gracchus was able to quiet that island; and the rather, for that T. Ebutius the Prator was by the Senat adjoined to him for assistance: neither was it good to interrupt courses begun, the continuity whereof is the most effectual means to exploit any great important affairs. For what with delivering up the sword by the old L. Deputy, and receiving it by the new successor (whom it were

D more meet first to be trained up in knowledge of the State, than to be put to the managing of State matters) oftentimes the good opportunities of achieving brave enterprises pass by and are lost. This excuse of Popilius was held for good, and so approved. Then comes P. Licinius Crassus, and he for his part made allegations why he might not go into his Province: namely, by occasion of the solemn sacrifices, that he was to give his attendance upon. Now the higher part of Spain was allotted unto him. But commanded was he either to go into his Province, or else to take oath in a frequent and full assembly of the people, that the solemn sacrifice (as he pretended) was the thing that hindered him, and nothing else. This order being set down and thus passed in the behalf of P. Licinius, then steps me up M. Cornelius, and required them to take an oath of him likewise, that he might not go into the nether Province of Spain. So both these Prators were

E sworn according to one and the same form of oath. Whereupon M. Titinius and T. Fonteius were commanded to remain in quality and place of Pro-Consuls within Spain, and retain still the same authority and power of command: and order was granted, that for to supply their forces, there should be sent unto them three thousand Citizens of Rome with two hundred horse, and also five thousand Latine allies, and three hundred horsemen.

* 5. of May.

F The solemnity of the Latine holydaies began the third day before the Nones of May: where in, because at the sacrificing of one beast the Magistrate of Lanuvium in his prayer left out these words [Republi Romani Quirinum] and prayed not for the good estate of the people of Rome, and the Quirits, in bred a scruple. The matter was moved in the Senat, and the Senat referred it over to the Colledge of the Bishops and Prelats of the Church. And they pronounced this award, That forasmuch as those Latine feasts were not solemnized as they ought, they should begin again anew: and that the Citizens of Lanuvium, by whose default they were thus to be renewed, should be at the charges of all the beasts for sacrifice. Moreover, to breed more fearfull scrupulosity in mens minds, it fortuned that Cneus Cornelius the Consul as he returned from that solemnity out of the Alban mountain fell down in a fit of Apoplexy: which turned into an Hemiplegia or dead palse all the one side of his body, and so he was conveyed to the bath and hot waters at Cumes: where by occasion that his disease grew upon him still, he departed this life: from whence he was brought to Rome, and there carried forth in all magnificence of funerall obsequies, and right honourably interred. He had been Bishop also as well as Consul. Q. Petilius the other Consul, being commanded to hold an assembly for the surrogation of a Colleague unto him, (so soon as possibly he might be warranted by the auspices and approbation of the sacred birds) and withall, to proclaim and publish the Latine feasts and holydaies aforesaid: summoned the election against the third day before the Nones of Sexstilis: and the Latine solemnity, the third day likewise before the Ides of the same month.

* 3. of August.
11 of August.

While mens minds were much possessed already with religion, and set upon their devotions, word was brought moreover of certain fearfull prodigies: to wit, that at Tusculum there was seen a burning flame in the sky: that at Gabers, the Temple of Apollo, and many private mens houses;

houses: likewise at Graviscæ the town wall and one of the gates were shitten with thunder-bolts. For the procuration whereof, the LL. of the Senat ordained that the Bishops should give order according to their discretion.

Whiles the Consuls were thus staid, first both by their own temples holiness, then one of them by the death of the other; and afterwards by occasion of the new elections and the celebrating of the Latine festivall solemnity: C. Claudius in the mean time approached with his army to Modena, which the Ligurians the year before had won. He did not continued the siege full three daies, but he forced the Colony: and having thus recovered it from the enemies, he restored it again to the former inhabitants. Eight thousand Ligurians died there within the walls upon the sword: and immediately he dispatched his letters to Rome, wherein he not only declared the simple news, but glorified him and made his boast, That through his fortitude and fortune, both the Romans had not an enemy that durst shew his head on this side the Apennines; and that he had conquered so much land as might serve for to be divided by the people among many thousands. Tib. Sempronius likewise at the same time, fought many fortunate battles in Sardinia, and exactly tamed and subdued the Islanders: 15000 enemies he there slew in all. The Statutes of that nation which had revolted, were reduced to obedience under the people of Rome; the old tributaries had an imposition and exaction laid upon them of a double tribute, which they surely paid: the rest were put to a contribution of corn. After he had set the Province in quietness, and received out of the whole Island two hundred and thirty hostages, he sent certain Lieutenants as messengers to make report at Rome of all his proceedings: who also in his behalf should make suit unto the Senat, That in regard of the happy success in those exploits, under the charge, conduct, and fortune of Tib. Sempronius, first, due honour, praise, and thanksgiving might be redred to the immortal gods; and then, that himself might be allowed at his departure out of the Province, to bring away his army with him. The Senat gave audience to the messengers aforesaid within the Temple of Apollo: and upon their relation ordained a generall procession for two daies: commanding the Coll. to sacrifice 40 head of greater beasts: and withall, enjoyed Tib. Sempronius the Pro-Consul to continue that year with his army in that Province. Then the election which had been published against the third day before the Nones of Septimber for the substitution of one of the Coll. was the same day accomplished. And Q. Petilius the Cos. created for his Colleague, M. Valerius Lequinus, for to enter immediately into his Magistracy. This Levinus had been a long time desirous to be employed in some Province or other: and fitly it fell out for this longing desire, that letters came, importing how the Ligurians rebelled and were gone out again in arms. So after he had heard the contents of these letters, he made no longer stay, but upon the very Nones of Septimber (all goodly to be seen in his warriors coat of arms, he commanded the third legion (by occasion of this alarm) to go into France, to C. Claudius the Pro-Consul: also the Duntivirs of two wardens for the ports and navy to go to sea, and with a fleet to make sail for Pisa: & from thence to coast about all Liguria, and thus by hovering upon the seas, to terrifie the enemies that way also. Q. Petilius likewise the Cos. had appointed a day for his army to meet in the same place. Moreover, C. Claudius the Pro-Consul, advertised of the Ligurians revolt, over and besides those forces which he had about him at Parma, levied in haste a strength of more souldiers; and so with his compleat army approached the borders of the Ligurians. The enemies upon the arrivall of C. Claudius, by whole conduct they well remembered how late they had been discomfited and put to flight near the river Scutenna, minding to seek for defence rather by the strength of advantageous places than force of arms, against that power of his which to their cost they had before tried, seized the two hills, * Letus and Balissa, about which they raised a mure also for their better safety. But such as lagged behind and quit the champain plaines and lower grounds with the latest, were surprised and cut short, to the number of fifteen hundred. The rest kept within the mountains: who albeit they were in fear and danger of their own parts, yet forgot not their fibred cruelty: but ran upon the booties and prizes which they had taken at Modena, their poor prisoners whom they held captive, they pitiouly mangled, and killed most villanously: as for the beasts in the Temples every where, they rather hacked, hewed, and cut in peeces butcher-like, than sacrificed in decent, seemly, and religious manner. Thus being satisfied with the blond and massacre of living creatures, they took all their breathless things they had, and reared and stuck them upon the wals: and namely, implements of all sorts, made rather for use and necessity than ornament and shew. Q. Petilius the Consul, for fear lest the war would be ended in his absence, dispatched his letters to M. Claudius, to haste away with his army into France, for he would attend his coming upon the plains called Maeri; Upon the receipt of which letters, Claudius dislodged out of Liguria, and delivered unto the Consul his army at the said plains called Maeri. Few daies after came Cainus Valerius the other Consul thither also. There they divided their forces, and before they departed one from the other, they both together made a survey and review of their severall armies. This done, they cast lots into what quarters they should either of them go, for that they held it not good policy to charge the enemy both of them joyntly in one part. Now certain it is, that Valerius received his lot according to the auspices, in that he was within the precinct of the Temple or prospect by the Augur assigned. But Petilius herein made default (as the Augurs pronounced afterwards) and namely, the error was herein, because he being himself without the compass aforesaid, had put the lot into the casket, which was carried afterwards within the circuit of the said Temple. This done, they went into divers quarters: Petilius encamped off from the bank

A bank and rising of the hill between Bellona and Lavinia, which by a continual ridge uniteth and joineth the one mountain to the other. There, as he was uttering his counsel in an open audience, he let fall (by report) an ominous word prefiging his own death, never thinking of the ambiguity and double construction of the saying, that he would that very day capere Latium. In two several places at once he began to mount up the hill. That moment wherein he was himself advanced forward contagiously: but the other was repelled and beaten back by the enemies: whereupon the Consul rode full gallop to help that side which went down, and in very truth reclaim his men he did from running away; but whilst without good regard of his own person he kept before the enigma in the forefront, he chanced to be shot through with a dart, and so fell down dead in the place. The enemies were not aware of the Generals death: but some few of his own men who saw him fall, made halt (as knowing well that in it consisted now the main victory) to cover his body. So the rest of the multitude, as well cavalry as infantry, captainless as they were, dispersed the enemies and were masters of the mountains. Of Ligurians there were slain 3000: of the Roman army not above two and fifty. Now besides this evident issue and event, which fell out upon so heavy and deadly a preface by the Omen aforesaid, the pullerier also was heard to say, that all was not well in the auspices of the birds: neither was the Consul himself ignorant thereof.

But Omen of his (which I commonly interpret [Omen] presidium vasis jactum; When a man casteth forth a word at a venture, and peradventure truly than he is aware. For want of a proper term to express the Latine [Omen] all translators hitherto, French, Italian, and English, have been put to their shifts, and help themselves with [Presage.] Which in mine opinion is not appropriate to the thing, but common: in comprising other tokens; of birds, whether they be auguria or auspicia; of beasts inwards, of lightning and the rest (or rather implying divination), the first denoting by those signs, yes, and extendeth to the fore-giving of the mind. Wherein that other word [Omen] is very significant, and in analogie equivalent to [Omen]. I marvel much therefore, why it is thought either strange and new (seeing it is English, used no doubt commonly in times past, and at this day current in the North parts, where the people heere are more observant of such presages) rather than many other forrain words, brought into our language, and ranged with the English: or why it should be condemned as abstruse and not pleasing to the ear, more than tem in Greek, which commonly betokeneth (a voice) and more properly in Plato (as Eudemus hath well observed) is taken for [Omen] like as tem for ominari, & tem for [tem] as Eusebius noteth upon Homer, Iliad, 2. From whence, who seeth not that [Omen and Ooming both] are derived? The word then being not basely born, but descended from the mother of all learning, the Greek tongue, and enfranchised in this Island time out of mind (howsoever it hath been confused into the North) would not be exiled clean, but rather reduced and received for a free denizen, quasi possimio.

C. Valerius having heard [The great clerks and deep divines; those also were profoundly seen in the common law, gave it forth. That seeing the two ordinary Consuls (Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, and Q. Terentius Spathinus) of that year, were both dead, the one by sickness, the other by the sword, it was not lawful for the other Consul (C. Valerius Maximus) subrogated in the place of the deceased, to hold the assembly general for the election of new Magistrates.] conducted. On this side the Apennine were the Garuli, Lapins, and Hercatani: beyond the Apennine were the Brinians. Against them that had pillaged and ransacked Pisa and Lunus, Q. Mutius made war within the compass of the River Audena: and when he had brought them in subjection, he took from them their arms. For which exploits achieved in France and Liguria under the conduct and happy fortune of the two Consuls, the Senate ordained that there should be publick procession for three daies, and commanded to sacrifice forty greater beasts. And thus verily the tumultuous wars of the French and the Ligurians, which arose in the beginning of the year, were in short time and without any great mastery dashed and appeased.

But now in lieu thereof great care was taken for the Macedonian war, by occasion that Perseus sowed the seeds of debate and quarrel between the Dardanians and the Bastarnians. Besides, the Roman Embassadors who were sent into Macedonia, to see in what terms things there stood, were now returned to Rome, and had brought word, That in Dardania they were up in arms. With them there came also from King Perseus certain Orators to make excuse in his behalf, and to clear him in the action, namely, that the Bastarnians neither were by him sent for nor entred into any execution by his motive. The Senat would neither acquit the King as unguilty, nor yet directly accuse him as culpable in that point. Only they required, that he should be advertised and admonished, to be very well advised and careful to keep that league and accord inviolable, which he would seem to entertain with the Romans.

The Dardanians seeing that the Bastarnians were so far off from departing out of their country (as they well hoped they would) that they endangered them still every day more than other, as bearing themselves bold upon the succours of the Thracians neer neighbours, and the Scordisci; thought it their best course in policy, to adventure upon some hardy enterprise, although it were rash and inconsiderate: whereupon they assembled all in arms, and from every quarter of their country shewed and advanced before the next Town, to the camp of the Bastarnians. Winter time it was, a season of the year which they made choice of, that the Thracians and the Scordisci might be retired home into their own countries: which when they were advertised of, and that there remained none but the Bastarnians alone, they divided their forces in two parts: with the one, to march directly forward and openly to make head against them a front; with the other, to fetch a compass through by-wales and blind forreits, and so to charge upon their back. But before they could wheel about the enemies camp, the battail was begun: wherein the Dardanians had the overthrow, and were driven to put themselves within their City, which was almost twelve miles distant from the camp of the Bastarnians. The conquerors followed the train of victory,

 " For nobleness of parentage by the mothers side, for verities, for wit, for the love and affection of " the Macedonians, Demetrius far surpassed his brother. But for that the father intended even " meant, that whether of his two sons hated the Romans, he should have the crown later him for " recompence, he caused Demetrius to be murdered: for no other crime in the world that could he " laid to his charge, save only that he was entred into amity with the Romans: but Perseus he " made the King, whom he knew that the people of Rome judged more worthy to suffer unjusti" fication than to inherit a Kingdom. And this Perseus, what other thing hath he done else after his " fathers decease, but made preparation for war: First and foremost, he procured the Bastarnians to
 " the terror of all the world, for to invade Dardania; who if they had settled there, Greeks should " have had more troublesome neighbors of them than Asia hath of the Galatians. And albeit he " was disappointed of this hope, yet he gave not over to design and plot for war: nay, if we will " speak a truth, he hath already begun the war. Dolops he hath subdued by force of arms: & could " not abide to hear that the determination of certain provinces which were debatable and lit-
 " gious, should be referred to the award of the people of Rome. From thence having passed over " the mountain Oeta, that all upon a sudden he might shew himself in the very heart of Greece,
 " he ascended up to Pelops. And to what end; think ye, hath he taken this diswonted yage and " unaccustomed expedition? After this he made his progress all over Thessaly: And what did he " do, but to terrify and awe all of them, whom he hated in his heart? I fear me so much the more this " manner of dealing, and that it is a bait to catch them withal. Then, forsooth, he sendeth his letters " unto us, with a goodly shew of a bon present, and willet us to think upon how to prevent " from henceforth, that we never had need again of the like bounty of his. What is that, but to " amul and repeal that edict of ours, wherein the Macedonians are debarred from sitting forth with" in Peloponnesus? and to bring about, that we may have again the Kings Embassadors to come " unto us, that we may entertain mutual hospitality between their Princes and ours: and upon
 " after see the Macedonian armies, yea, and the King also in person to cross from Daphn (for a small " arm of the Sea lieth between) straight over into Peloponnesus; and finally, that we bind and com" bine with the Macedonians, when they shall take arms against the Romans? As for me, this is " mine advice, to make no new ordinance, but to let all alone in their entire order, as they now " stand, until such time as we are come to some certain terms. Whether we have cause to be afraid,
 " or fear only our own shadows? If the league shall continue firm and sure between the Romans &
 " the Macedonians, then may we have intercourse of friendship, of commerce and traffick with " them. But for this present to think & consider hereof, in my simple judgment is a nice and tick" lish point, & besides, out of season, untimely, and somewhat with the soonest. When he had thus " said, Arco brother to Xenarchus the Pretor discoursed in this manner following: " Callistratus
 " (qd. he) hath caused both me and all of us besides, who are of contrary opinion to him, for to find " the more difficulty in speaking our minds to the cause in question. For whilst in maintenance " of the association which we have with the Romans, he saith that it is disturbed and troubled,
 " (albeit there be no man about either to disturb or trouble it), he hath wrought cunningly and
 " contrived, that whosoever seemeth to gain say him, may be thought to oppose and set himself " against the Romans. In the first place, as if he had been a man, not conversing here among us, but " one come from the Senat of Rome, or some inward secretary and of the privy counsel to the Kk.
 " he knoweth forsooth, and uttereth all that in great secrecy hath been done. Nay, he foretelleth
 " like a wise man, what would have ensued, in case Philip had lived longer: & namely, how it came " about, that Perseus thus inherited the crown: what the Macedonian designs are; and what the " Romans intend to do. But we, who know neither for what cause, nor in what manner Demetrius
 " came by his death, nor yet what Philip meant to have done if he had lived still, must accommo-
 " dat & frame our counsel to those occurrences which have openly passed in the view of the world.
 " We take knowledge, that Perseus, after he was invested in his throne and crowned King, re" ed to the Roman Embassadors; and we know likewise that he was initiated by the people of " Rome with the style of (King Perseus). We hear besides, that Roman Embassadors came to the " King, and were by him well received and graciously entertained. If I have any judgment, these
 " be all signs of peace and not of war, neither can the Romans take offence, if, as we followed them " when they bare arms, so we follow them now likewise, as the authors of peace. And verily I see " no reason why we alone of all other Greeks, should make so mortal and irreparable war against
 " the

" Servius, as some think.

The Oration
 of Archo.

The Oration of Archo.

1 The veins of Perseus. What is it become? We are to beer into the Macedonians, and by this 2 vicinity expecteth all dangers from thence? or that we are the weaker of all the nations? No 3 the Dolopians, whom Perseus of late hath subdued? Nay, Two, it is far otherwise and I fear one 4 trusty, Sure enough we are for my parts they shall do us in regard either of our own forces (Which 5 the Gods of their good will have vouchsafed us) or of the distance of places far remove. But 6 for a case we be as much subject as the Thessalians and Erolians: Say we are of no more credit and 7 authority among the Romans (albeit we have been always their allies and friends) than the 8 Erolians be, who were their open enemies till the other day: Then, what right, what privilege 9 and comarage the Erolians, the Thessalians, the Epivots, and in one word, all Greece herself 10 have and use with the Macedonians, we also may have and hold the same. How is it then, that we 11 some like cursed and damned creatures, should thus practise to abandon the common law of 12 men, and (as it were) renounce all human society. Be it that Philip (when time was) did some 13 what, and gave us just cause, armed as he was and ever warring upon us, to pass this decree and 14 edict against him: what hath Perseus deserved? Perseus (I say) the new King, a harmless Prince that 15 never did us injury; nay, who is willing and seeketh by counterfeits and good things to cancel and 16 raze out all former quarrels and enmities of his father? why are we the only enemies that he 17 hath in the world? And yet I might tell well & truly say, that from the former Kings of Mac-18 dony we have received so great favors and benefits, that in regard thereof, we should put up and for-19 get the wrongs of Philip alone (if haply he have done us any) at least will now after he is dead 20 and his head laid, indeed, at what time as the Roman fleet rid in the harbor of Cenchrea, and the 21 Consul lay encamped with his army before Elania, we sat in counsel three daies together, deba-22 ting and devising, Whether we should band with the Romans or side with Philip. And albeit the 23 present fear of the Romans before our eyes, might have made us in our opinions to incline 24 somewhat and lean toward them: yet there was something in it doubtless, that it was so long ere 25 we could resolve: and to say a truth, it was the ancient acquaintance and amity that we had with 26 the Macedonians, and the great benefits which in old time we had received from their Kings.
 27 Why then, me thinks, those self same regards should be of some force and efficacy to move us. If 28 not to be their special and best friends, yet at least will not to be their principal and greatest ene-29 mies. Let us not, Callicrates, make semblance and shew of that which we are not in hand with-30 all, and is no point of this present question. There is no motive made of a new society: there is 31 no person about to draw any capitulations of a new alliance. Wherein we should rashly enwrap 32 and encangle our selves, and be tied to any inconvenience. Only let there be a mutual commerce 33 between us, and an alternative intercourse of yielding and demanding right to and fro, as ap-34 pertaineth: let us not by interdicting and forbidding them to enter and tarry within our coun-35 try, debar our selves likewise from all negotiation and dealing with them in their Kingdom: that 36 by this means our selves may have no place of retreat and refuge to flee unto. And what pre-37 judice is this to the Roman confederacy? Wherefore make we this of a small thing and evident, so 38 great a matter and suspicious? Wherefore raise we such troubles of nothing? Wherefore seek we to 39 draw others into jealousy and hatred with the Romans, and all this to find means of courting & 40 flattering them? If there will be war, Perseus (ye may be sure) maketh no doubt but that we also 41 together will follow the Romans: yet so long as the peace holdeth, let us ease and suspend wa in some 42 sort our malice and hatred for the while; if ended for ever it may not be. When the same men 43 who had consented to the Kings letters before, gave their accord now also to this proposal, the 44 chief and principal persons among them took great indignation and disdain that Perseus should 45 seem to demand and obtain that by a few lines in writing, which he deemed was not worth the 46 sending an embassage. Whereupon the time was deferred and no decree passed at this Session. Af-47 terwards were Embassadors addressed unto them from the King, at what time as a Diet was hold-48 den in Megalopolis: but the side which was for the Romans, and feared to give them occasion of 49 displeasure and offence, did what they could to debar them of access and entrance into the Coun-50 cel. And much about this time, by reason of these jars the Erolians grew enraged among them-51 selves, and by discharging their mutual fury in killing one another, had like to have brought the 52 state to a final ruin and desolation. But being weary thereof, they in the end as well of the one side 53 as the other, sent their Embassadors to Rome, and also laboured at home to have the quarrel taken 54 up, and to be made friends and reconciled together. Howbeit this was rolled by a new mischief 55 that came between, which also rubbed the former galls and fretted the old sores. For whereas cer-56 tain Hypocrites, exiled persons, and being of the nation of Proetus were promised liberty to re-57 turn home again into their country, with safe conduct also granted by Emilius: one of the chief & 58 principal men of the City (so it was, that somecore of them, men of mark and quality whom to 59 meet upon the way as they returned, Emilius himself went out with the multitude) after they 60 had been friendly received with courteous greetings, salutations, and shaking of hands, had no 61 sooner entered within the gate of the City, but they were massacred notwithstanding they pleaded 62 the former promise of protection, and called the Gods to witness, but all in vain. By this occasion 63 the civil war between them waxed much hotter than before, and turned in the end to a light fire.
 64 Now discharged C. Valerius Laevinus, Publius Pulcher, L. Mummius, M. Popilius, and L. Cani- 65 nius sent from the Senate of Rome, before these commissioners the Embassadors from both fac-66 tions appeared at Delphi, and debated the matter with great earnestness and vehemency where Per- 67 seus seemed to have the better hand as well in sight of the cause, as through his eloquent tongue.

Proculus (I say) who within few daies after drank a cup of poison of his wives compulsion, whereof he died: & she condemned therefore departed into exile. The like madness haunted the Caudians also & distracted them with intestine dissension. But upon the coming of Q. Marcius the Lieutenant General, who was sent accompanied with a fleet of ten sail, to appease their debates, they fell to some terms of peace and attonement. There had been a truce also before of six months but afterwards the war flamed out much more terrible. The Lyicians likewise at the same time were infected & plagued with war by the Rhodians. But my meaning is not, neither is it any part of my purpose, to describe the wars of forain nations, nor to discourse of the circumstances how to proceed for enough I have to do, & more than I can wel discharge, to write the acts only of the people of Rome.

The Celtiberians in Spain, who being tamed by force of arms, had submitted to I. Gracchus, remained quiet all the time that M. Titinius the Pretor continued there in government. But immediately upon the arrival of Ap. Claudius they revolted and began to shew themselves in open action of rebellion, by giving a suddain assault upon the Roman camp. It was about the break of day, when the sentinels upon the rampier and Corps de guard about the gates, might discover enemies coming a far off and so they gave the alarm. Ap. Claudius having put out the signal of battail & in few words exhorted his souldiers to fight and play the men, led them forth at three gates at once. The Celtiberians made head and opposed their forces as they issued forth. At the first the skirmish was equal on both parts: for that by reason of the streights of the passage, all the Romans could not fight: but after that one had put forward another, and followed still apace, they were all at length gotten without the trench, so as they were able now to display their battailions: & to confront their enemies from one point of their battail to the other, wherewith before they were environed: and then they made so forcible a fall upon them, that the Celtiberians were not able to endure their violence. For before the second hour of the day, they were discomfited and 5000 of them either died in the place, or yielded their bodies prisoners: 34 military ensignes they lost and were turned out of the camp the same day and here is an end of that war. For as many as escaped the conflict gar them home to their own towns & quietly afterwards bare the yoke of subjection.

That year were created Censors, Q. Fulvius Flaccus & A. Posthumius Albinus: who made a review of Senators and chose new. For President of the Senat they elected M. Aemilius Lepidus the Archbishop. Nine they put out of the Senat-house. The principal persons noted and disgraced, were these, M. Corn. Maluginensis, who two years before had been Pretor in Spain; L. Corn. Scipio, Pretor for the time being, and L. chief Justice of the common pleas, as well among citizens as aliens; and L. Fulvius, who was whole brother to the Censor himself, & as P. Antius reporteth, equal in degree of calling, and his fellow every way. The Consuls also after they had made their vows within the Capitol, went forth to their Provinces. The one of them, (to wit, M. Aemilius) had in charge given him by the Senat to appease the sedition of the Padoans in Venice, who as their Embassadors made report, by factious siding and part-taking, were all on a fire with civil war.

The Embassadors who were gone into Asolia for to pacify the like troubles, brought word back, That it was not possible to bridle and refrain the furious rage of that nation. But the coming of the Consul made all whole among the Padoans and cured the malady: who having nothing else to do in the province, returned to Rome.

These Censors were the first that caused the streets of Rome to be paved with hard flint and pebble stone within the City: and the high waies and canseys without to be raised with gravel & the sides therof to be wel banked and kept in reparations: also bridges to be made in divers places: a scaffold besides for the Ediles and Pretors to behold the games & p aies. Moreover the barriers in the race, from whence the horses begin to run, and the Ouales to mark and score up the number of courses. * * * Over and besides the goles beyond * * * the iron gates and cages * * * and at the feasts in the mount Albane for the Consuls. They took order besides all this for the paving with flint of the cliff or descent from the Capitol and from the gallery or porch before the temple of Saturn looking toward the Capitol, unto the place called Senaculum, and the court Hofilia above it. Also the merchants Hall or burse without the gate Tergemina they paved with stone, and fenced it about with strong stakes and posts of wood. The gallery also Aemilia they caused to be repaired: and made an ascent by stairs from the Tyber to the burse, or merchants Hall aforesaid. Without the same gate also, they paved with pebble stone the gallery or walking place into the Aventine * * * from the Temple of Venus. The same Censors bargained for the making of walls about Calatia and Oxyrum: and having made sale of some publick edifices there, they employed the mony raised therof, in making of shops & stalls round about both the market places. The one of them, that is to say, M. Fulvius, (for Posthumius said plainly, that unless it were by venue either of an act of the Senat, or grant of the people of Rome, he would put forth no works to be made with dispenfe of their money) agreed upon a price for the building of a Temple to Jupiter at Pisaurum & at Fundis: also make a conduit, for water to be conveighed to Rossantia, and at Pisaurum for a way to be paved, and Sinuessæ * * * In these colonies he caused also a sink or vault to be made about them, to carry away all filthiness into the river: also the market place to be enclosed with porches, galleries, and shops; and three stately halls called Iani, with quarrefours or four thoroughfares, and as many fronts. For these works, one of the Consuls disbursed the money, and bargained with the Publicans and undertakers. In which regard, the inhabitants of those colonies above named, gave him great thanks. These Censors were likewise severe and precise in exercising their office for the redressing and reformation of mens manners: for many Gentlemen had their houses of service taken from them, which were allowed them by the City.

A little before the years end, there was a solemn procession holden one whole day for the happy achievement of the affairs in Spain, under the conduct and good fortune of Appius Claudius the Pro-consul: and twenty head of great beasts were killed in sacrifice. And the morrow after they went in another procession with supplications, at the Temples of Ceres, Liber, and Libera: for that there was reported from the Sabines country, a mighty earthquake, which over-turned many houses.

After that, App. Claudius was returned out of Spain to Rome, the Senat ordained, that he should enter the City with the pomp of an Ovation. And now approached the time for the election of new Consuls. Much ado there was and hard hold at this assembly, by reason of the multitude of competitors: but in the end, L. Posthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lanus were elected Consuls. At which done, the Pretors also were created, to wit, Cn. Fabius Buteo, M. Marienus, C. Cicereius, M. Fur. Crassipes, A. Attilius Serranus, & C. Cluvius Saxula, these three last rehearied, the second time.

This business and solemnity finished, App. Claudius came entering with Ovant pomp into the City for his victory of the Celtiberians, brought into the common treasury 10000 pound weight of silver, and 5000 of gold. Cn. Cornelius was consecrated the Flamin of Jupiter.

The same year there was set up a painted Table in the Temple of the goddess Minerva with this inscription, Under the conduct and happy government of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, Consul, the legions and army of the people of Rome, subdued Sardinia. In which Province, there were slain and taken prisoners 80000 enemies, which Gracchus (after he had managed the affairs of state most fortunately, delivered many captives out of bondage, and recovered the tributes and customs to the Common-wealth) brought home with him his army safe and sound, charged with an exceeding rich booty, and reentered the City of Rome, in a second triumph. In memorial of which exploit, he caused this table to be set up as a present in the honour of Jupiter.

Now this table contained the portraiture of the Iland Sardinia, and the picture also and resemblance of sundry battails. Moreover, in this year were represented to the people certain pastimes and shews of sword-players, whereof some were small and of no account: but one above the rest, exhibited by T. Flaminius, surpassed. And this he did in honour of his father deceased: with a dole of flesh among the people, a great publick feast besides, and stage-plays for four dayes together. But the principal matter in this festival solemnity, was this, That in three daies space there fought at utterance with unprepared swords, threescore and fourteen champions,

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the two and fortieth Book.

Fulvius Flaccus the Censor uncovered the roof of the Church of Juno Lacinia, which was set on fire with matter, and all to cover a Temple which he had dedicated. But by an act of the Senat he was forced to bestow the seat there again. Eumenes the King of Asia complained in the Senat, of Perseus King of Macedonia. His injuries done to the people of Rome are here reported: for the which, defiance was sent, and war proclaimed against him. P. Licinius Crassus the Consul, unto whom the Province of Macedonia was assigned, passed over thither, and in certain light expeditions, fought sundry battails with Perseus in Thessaly, all by horse-service: but with bad success. The Senat appointed a day of bearing between Macedonia and the Carthaginians, touching the territory in question. Ambassadors were sent to the affected Cities and States, and to the confederate Kings, to request them to continue loyal and fast in friendship, by reason that the Rhodians stood in doubtful terms. The Censors took a review and numbered the citizens of Rome, wherein were enrolled in the subsidy book 257231. Moreover, that book contained the famous exploits against the Islanders of Corfica and the Ligurians.

The two and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

After that L. Posthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lanus the Consuls had before all other things proposed unto the Senat as touching the government of the Provinces & conduct of the armies, ordained it was, that Liguria should be the charge as well of the one, of them as the other. Also that both of them should levy new legions, (and two a peece they were allowed to have) therewith to defend the said province and keep it in obedience, besides 1000 footmen and 200 horse of Lanine allies. Moreover, to enrol 3000 foot, and 200 horse of Romans for a supply in Spain. Last of all, commanded they were to press 1500 footmen and 200 horse of Roman citizens: with which strength, that Pretor, unto whom Sardinia fell, should pishover into Corfica, there to war, and M. Anilius the old Pretor, in mean time to see unto the government of Sardinia. This done, the Pretors went to cast lots for their provinces. A. Anilius had the place of Lord chief justice, within the City, and C. Cluvius Saxula the jurisdiction between

Before that these Magistrates took their journey, the Senat was advised that D. Brutus the Consul should go into Campania, for to hunt out the City-lanes apart from the grounds of private persons: for that it was seen and known, that particular men setting out their houses and encroaching by little and little upon the Commons, in process of time held a great part of it in their own possession. This Col. was angry and offended with the Praetors for that upon a time when he went thither amongst them (in quality then of a private person) he often acceded in the temple of Fortuna, they did him no honor neither in publicke nor private. Whereupon, before he departed from Rome, he addressed his letters before him to Franciscus, that the chief Magistrate should come and meet him upon the way, provide him a lodging at their Cities charges, and at his departure from thence, to see that there were sumpter horses and beasts of carriage ready for him. Now before this mans Consulship, the Magistrates of Rome had never been chargeable to their allies, nor put them to cost for any thing whatsoever: and therefore allowed they were from the City their mules: let out they were with tents and pavilions, and all other furniture and provision for the wars, to the end that they should not lay upon the allies any such burden. Private lodging they had in friends houses, which they entertained courteously & liberally with reciprocal hospitality. For as Rome likewise their houses were open to receive those hosts of theirs, with whom they were wont before to have kind usage, and who had bidden them welcome. In like manner Embassadours (if they were sent by chance to any place of a suddain) imposed upon the towns & cities through which they were to pass, one sumpter horse only to farther expence were no allies put for any Roman Magistrates. This revenge of the Consul for a discourtesy offered, due & just though it were, yet not to have been exercised during his magistracy) and the silence of the Praetors (proceeding either of too much modesty or over-great fear) gave occasion to the magistrates ever since to take it for a privilege and custome to do the semblable, yea, and to charge their allies with more grievous impositions every day than other in the same kind, as if the precedent example had been approved.

In the beginning of this year, the Embassadors who had been sent into Etolia and Macedonia, made report, That they might not come to the speech of K. Perseus, for that some said he was absent: others, that he was sick: and the one as false, as the other was untrue: howbeit, they might evidently perceive and see, that preparation was made for war, and that he would delay no longer, but enter into arms. In like sort they related, that in Etolia the civil disention and sedition grew daily more and more, neither could the rapraids of these furious disorders be repressed and held in awe by their countenance and authority.

As the Consul Romulus was troubled upon the continual vexation of the Macedonian war, before any enterprise thereof begun, thought good it was and requisite, that order first should be taken for the expiation of prodigies and the pacification of the Gods, by way of humbly prayers, such as were represented and delivered unto them out of the fatal books of Sibylla. For at Lanuvium were seen, as the common voice went, certain shews and resemblances of a mighty great navy. Item, At Priverum there grew black wooll out of the earth. Also in the Veientian territory, peera Fontaine called Remensis it rained stones. Moreover, all the countrey Romprimum was so small, with clouds of Locusts, and within the Land of Gallia, there were seen certain fishes to leap from under the plow of earth, that were turned with the plow as it took stich and made furrow. For these strange and fearful sights, the foresaid books were looked into and perused, and out of them the Decemvirs declared and pronounced both unto what Gods sacrifice should be offered, and what beasts were to be slain: moreover, that the one supplication should be holden, as propitiatory for those prodigious tokens, as also the other, which the year before had been vowed for the health of the people, should now be performed, and holidays kept therefore. So the sacrifices were accomplished according to the order and form set down in writing by the Decemvirs.

The very same year was the Church of Juno Lavinia dedicated, upon this occasion: Q. Fulvius Placens the Censor was building of a temple to Fortuna aquefusa, which he had vowed during the war against the Celtiberians, when he was Lord Praetor in Spain. His desire and earnest endeavor was to restrain himself, that there might not be in Rome a temple of more state and magnificence than this. And supposing that it would be a great beauty and ornament unto it, in case the roof were covered with tiles of marble: he went into the Brutians countrey, & there he was so bold with the Church above said of Juno Lavinia, as to untile the one half thereof, making full account, that so much would serve for to cover that temple which he was a building. But Santi Roges he had ready for to receive and carry away the said tiles or slates, without being impeached or troubled for this fact, edgy by the allies, whom he held in awe and frightened by his Censorship authority. Now after the Censor was returned to Rome, those marble slates were disbacked out of the foresaid vessels, and conveyed to the temple. And albeit no words were made from whence any name, yet conceived it could not be, who he upon so le much mattering in the Senat, and from all parts thereof they called hard upon the Censors to have the matter put to question and debated of. The Censor was sent for, who was no sooner entered into the Senat, but both in general, & also every one in particular had a sting at him, and much more sharply reproached him to his face in those terms, That he could not be content to abuse or violate the most holy and sacred Church in those parts, which neither Purbs nor Sanctus ever offered violence unto: but he should have been in fool

A soul shot, and in manner laid to ruins: The bottom thereof was taken away and gone, the roof left bare and naked, exposed, and open to rain and foul weather, and thereby subject to rot: that he being chosen Consul, for to reform the manners of others, to whom it appertained by his office to see that the Temples were cloth and covered, to call upon, that all publick places be kept wind-tight and water-tight, and in sufficient repair, that he (I say) of all others should range over the Cities of allies & confederat States pulling down their Temples, as he goeth & uncovering the roofs of the sacred edifices, and by demolishing the Churches of the immortal Gods, commit that, which if he did but practise upon the private houses of allies, might seem an unworthy act and a great indignity: and finally, by raising one Temple with the ruin of another, oblige the people of Rome with the very guilt of his own crimes: as if (I will) the immortal Gods were not the same in all places, but that we might borrow and adorn some of them with the spoil of others. Now as it was apparent (before the matter was put to the censure of the Senate) which way the LL. inclined in opinion, it immediately upon the proposing thereof, they all opined and gave one sentence, That order should be taken with the publick works of the City, for the carrying back again of the same sculps to the former Temple, and that certain propitiatory sacrifices should be offered for the pacification of Jove. As for all ceremonies requisite toward the divine service aforesaid, they were with all compliments performed accordingly: but the farmers who had undertaken at a price to carry so many those tiles, brought word that they had landed them in the churchyard, and there left them, because they might not meet with any workman, who could devise with all the skill and cunning he had, how to bestow them as they were laid and couched before.

Ed Of those Praetors who were gone into their Provinces, M. Fabius as he was in his journey toward high Spain, died at Malaga: by the way, and therefore upon intelligence given thereof by the Malitian Embassadors, the Senat ordained that P. Furius and Cn. Servilius, whom so succeed others were to be sent, should cast lots between themselves, whether of them should continue still in government, and have the charge of high Spain. And the lot fell out very well and fit, that the said Furius who had ruled the said province before, should there remain.

The same year, by occasion that a good part of the Ligurians and Gauls territory won by conquest lay void and was not as yet in the tenure and occupation of any man, there passed an Act of the Senat, that it should be divided by the poll. So, A. Atilius the L. chief justice of the City of Rome, by leave of a decree granted out of the Senat, created ten Deputies or commissioners for that purpose, to wit, M. Caelius Lepidus, C. Cassius, T. Egnatius, P. Lartius, C. Firmianus, P. Cornilius Gracchus, Q. and L. both named Apulius, M. Caelius, C. Sulpicius, and C. Manilius. To every Roman citizen they for ever gave a piece, and to the Latino allies three.

About the same time that these affairs passed at Rome, there arrived thither Embassadors out of Asia about their own civil discords and seditions. Likewise there came others from Thessaly, reporting what was doing in Macedonia. For Perseus (casting now in his mind how to compass that war which during his fathers life he deviled and thought upon) endeavoured to draw and win unto him not only all the nations but the cities of Greece, by sending his embassages among them, & promising liberally more than he performed. Howbeit the hearts of the most part were inclined to him and favoured his designs, yea, and much more affectionate than to K. Eumenes, not without reason, but all the States of Greece, and most of the principal personages were obliged unto Eumenes, and in legs it were with him, in regard of many courtesies and gracious favours received at his hands, & that he carried himself so in his own realm, that the cities which were subject unto him, were not willing to change their condition with any of the free States whatsoever. Whereas contrarywise the bruis went that Perseus after his fathers decease, killed his wife with his own hands, and likewise cruelly murdered Apelles, whose ministry and service in former time he had used in taking away the life of his brother Demetrius; for which cause he lived in exile, because Philip made search after him for to have him punished accordingly: him (I say) he murdered after he had sent for him upon his fathers death, and procured him to come unto him, with great promises to recompence him highly for the execution of the foresaid fact. Yet as infamous as he was with these domesticall murders, and for no good part and worthy desert otherwise commendable; he was commonly better regarded of the States of the country than King Eumenes, a Prince so kind and good to his himself, so just and righteous to his subjects, so bounteous and respective to all men; whether it were that they possessed aforesaid with the same and majesty of the Macedonian Kings, despised the rising of this new Kingdom; or that they were desirous of novelties and alterations; or, lastly, that they wished and had a desire that he should make head against the Romans.

Now were not the Thessalians only together by the ears among themselves by reason they were dived so deep in debt, but the Thessalians also: and this pestilent malady as it were by catching and infection, was spread as far as Perthabian. But after that the Senat was advertised that the Thessalians had taken arms, they sent App. Claudius as Embassador to see and appease those troubles: who having rebuked and chastised the Captains of both sides, eased and stricken off a great part of the debt, which grew burdensome and grievous by excessive usury, and that with consent of the most of the creditors, who had thus overcharged their debtors, he parted the payment of the due debt and principal by even portions for certain years. The trouble of state of Perthabian likewise was reduced into good terms of quietnes by the self-same Appius, and after the same order: And at the very same instant Marcellus visited the Thessalians & took knowledge at Dolphi of their troubles and commotions which proceeded from very hostile hearts & minds, enemy-like, & were pursued with which it was: And when he saw that they intended and were about to make a treaty with the Gauls, he would by his counsel have changed the face of the treaty more than the other: but he rejected them in his own words, saying that he would make an end of discord and difference, and bury all that war in perpetual oblivion: whereupon they were reconciled: and this their intemperance was ended with the assistance of mutual interchangeably given: and accorded it was, they should intercalate in the treaty the hostages. From Daphni and that general diet of Ardea, now the seat of the late Perseus, where he had appointed and published a solemn assembly and council of state, he went. Wherein he highly praised and commended the whole nation, for observing so faithfully their promise, whereby they debarred and excluded the Macedonian King out of their confines, he declared evidently and presented to the view of all the world, what mind and heart he had bare to Perseus. And that it might break out the sooner into open war, King Evander wrote to Rome, and brought with him a note or abstract of all the preparation for the war, which with diligent search and enquiry into particulars, he had gathered. Much about the same time, the five Embassadors sent unto Rome for to see into the affairs of Macedony, were commanded to take a voyage as far as Ardea, to renew the old amity with King Perseus. The names of them were these, Q. Fabius, Q. Lutatius, C. C. C. C. C., S. S. S. S. S., M. Cornilius Mammula, and M. Caelius Dentatus. And even then of not much time, there came Embassadors from King Antiochus: and the chief and principal person among them, one Apollonius, was admitted to come into the Senate, where he excused the King his master for many good and just reasons, in that he had not sent his tribute, & made painfully sooth as he ought by the day appointed: but now (he said) that he had brought it all, to the end that the King should be to them beholden for nothing but the respite of time only. And besides, that they were come with a present of certain plate of gold, weighing 50 pound. That the King his petition was, That the society and friendship which had been contracted between his father and them, might be renewed also with him: promising, that if the people of Rome would impose any thing upon him to be done, which were meet to be laid upon a good and faithful ally, he would not fail in his devoir to perform all offices whatsoever. For why, the Senate had so well deserved of him, as when time as he sojournd in Rome, and such courtesy he found among the house of the Roman young Gentlemen: that of all degrees and sorts of men, he was reputed and used more like a King indeed, than an hostage for the time. These Embassadors received a gracious answer, and withal, that the Prior of the City was enjoined to renew the league with Antiochus, which had been concluded with his father. As for the tribute, the treasures of the City received it: and the Censors took all the golden vessels aforesaid, who had the charge to bestow the same in what Temples they thought good. Unto the chief Embassador was sent a present in money, amounting to the sum of one hundred Asseis: who also was allowed as house to lodge in, at his pleasure of free cost: and all his charges were defrayed by the City, during the time that he made abode in Rome. The Embassadors, who had been in Syria, gave this report of him, That he was a man in great favour and highly honoured with the King: and besides, singularly well affected to the people of Rome. Now concerning the affairs of the provinces for that year, thus much as followeth.

C. C. C. C. C. the Prior fought in ranged battail with the enemies in Corfica, wherein 7000 of the Blunders were slain: and 1700 and better taken prisoners. In that conflict the Prior had vowed to build the Chappel of Juno Moneta. After this, was peace granted to the Corfians at their own suit and seeking, but they were compelled to pay to hundred thousand weight of wax. Cicero having thus subdued Corfica, passed from thence over into Sardinia. A field battle was fought in Liguria, within the territory of the Statellars, near the Town Cynipia, for thither assembled a great army of the Ligurians. At first upon the arrival of M. Popilius the Consul they kept close within the walls: but afterwards, seeing the Romans at the point to give assault and to lay battery to the walls, they issued forth of the gates and embattailed themselves. The Consul for his part followed nor to come to hand-fight, the only thing he sought for in threatening to give assault. The conflict continued above 3 hours, and the hope of victory hung in equal balance: N which when the Consul perceived, namely, how the Ligurian ensignes removed not and gave no ground, he commanded his Cavalry to mount on horseback, and to charge with all their force and violence upon their enemies in three several places: many of these horsemen pierced quite through the midst of the battail, and passed so far, that they charged the enemies upon the back as they fought. Whereupon the Ligurians were much terrified, and began to flee from all parts: very few retired back into the City, by reason that the horsemen made head against them that way most: besides, many of the Ligurians were left dead in the place: such was their resolute persistence in fight, killed also they were every where as they fled. Ten thousand (by report) fell upon the edge of the sword, above seven hundred taken prisoners in one place or other, and 82 military ensignes were carried away. And yet was not this victory without effusion of Roman blood: for there died of them not so few as three thousand soldiers, by reason that the foremost of both sides fought so manfully in the forefront, and while they would nor give ground one to the other, were stricken down and slain without mercy. After this battail, the Ligurians rallied themselves into one place, out of all parts where they were scattered in the rout, and seeing that more of their men were lost than left behind (for in all they were not above ten thousand) they yielded simply without any composition, in which good hope they were, that the Consul

A Consul would not deal with by their hands in more rigorous manner than other Generals before him. But he dismissed them all, raised their Towns, sold their bodies & all that they had, and sent letters to the Senat of their exploits of his. Which when M. Minucius the Pretor had read in the Senat, for the other Consul Posthumius was absent, by occasion that he was employed in the survey and visiting of the Lands in Campania, they thought it a very hard and cruel course, that the Scatellats, who only of all the Ligurians had not borne arms against the Romans, who were then assailed first, when as they began not of their own accord to make war, who also put themselves into the protection of the Romans, should be thus rigorously treated, thus torn, dismembred and consumed in most cruel manner: that so many thousands of frisk condition, innocent persons, and imploring the mercy of the Romans, should be thus sold out-right, (a most dangerous example, that never hereafter any one will venture to submit himself again;) and finally, that they should be distracted and carried away into all parts, to live in slavery under them, who having been sometimes professed enemies of the Romans, now enjoy peace and repose. In regard hereof, there passed an act or act of the Senat, that M. Popilius the Consul should pay back the price unto the buyers, and restore the Ligurians to their former liberty: to take order also that their goods (as much as possibly might be recovered) should be rendered unto them: also that armour should be made in that nation with all speed possible, and that the Consul so soon as he had reestablished the Ligurians (upon their submission) in their former estate, should depart out of the Province: forasmuch as the honour of victory consisted not in exercising cruelty upon the poor and afflicted, but in vanquishing the obstinate. But the Consul as he bare himself proud and cruel against the Ligurians, so he shewed as great forwardness and disobedience to the Senat. And having sent away the legions to winter in Pisa, he returned to Rome, carrying a full and angry stomach against the LL, and as spiteful and malicious a mind to the Pretor: where immediately he assembled the Senat in the Temple of Bellona, and rattled up the Pretor in broad and gross terms. For that he, whose part it had been to have moved the Senat for thanksgiving to the immortal Gods, in regard of the happy achievement of the wars, instead thereof passed an act of the Senat against him and in favor of the enemies, for to put him by his victory and to give it away from him to the Ligurians; and finally, being no better than a Pretor, would have had the Consul yielded in manner up into their hands. Whereupon he said that he would be so bold as set a fine on his head: and withal, he required the LL of the Senat to command and ordain, That the arell devised against him might be reversed; and to give order, that the processions which in his absence they ought to have decreed (upon his letters sent of his good success) might now be holden; in consideration first of the honour due to the immortal Gods, and then respectively in some measure for his own desert. But after he was checked by some of the Senators to his face, and that in no milder terms than he had been rebuked in his absence, he went his waies into his Province again, and obtained neither the one nor the other.

The other Consul Posthumius having spent the whole summer in surveying the Lands only, and never so much as seen his own Province, returned to Rome against the general assembly for election, and created Consuls C. Popilius Lenax. Consequently were Pretors elected, to wit, C. Licinius Crassus, M. Junius Pennus, Sp. Læretius, Sp. Cluvius, Cn. Scipius, and C. Memmius, the second time. In that year was holden a review of the City and the number taken of citizens, (when as Q. Fulvius Flaccus and L. Posthumius Albinus were Censors;) wherein were found and enrolled of Roman citizens 209015. The number was somewhat the less, by reason that L. Posthumius the Consul had proclaimed in a publick audience, That no person of those Latine allies, who were to return into their own Cities (by vertue of an edict made when C. Claudius was Consul) should be enrolled into the subsidy book at Rome, but every man in his several City. This Censorship was administered with concord and unity, yea and to the good and profit of the common-weal. What Senators (never they) deposed from their place and dignity; and so many Gentlemen of Rome as they took their Horses from, they made them all no better than contributaries to pay all for and for, yea, and displaced them out of their tribes. And look whomsoever the one of them moved with disgrace and ignominy, he was not relieved nor allowed again by the other. This Fulvius dedicated the Temple of Fortuna equestris, now six years after he had vowed the same in a battle which he fought with the Celtiberians, at what time as he was Pro-consul in Spain: likewise he exhibited the Agon plates for four daies together, and one day in the cirque or shew-place, Corn. Lentulus (a Decemvir for the holy rites and sacrifices) that year died: in whose room was substituted M. Posthumius Albinus. There were such mighty drifts and clouds as it were of locusts, brought suddenly at once by a wind from the Sea into Apulia; that with their swarms they overspread all the fields far and near. For the hindrance of which some vermine consuming the fruits of the earth, Cn. Scipio, Pretor elect, was sent with his full commission of command into Apulia, who assembled a mighty number of people for to gather them up, and employed much time thereabout.

In the beginning of the year ensuing, wherein C. Popilius and M. Albinus were Consuls, the remnant of the debates which arose the year before was set on foot again. The LL of the Senat would have had the matter proposed & debated again touching the Ligurians, and the ordinance of the Senat in that behalf renewed. But, as Albinus the one Consul put up a bilt heretofore, so Popilius the other was an earnest suiter, & besought both his colleague & also the Senat in the behalf of his brother: may he proceeded so far, that he gave the house to understand, in case they went about any such decrees decree prejudicial unto him, he would crosse and repoke the same by which countenance of his he H affrighted his colleague: but the LL. were offended so much the more and formed against both the Consuls, yea, and persisted still in their enterprise. And therefore when it was debated in council as concerning the Provinces, albeit the Consuls made means to be sent into Maedary (the same one war of Perseus was so neer at hand) yet Liguria was assigned to both of them: for the LL. promised and said, That they would not pass a decree for the government of Maedary, unless the case of Papilius were p^oounded, and an act thereof entered. Afterwards when they demanded a warrant to enrol new armies, or at least-wise to levy a supply for making up the old, both the one motion and the other was denied. The Pretors also, who required to have a supplement with them into Spain, had a nay: and namely, M. Junius into the higher province, and P. Lucretius into the latter.

 As for C. Licinius Crassus, to him there fell by lot the jurisdiction within the City over citizens, and I to Cn. Sicinius that other over foreigners. C. Mammius was allotted to Sicily, and Sp. Clavius to Sardinia. The Consuls for these causes being highly offended and angry with the Senate, caused the Latine feasts and holydaies to be published against the very first day that possibly they might, with an intimation that they would go straight into their province, and not attend the managing of any affairs touching the State, but only that which directly pertained to their government.

The Oration
 of Eumenes.

Valerius Antias writeth, that in these Consuls year, Attalus the brother of K. Eumenes came in embassage to Rome, to inform crimmons matter against Perseus, and to give the particulars of the preparation that he made for war. But the Annals of many other writers (more worthy of credit than he) deliver unto us, that K. Eumenes presented himself in proper person: where he was received with such honor, as the people of Rome thought not only meet & agreeable for his defense, K but also fit and surable to their own favours and benefites, which they had in ample manner conferred and in great number heaped upon him. And then he had audience given him in the Senate, where he shewed the cause of his coming to Rome what it was: namely, " (besides a fervent de-
 " fire that he had to see those gods and men by whose grace favour he enjoyed so good estate, as " better he durst not wish) because he gladly would advertise the Senat by word of mouth, to " prevent and withstand the designs of Perseus. And beginning his speech with the platforms and " enterprises of Philip, he recounted withal, how it cost his son Demetrius his life, for that he " stood against the war with the Romans: moreover, how he had caused the whole nation of the " Bastarnians to quit their own countrey where they were born and bred, to the end, that by their " aid he might pass over into Italy: but whiles (qd. he) these matters be projected and cast in his I
 " head, his time was come, and arrested he was by death: but he left his Kingdom to him, whom " he knew to be the most spiteful enemy that the Romans had. And therefore Perseus having re" ceived this war (as a man would say) by way of inheritance left him by his father even toge" ther with the crown and scepter, from the very first day of his reign, doth nought else but enter" tain, foster, and promote the same by all the means and devices that possibly he can. Mighty and " puissant he is besides in number of young, lusty, and able men for service, who during the time of " long peace have sprung up and multiplied exceedingly. In wealth and riches a great potentat he " is, and besides in his flourishing years and the best time of his age, which as it is accompanied " with the very strength and vigor of his body, so his spirit and mind is inured and hardned with " skillfull experience and long practise of martial feats. For from his very infancy nuzzled hath he M " been in the field and camp, conversing ordinarily within the royal tent and pavillion of his fa" ther, acquainted with the wars, not only waged against neighbour nations, but also against the " Romans: and that which more is, employed by his father in many and sundry expeditions and " executions of service. But since that himself entered upon the Kingdom, and swaied the regal scep" ter in his own hand, he hath exploited & accomplished many things with marvellous felicity and " success, which his father Philip before him could never compass and effect, notwithstanding he " tried and assaied all means, as well of open force as secret fraud. To augment this greatness of his,
 " he hath purchased already that authority and reputation in the world, which others hardly in " continuance of long time, and by many favours and ample benefites attain unto: and namely,
 " throughout the States of Greece and Asia, all men reverence his majesty. For what good turns, N " for what pleasures done, for what bounty of his they should thus do and honour him so much,
 " neither see I, neither can I say for certainty: whether it happen by a special gift and fortune that " he hath of his own, or that (which I am my self afraid to speak) it be the deep malice and hatred
 " which he hath conceived against the Romans, which is the cause that he is of that countenance
 " and so gracious among them. Nay, with the very Kings and Princes of other nations he is high" ly esteemed and of passing authority. The daughter of Solemus he hath taken to wife, without " any suit of his own but being earnestly wooed and requested thereunto. And to Prusias he hath " given his own sister in marriage, after much seeking and instant intreaty. These two weddings " were solemnized with the exceeding joy and innumerable presents of infinite embassages: and " who should be present to celebrat the Auspices and complements, yea and give those spouses in O " marriage, but the noblest and most renowned States that were? The Bzotian nation had been " much solicited by Philip, yet could never be induced to draw or pen any covenants of accord
 " and amity with him: but now there is to be seen a league engrossed, yea, and engraven in three " several conspicuous places, the one in Thebes, a second at Sidennus, within a most holy sacred and " renowned Temple, and the third at Delphi. What should I speak of the general Council of the " Achaens? wherein, had not the design been dashed by some there in place, who intimated and " alledged

A "alleged to be the signet and stamp of the Roman, & would have gone very hard, but that he "should have been first written down. But contrary will I assure you my due and deserved "honours (unto whom it is due to say, who of them be more bounden and obliged for private "pleasures or publick benefits) are either forgotte through forgetfull disale and negligence or alle
 "slandered and abolished of wilfull malice, and hostile hatred. As for the Aetolians, who knoweth
 "not, that in his civil broiles, and seditions they sought to Perseus for to relieve and succour, and "not to the Romans? Being thus upheld with societies and amities, he hath provided such store "of arms, and made that preparation for war at home, as he needs none from abroad. Of "himself he is thirty thousand strong in foot & 4000 in horse. For ten years he is stored with corn "and victuals, so as for that kind of providence he may spare his own territories, and also forbear
 "his enemies. As for money in ready coin, he hath such abundance, that over and above the forges
 "of all the Macedonians, he waget 40000 mercenary soldiers, and hath wherewith to make
 "pay for many years besides the yearly culomes & profits that arise out of their Kings mines.
 "Now for armour, he hath gathered together into his arsenals and armories, sufficient to furnish "three hundred armies. What should I speak of the youth and serviceable men of war? Set the case "that Antiochus failed him and were not able to find enough; all Thrace is subject unto him, from "whence he may serve his turn as out of his ever running fountain and living spring. The rest of "his speech he knit up with a exhortation in this manner. "I relate not these things (qd. he) my "Liege Lord, as blown abroad and vented by headlesse heartsay and doubtfull rumors; neither
 "have I been so ready to believe them, as a man desirous that such criminous imputations
 "should be verified upon my enemy; but as undoubted and certain reports upon my own know"ledge, which I have seen by you of special purpose to be a spie: and declared that and no more;
 "C which I had seen with mine eyes and not other wise. Neither would I have left mine own realm
 "wherein (by your meares and goodness) in glorious and magnificent State I sit warm enough,
 "for to sail over so large a sea as I have done and to carry vain tales and untruths to you, thereby to "crack my credit with you for ever hereafter. But I tell you these eies of mine have seen the most "renowned and noblest Cities of Asia and Greece discovering more and more from day to day,
 "what they intend and what their meaning is: who if they be let alone and permitted to run on as "they begin, would be engaged so far, as they might not possibly return again & save themselves
 "by any escape: and behold I have Perseus (I say) how he containeth not within the realm of "Macedony, but one while seizeth upon this by force of arms, another while gaineth and getteth "that by favour and good will, which with violence he could never have conquered. I perceived
 "D and considered well how unquall the match and condition is, whiles he upon you prepareth "war, and you again performe to him security of peace. Although in my conceit, and to far as I "could see into it, he made no more any preparation thereof, but was already upon action and "execution. For he chased Abruptus, a confederat prince and friend of yours, forth of his King"dom. And Artemus, the Illyrian, another of your associates and allies, he killed outright, be"cause he found that he had written some letters unto you. As for Everus & Callistratus, both The"banes, & two principal States of that City, for no other reason, but because in a Parliament of the "Bacians, they had spoken their mind against him too frankly, and avowed that they would re"peat unto you what things had passed, he caused to be murdered. The Bizantines he suc-
 "E courred against the order taken in the accord: upon Dalopia he levied war: Thessaly and Doris
 "both he invaded and overran with his army, to the end, that in some intestine and civil war, by "the help of most parts he might assist and plague the better. He shuffled all together, and made "a very confusion of the state in Thessaly and Perrebia, upon the hope and cancelling all bonds
 "and crossing out all debt books; that thus by a power and multitude of bankrupts, such as were "over-debly engaged, and whom he had obliged and bound to himself, he might depreste and "oppreste the great men and principall personages. Having wrought these practices uncontrolled,
 "whiles you sit still looking on and suffering all, he seeing you to let him do with Greece what he
 "list, making full account, that no man will put him on arms and make head against him, before he
 "be passed over into Italy. How safe this may be to you, nay, how this can stand with credit, (see you
 "F to that and be advised. For my self, I assure you, I thought it meer shame and very villany, that "Perseus your enemy should enter into Italy to make war upon you, before that I your friend and "ally, came to give your warning for to take heed and stand upon your guard. Now since I have "in this matter performed my devoir, done that office which I was bound upon necessity, and in "some measure acquit my self and discharged my bounden duty and obligation of fidelity; what re-
 "maineth bound for me to do, but to be your headsmen to all the gods & goddesses, to vouchsafe
 "you that grace, that you may provide for your own Commonweal, and also for us your friends and "allies, who depend wholly upon you? In this last speech he came next unto the LL. of the Senat.
 "But for the present no man might know any thing, but only that the K. had been in the Senat, so fi-"G tely were they all, to kepe the counsel house close that with secrecy. But after the war was brought "to an end, then came abroad, both what the K. spoke, and what answer was returned to him again.
 "Some few daies after, the Senat set to give audience unto the Embassadors of King Perseus:
 "but having done mind and ears both, pointed storehead by King Eumenes, all the defence that "the Antiochians made, and all the contrary they used, was rejected. Besides, the stoutness used "by Perseus (the principal person of the embassie) moved their patience and exasperated their sto"macks. For he said, that indeed the KK. desire & endeavour was, to be credited and believed in his

Apology and defence, that he neither had said nor done any thing sounding to hostility: many H in tale he perceived and saw, that they came upon him thus, and sought goods, pick-quarrels, and give occasion of war, he would stand upon his guard, and defend himself with a stout and extant courage. For the hazard of the field was common, and the issue of war uncertain. Now, all the Cities of Greece and Asia both, would rather than their lives have known what the Em-bassadors of Perseus, and what Enmenes had done in the Senate: for in regard of his contempt of the states (supposing verily that he would stir coales and make some work) had sent their Em-bassadors to Rome, pretending colourably other matters in semblance; but indeed to listen the news: and among the rest, was the Embassage of the Rhodians; and the chief thereof was one Satyrus, who made no question nor doubt, but that Enmenes had done their errand, and put their City and Perseus together in all their criminall matters laid to his charge. And therefore he made I all the means that possibly he could by the mediation of patrons, friends, and acquaintances, to debate the matter with King Enmenes before the body of the Senate: which when he had obtained, his tongue walked at large, and overbold he was, and too round with the King, in broad invectives and intemperate termes; namely, that he had solicited and stirred up the nation of the Lycians against the Rhodians, and was an heavier friend unto Asiathen Antiochus had been. Which speech of his, as it was plausible enough and pleasing to the States of Asia (for they likewise by this time inclined to affect and favour Perseus) so it was unsavoury altogether, and odious to the Senate; and nothing profitable to themselves and their City. But contrariwise, this banding and conspiracy against Enmenes, won him the more grace and favour among the Romans, so as they did him all they honour they could, gave him most rich and costly presents, and endowed him with a curule chair of estate, and a staffe or scepter, both of ivory.

After these embassages had their dispatch and were dismissed, Harpalus returned into Macedonia in all speed and hast possible, relating unto the King, how he had left the Romans not preparing as yet for war; but so far out with him and so highly offended, that it appeared evidently it would not be long ere they began. And Perseus again for his part, besides that he looked for no other, was well enough pleased therewith, presuming upon the stout and strength of his forces. But above all other he maliced Enmenes most: with whose blood he laid the first foundation of the war: for he suborned one Evander a Candiot and captain under him of certain auxiliary souldiers, and three Macedonians besides (whose service and ministry he had used in the like sort) to murder the King. He gave them letters addressed to one Phaxos an hostesse of his, a folly dame in I Delphi, and of greatest credit and wealth among them. For assured he was, that Enmenes minded to go up to Delphi, there to sacrifice unto Apollon. These traitors together with Evander set forward; and to execute this their designed enterprise, they looked all about and sought for nothing but the opportunity of some place or other. Now, as men ascend from Cartha to the temple, before they come to any place much peopled and frequented with houses, there stood a mound or mud wall on the left hand of the path or way, rising some what higher than the foundations and ground-work; along which wall there was passage for one by one and no more; for on the right hand the earth was broken down and fallen, and breach made of some a good depth. Behind this mound aforesaid, these traitors had hidden themselves, and raised some steps like stairs; to the end that from above, as from the top of a wal, they might discharge their shot upon Enmenes as he M passed by. Before him there marched from the sea, at the first a sort of his friends and followers, together with his guard intermingled one with another; but afterwards as the way grew more streight and narrow, the train waxed thinner. But when they were come to the place where they could not go but by one at once, Pantaleon one of the States and princes of Asia, with whom the King had begun some communication, entered first into the narrow path aforesaid: with that the knaves that lay in wait behind, role up and rolled down two huge stones, wherof the one smote the King upon the head, the other astonished his shoulder. And verily all the rest of his friends and followers, seeing him fall with the blow, fled some one way, some another: only Pantaleon staid behind all, fearlessse, to protect and guard the King. The murderous villaines might have fetcht a short compas about the wall, and soon run to the King to make sure work and dis- N patch him quites; but they supposing they had done the deed already, fled to the pitch of the mount Parnassus, and made such halt, that when one of the companie hindred and staid their running, because he dragged behind and could not keep pace and follow them hard at heels through those steep and blind waies, they made no more ado but killed him out-right, for fear lest if he were taken, he should bewray and disclose the whole treason. The body of the King lay along on the ground: and first his friends came running about him, then his guard and household servants. When they reared him up, they found him stoned with the stroke and altogether senseless in a trance: howbeit, by some heat remaining, and the beating of his heart, they perceived there was some life, but little or no hope they had that he could escape and live. Some there were of his guard and pensioners about him, that made pursuit after these murderers by their tracks: and when they had O held on their chase as far as unto the crest of Parnassus, wearying themselves to no purpose, they gave over and returned as wile as they went. The Macedonians as they had begun an audacious enterprise inconsiderately, so they left it undone as fearfully and without advice. Now by this time was the King come again to himself. And the morrow after, his friends conveyed him to his ship: from thence to Corinth; & from Corinth along the streights Isthmus they brought their vessels, & croised over to Egina: where his cure was carried so close & secret, without admitting

A person to come unto him, that the rumor ran into Alex how he was dead. And Alexander his brother (by your leave) gave good ear thereto. He believed the news sooner then was becoming brotherly love and unity. For he came unto such talk both with his brothers wife, and also with the captain of the castle, as if he had been the undoubted heir and assured inheritor of the crown. All this Eumenes knew full well afterwards: who albeit he purposed to discomble the matter, and to put it up at last with silence, at their first encounter and meeting together, he could not hold, but reproved and reproached his brother, for being so forward and over-hasty to court and wooe his wife. The bruit also was blown to Rome, and a report there was of the death of K. Eumenes.

About the same time C. Valerius was returned out of Greece, who had been sent thither as Embassador to look into the state of the country, to mark also and observe the plots and proceedings of Perseus. He reported all things futable and agreeable to the intelligences given by King Eumenes, and withall, brought with him from Dilphi dame Prote, in whose house those villainous traitors were lodged and harboured: also one L. Raminus a Brundisian, who informed moreover and gave evidence as followeth. This Raminus was one of the principall citizens of Brundisium, and used to lodge and entertain in his house, not only of the Roman captains when they came to town, but also the Embassadors of forreign nations, such as were of greatest mark, and principally those that were sent from any King. By this meanes, acquainted he grew with Perseus, albeit they never had seen one another face. And being invited by the King his letters, wherein he was promised great hope of some neer and inward friendship above others, and consequently of great preferments thereby, he made a journey unto him. Within a short time he was wound into very familiar acquaintance with the King, and drawn into privat conference and discourse of secrets, farther, I wis, then himself was willing or liked of. For the King dealt with him, yea, and importuned him with infinite praises and large behests of rich rewards, that forasmuch as the Roman captains and Embassadors used to take his house for their Inne, he would cause as many of them as he wist for, to be poisoned. Now for that he knew it was a right difficult and dangerous matter to come by such a poison and compass this project, especially if many were party and privy to him: and besides, the event uncertein, either in the effect of the drug it self to be strong, quick and forcible enough to do the feat: or in the secret working thereof, lest it should be found and spied; he would therefore put into his hands such a poison, as neither in the giving, nor after it was given, might be known by any sign whatsoever. Raminus fearing lest if he refused & denied, he should be the first man to make assay and make experiment of the poison, promised so to do, & then departed. But return to Brundisium he would not before he had spoken with C. Valerius the Embassador, who then sojourned (as he heard say) about Chalcis. First unto him he revealed this plot, and by his commandment came along with him to Rome: where being brought into the Senat, after audience given, he laid abroad in every point all that had passed. This new matter, over and besides those which Eumenes had reported, was the cause that Perseus was the sooner taken, for an enemy, and so declared: the rather because they saw him not only about to make open war, war of a princely and royall mind, but also to practise and execute privily all kind of mischief, by way of covert brigandage, theevish stealth, and secret poison. The managing of this war was put off and referred to the new Consuls: howbeit for the present ordained it was, that C. Cicerinus the Pretor who had the jurisdiction between citizens and strangers, should levy and enroll souldiers who being conducted to Brundisium, should with all convenient speed commit to sea, and sail over to Apollonia in Epirus, for to seiz upon the maritime Cities: to the end that the Consul unto whom the Province of Macedonia should be allotted, might arrive there with his vessels in safety, and let his forces on land with ease.

Eumenes, after he had been kept a long while at Egina, during the time of his hard and dangerous cure, so soon as ever he might go safely abroad, went to Pergamus: where, over and besides the old hatred fed in his breast, being pricked also with this fresh and bleeding villany practised by Perseus, he prepared war with all his power to the uttermost: and thither repaired unto him Embassadors from Rome, to testifie their joy for his evasion and escape out of so neer and great a danger.

When the Macedonian war was delayed and put off for one year, and the rest of the Pretors gone already into their provinces, M. Junius and Sp. Lucretius (unto whom befell the government of Spain) after that they had importuned and worried the Senat, in being so long for one thing, obtained at the length a commission for a supply of souldiers to make up the army: by vertue whereof they enrolled 3000 foot, and 150 horse for the legions; and levied 9000 foot and three hundred horse for the army of the allies. These forces were transported into Spain with the new Pretors.

The same year, after that a great part of the Campain territory, which privat persons here and there held in occupation without regard of lawfull title & tenure, was (upon diligent survey made by Postumius the Consul) recovered again for the publick use of the City of Rome; M. Lucretius a Tribune of the Com. preferred a law, that the Censors should let out to farm the Campain lands to tenants for yearly rent. A thing that had not been done for many years after the winning of Capua, namely, that particular men should be so greedy as to encroach thus beyond their bound upon the common wall.

The Macedonian war being now concluded, but not as yet published and proclaimed, whiles the Senat was in doubtful expectation what K.K. would friend them, & who would side with Perseus.

there came to Rome Embassadors from Thrace, bringing with them the King's son, a very H child. The speech they made was to this purpose, That the King their master had made his son to Rome, thereto have his education; so the said King's son was brought up, might from his infancy be acquainted with their manners, and converse with the Romans. His first request to them was, that they would teach him not only the ordinary entertainment and education that private persons afford to their sons, but also to take the charge of public teaching, and as it were the guardianship of him. This request of the King's son was well taken of the Senate; and they pleased them highly. Whereupon they ordered that C. Decimus the Pretor should let out a mansion house with all the furniture, wherein he young Prince and his train might keep their school. The Thracian Embassadors likewise presented themselves before the Senate, to debate their own controversies in their hearing, and withal desired their friendship and aid. They obtained their suit, and besides there was sent unto them by way of present the sum of seven Asces. After a peace Glad were the LL. of the Senate that these States were received into their society; by reason Thrace lyeth hard on the back side of Macedonia; but to the end that they might have perfect intelligence and notice how all things went in Asia and the Islands, they sent thither C. C. C. Nero, and M. Decimus in embassy; whom they commanded also to visit Cyrene and Rhodes; and withall, both to renew the amity, and also to see and observe whether the hearts of those allies had been solicited and tempted by K. Perses.

As the City was thus in doubtfull suspense and expectation of the event of this new war, behold in a twinkling that rose in the night, a certain column or pillar garnished and set out with the beak heads of war ships (which had been erected in the Capitol during the first publick war by K. M. Annius the Consul, who did for his companion in government Serv. Fulvius) was by a clap of thunder and lightning rent and cloven from the very base to the chapter. This was taken for a prodigious token, and report thereof was made to the Senate. The LL. gave order, that the Aruspices should be conferred with about it, and their advice taken: likewise they commanded the Decemvirs to look into their books of Sibylla. The Decemvirs for their part declared, that the City should be purged and hallowed, publick supplications and prayers made to the gods; and greater heaits killed for sacrifice, as well at Rome in the Capitol, as in Campania near the promontory of Minerva. Also that with all convenient speed, there should be plaies solemnly exhibited for rendies together, in the honour of most gracious Jupiter. All this was done with diligence accordingly: but the Aruspices afore said, made answer out of their learning, that this prodigy portended good and signified the advancement of their own territories; together with the destruction of their enemies; for that those beak heads which the storm overthrew, had been the spoils of ships won from the enemies. There happened other occurrences besides to encrease the scrupulous religion & devotion of men: for reported it was, how at Saturnia within the town it rained blood three daies together. Item, at Calatia an ass was foled with three feet; and a bull together with five kine were stricken stark dead with one thunderbolt and flash of lightning. Last of all at Ostium there was a shower of very earth and nothing else. In regard of these wonders also, sacrifices were celebrated, supplications made, and one day kept holiday and all shop windows shut.

Yet were not the Consuls departed into their provinces, because they neither would obey and condescend unto the Senate in proposing the matter as touching Popilius at the comestable; and the LL. were as resolute for their parts to let no decree passe, before that were done. The spite and heart-burning they bare against M. Popilius, grew the more by occasion of his own letters, wherein he wrote and gave them to understand, that being Proconsul, he had now a second time fought with the Statellars in Liguria, and put ten thousand of them to the sword by reason of which hard courses and extremities of war, the other nations likewise of the Ligurians were carried into arms. At which news not only Popilius was blamed behind his back of making war against all law and equity upon them that had yielded, and thereby provoking those who before were quiet, to go out and put themselves in action of rebellion; but the Consuls also were checked to their faces in the Senate, because they let not forward to their charge and government. M. Marius Serrus and Quintus Marcius Scylla, two Tribunes of the Commons, seeing the LL. of the Senate thus drawing all in a line, took heart unto them, and both menaced the Consuls to fine them, unless they made more hast unto their province; and also recited in the Senate a law which they had drawn and framed, and were upon the point to promulge, as touching the forsaide Ligurians who had submitted. The tenor whereof ran in this form, That what person should of Statellars had yielded himself and was not restored to Liberty and freedom before the calends of Septilis now ensuing, the Senate upon their oath should ordaine some speciall Commissioner to make inquisition by whose fraud, covin, and notice he was in villenage and punish the party accordingly. Then by authority and approbation of the Senate they published this for a law. Now before that the Consuls took their journey, The Senate assembled in the Temple of Bellona, in regard and favour of C. C. the Pretor of the former year. Where audience was given him; and after he had declared what exploits he had performed in Cyrene, thereupon demanded triumph: which when he could not obtain, he made no more ado, but rode triumphant in the Alpine hill; for now it was taken up and grown for a custome to go, and aske the authority and the State to leave.

The forsaide law propoled by the Mari the commons with a general consent by their voices granted.

*1 of August.

A question in the Senat, Whom they would have sit upon their Inquisition, according to the form of the said law. And the LL. ordered himself to be the inquisitor. The Senat long and not afore, the Consuls put themselves in their way toward their promise, and received the charge of the sitting from M. Popilius. This Popilius durst not yet return to Rome, for fear he should be called in question and put to his answer before that Proculus and Supremus judge, who had required the advice of the Senat as touching that charge framed and drawn of purpose against him: knowing full well how the Senat was not well affected to him; and the people much more maliciously bent and set against him. But the Tribunes of the Commons thought they would prevent and meet with his flinching of him and absencing himself, by imitation of another act and law provided in that behalf, namely, that if he entered not into the City of Rome before the Ides of November, he should daily following, it should be lawful for C. Licinius to proceed in judgement, and give sentence against him in his absence. This cord towed and held him to Rome with a winch: and when he was returned and entered into the Senat, they were upon his top, and gave him (as a welcome thither), as testified their displeasure and hard conceit of him. After he had been well baited and shaken up among them, an act of Senat was entered in this wise, that many of the Ligurians as had not been enemies, after the time that Q. Fulvius and L. Marcius were Consuls, and that Pretors, C. Licinius and Cn. Sicinius, should restore and establish in their former state of freedom, and that the Consul C. Popilius should let them out of land to occupy and possess beyond the Po. By virtue of this arrest, many a Po were let free and enfranchised, who being transported over the river Po, had land assigned unto them accordingly. Now M. Popilius upon the law Marcia (promulged by the two Marcii Tribunes of the Com.) answered for himself judicially twice before C. Licinius. At the third time, the Pretor overcame with a respective grace and favour, as he Col. a bleat, and the earnest prayers of the whole name and house of the Popilii adjured the defendant to make appearance into the court upon the Ides of March on which day the new magistrates were to enter into their offices: and this he did, because himself by that time should be a private person again & therefore not to sit upon the bench as judge to hear pleas and to determine. Thus the foresaid act as touching the Ligurians, finely shifted and cunningly avoided, came to just nothing.

At that time the Carthaginian Embassadors were at Rome, with Gulussa the son of Masaniassa, between whom hard hold and much debating there was in the Senat. The Carthaginians complained, that over and besides the lands (about which there had been sent commissioners both Rome before time, to view the place and to enquire into the cause) Masaniassa within the last two years and by force and arms possessed himself of more then three score and ten towers and castles within the Carthaginian dominion and territory, and an easie matter was it for him to do so, who made reckoning of nothing, nor had regard of any person; whereas the Carthaginians were so tied and obliged by their capitulations to the good abearing; that they held their peace for, inhibited they were to bear arms without their own country. And albeit they knew assuredly, that they should war within their own confines, if they dispiece the Numidians of those peeces, yet feared they that one express article of the accord, where they were debated in plain terms to wage against the associates of the people of Rome. Howbeit the Carthaginians could no longer endure this pride, cruelty, and avarice. Sent therefore they were unto the Senat as humble orators, that it might please them to grant one of these three requests: to wit, That either they might debate with a different audience before them (being allies to both alike) as touching the right of the one and the other; or that they would permit the Carthaginians to defend themselves by just and lawful arms, against unjust and ungodly force; or else finally (if partiall favour stayed more with them then the truth of the cause) to let down at once what their pleasure was should be given away out of their own, to Masaniassa. For they yet, would have some gage of their hand, and know what they gave; whereas he himself had no stay, nor would ever let to make an end; so unsatiable was his lust and appetite. But in case they might obtain none of these points, and that there could be found any fault or trespass of theirs, committed since the peace granted unto them by Scipio; then, that they rather then any other would chastise them. For rather they had to live in servitude under the signory of Romans with safety, then enjoy such a liberty as should be exposed to the injuries of Masaniassa. And better it were for them to perish and die once for all, then to live and languish under the yoke of a most cruel and bloody butcher. At which words the tears trickled down their cheeks, and down they fell at their feet. Lying thus prostrate upon the ground, as they moved pity and compulsion to themselves, so they procured despite and malice against the King. Then thought good it was to demand of Gulussa what he had to answer as touching these matters? or else (if he had so rather himself) to declare before, for what cause and upon what occasion he was come to Rome. Gulussa made answer, that either it was easy for him to deal in those points, whereof he had no commission from his father, nor for his father, to give him any such charge, considering that the Carthaginians, shewed not unto him of what business they would treat, nor yet made him so much as privy of their coming to Rome. This only was known, that there was a close counsel holden for certain nights, by the principal Seates of Carthage within the Temple of Esculapion, from whence Embassadors were dispatched to Rome, with hidden messages. And this was the cause that his father had sent him to Rome, to beseech the Senat not to give credit to the slanderous accusations, that should be preferred against him by those that were common enemies as well to him as his: who hated him for no other cause but for that he had continued so constant in his fealty and allegiance to the people of Rome. The Senate, not thus having heard what they would say of both sides, let in council as touching the demands of the Carthaginians: and at length commended this answer to be returned, how their advice and pleasure was; that Galea should presently depart and go into Numidia and give his father to understand from them, that with all speed he send his Embassadors to the Senat, as concerning those complaints which the Carthaginians had made of him: also to give instruction and knowledge unto the Carthaginians, that they repair likewise thither to debate their controversies & differences between them. And if it lay in their power to effect ought for the honor of Magonia, they would be as willing to do it hereafter, as they had been ready heretofore. Mary, to minister justice for favour and affection; that they would not do it in any wise. Willing they were, that every man should know and hold his own, and keep him within compasse; neither minded they to set out new limits, but to observe the old bounds. Indeed they had granted to the Carthaginians, after they were conquered, both towns to inhabit; and territories to possess, not to this end, that in time of peace they should pluck that away by wrong and outrage, which during the wars they could not take from them by martial law and force of arms. Thus was the young prince, together with the Carthaginians, dismissed. Pretents were given both to the one and the other, according to the order; and other courtesies of hospitality were friendly offered.

Much about the same time Cn. Servilius Cæpio, App. Claudius Cæcia, and T. Annius Lælius, Embassadors sent into Macedony, for to demand amends and restitution, and withall to disclaim and renounce the Kings amity, returned to Rome. Who having related in order what they had seen and heard, inflamed the Senat more against Perseus, who were already of themselves enkindled enough. They made report, "That through all the cities of Macedony they saw preparation for war in all forcible manner; that when they came to the court, for many daies they could find no means of access to the speech of the King; and in the end, after they were departed from thence homeward (as being past all hope of parley with him) then and not afore, they were called back again out of their way, and so brought unto his presence: that the sum of their embassy and speech unto him was this, namely, to put him in mind of the league first contracted with Philip, & afterwards renned with himself since the death of his father; wherein by express words he was inhibited to bear arms without his own frontiers, and likewise debared to levy war upon any confederat allies of the people of Rome: after this, that they had recounted and laid abroad from point to point those specialties, which they themselves had lately heard King Perseus to declare and discourse, which were all apparent truths, upon his own assured knowledge. Moreover, that the King held a secret council for many daies together, with the Embassadors of the Cities of Asia: in regard of which injuries, that the Senat thought it reason and equity that he should make satisfaction, yea, and restore back both to them and also to their associates, whatsoever he held contrary to right, contained in the accord. That the King hereupon at the first fell into a fit of choler and indignation and gave them hard terms, reproaching at every other word the Romans for their covetousness and insolency. And as for their Embassadors that came unto him one after another, he said they were but spies, to listen and see what he did or said; & no marvel, for they thought it meet that he should conform and frame himself in all his words and deeds, according to their beck and commandment. At the last, when he had in this wise discharged his choler with high words & broad speeches for a long time, that he commanded them to repair again unto him the next morrow, for that he would give them their answer in writing: and then he delivered unto them a script to this effect as followeth. First, as touching the accord & covenant concluded with my father, that is nothing to me at all. If I suffer it to be renewed, it was not for any liking or approbation thereof, but because I being new come to the crown, and lately possessed of the Kingdom, I was to bear and endure all things whatsoever. But in case they will enter into a new league with me, requisite it is that a treaty and agreement passe first of the conditions. And if they could be content that a covenant were drawn with equall and indifferent capitulations, yet I will sleep upon it and be well advised what to do for the best, as I doubt not but they likewise will have a good regard to the profit of the commonweal. And herewith, that he suddenly flung away from them, and we all began to avoid out of the palace. Whereupon we proceeded according to our commission to abandon and disavow his amity and society. At which word of ours, he stayed in great wrath and fury, and with a loud and shrill voice, warned us upon our own perill and hazard, to be gone out of the matches of his realm within three daies: finally, in this manner we departed and put our selves in our journey, and found neither friendly welcome at our first coming, nor any courteous entertainment while we were there, nor yet a kind farewell at our departure. When they had once done, the Thessalian and Ætolian Embassadors had audience.

The Senat, to the end that they might know out of hand, what captains and commanders the commonweal was to employ, thought good to write unto the Consuls, that the one or other of them (who first might) should repair to Rome for the creation of new magistrats. And no great matter to speak of, as concerning the state; was that year done by the Consuls. But more expedient it was thought for the commonweal, to suppress and appease the Ligurians, whose blood was up and chafed against them, considering that the Macedonian war was in daily expectation.

Moreover, the Embassadors of Asia gave occasion, that Senatus also King of Illyria was in jealousie: who at one time both complained of him, that now twice he had waited to their

A their country: and also made report, how the Macedonian and Illyrian Kings were all ones, and so great together, that with some conflict and common consent they prepared to war upon the Romans: finally, that the Illyrians were now at Rome in great and comfortable embassage, but in dead and very truth, no better than spies, addressed on purpose by the motion and advice of Asinus, so hearken and learn, whereabout they went at Rome. These Illyrians were sent for into the Senat house, and when they had said, that they were employed in embassage from King Orestes, up and wex unto those accusations which it might be the means framed against him: it was again demanded of them, how it happened that they went not directly nor shewed themselves in such sort to the magistrat, that according to the manner and customs, they might have had their lodging provided and presents given them, with the ordinary allowance of the City, than for their coming during their abode, that thereby knowledge might have been taken as well of their coming, as also of their business and errand? But being taken tripping and failing in their answer, they were commanded to void out of the Council-chamber. For thought it was not meet, to give them their dispatch as Embassadors, since they made no means to present themselves unto the Senat: but rather they were of advice, to dispatch Embassadors of their own to the King, to signify unto him, what of his associates had complained unto the Senat, how he had burnt their villages within their territories: yes, and to tell you it plainly, that it was not well done of him, that he could not forbear but do wrong to his own allies. In this embassie were sent, M. Terentius Varro, C. Platorius, and C. Cretarius.

Likewise those Embassadors, whose commission was visit the associate Kings, returned out of Asia, and reported that in the said Asia they had communication with Eumenes in Syria with Antiochus, and in Alexandria with Ptolemaeus who all of them had been solicited by sundry embassies of Perseus, howbeit they persisted firm and fast in their professed fealty, and promised to perform whatsoever the people of Rome would command them. Also that they went to the confederat States, whom they found true and loiall enough, excepting the Rhodians only, whom they perceived to be flouting & wavering, as altogether infected & poisoned with the counsel of Perseus.

Now were the Rhodian Embassadors come to answer those things which they knew were commonly bruited abroad touching their City: howbeit the Senat was not of mind to give them audience, before the new Consuls entered into their office. But they were all of advice to delay no longer the preparation for war. C. Licinius the Pretor had in charge, out of the old Quinquagremes which were laid up in the docks and harbors, to repair as many as might serve at sea: to rig also and prepare a fleet of 30 sail. But if he could not come to make up that full number, then

D to write unto his colleague C. Memmius in Sicily, for to repair, calk and trim those ships which were in Sicily, that with all speed possible they might be sent to Brundisium. The said Pretor C. Licinius was commanded to enroll of Roman citizens (and those, Libertines, such as of bondmen born, had been enfranchised) for mariners and sailors, as many as might serve 25 ships: and C. Licinius had commission to levy as many of Latine allies for the like number of ships: also the Pretor was enjoined to charge the Latine allies with 8000 foot, and 400 horse. A. Atilius Serranus, who had been Pretor the year before, was choosen to receive these forces at Brundisium, and to conduct them over into Macedony: and C. Silius the Pretor was appointed to have the army in readiness for to be transported. As for C. Licinius the Pretor, he by authority

E from the Senat, wrote to C. Popilius the Consul that he should command the second legion, which had been longest employed in Liguria, and consisted of the most experienced soldiers, together with four thousand footmen and two hundred horse of the Latine allies, to be ready at Brundisium upon the 1st Ides of February. With this fleet of ships and forces of souldiers, C. Silius was commanded to keep Macedony, until one were appointed to succeed him: and for this purpose his charge of command was continued for a year longer. All these directions of the Senat were put in execution with great diligence and expedition. Eight and forty Quinquagremes were set afloat out of their docks: and L. Porcius Licinius was ordained to conduct them to Brundisium: the other 12 were sent out of Sicily. Three Embassadors were dispatched into Apulia and Calabria, to wit, Sex. Digintus, T. Inventinus, and M. Caelius, for to buy corn to serve the fleet and the army. Now when all things were provided and in readiness, C. Silius the Pretor departed from the City in his warlike coat of arms, and arrived at Brundisium. About the end of the year C. Popilius the Consul returned to Rome, somewhat latter then the Senat had ordained; who was commanded to take the first time, and withall speed to create new magistrats, considering that to great a war approached to neer. And therefore when the Consuls discoursed in the temple of Bellona as touching his exploits in Liguria, the LL. of the Senat were nothing well pleased to hear him: but in stead thereof, they muttered every where, and asked him oftentimes, Why he had not restored to liberty those Ligurians, who were oppressed through the wicked proceedings of his father? The election of the Consuls was holden upon the twelfth day before the Calends of March

F according to the writs that went out: wherein were created Consuls, Pub. Licinius Crassus and Caius Cassius Longinus. The morrow following, the Pretors were elected, to wit, Caius Sulpicius Galba, L. Porcius Philus, L. Cassius Dives, C. Lucretius Gellus, C. Cinnus Rebinus, and L. Valerius Anulius. To these Pretors the provinces were assigned in this manner: that two of them should sit as LL. chief justices in Rome for civil jurisdiction: three other to have the government of Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia: to as the first only should remain not allotted to any place, for to be employed wheresoever the Senat would think good and provide. The Consuls elect were commanded by the Senate, upon the solemn day, when they were to enter into their magistracy, after they had sacrificed golden bulls, as it was appointed, to pray in this form, that the gods would vouchsafe the war which the people of Rome intended now to enter upon, to speed well, and come to happy issue. The same day the Senate decreed, that C. Popilius, the Consul, should for one pluries for candidates together in the honor of Jug. Ops. Mars, and the offerings should be made at all the shrines and altars, it to be commonwealth continued for ten years, in the same good estate as now it stood. And as the Senate ordained, the Consul vowed into the Capitol, that the said pluries should be exhibited, Crostings were presented of as great value as it pleased them to let down. This vow was pronounced by the Consul in the presence of no fewer then Y. o Senators, and according to that form of words which Lipidus the high-priest, or sovereign Bishop indited. That year died certain Prelates of State, to wit, Luc. Emilius Papus, one of the Decemvirs or superintendents over the holy rites, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus a Bishop, who the year before had been Consul. This man had a ill and ill-fortuned that news came unto him of his two sons, who then served in the wars of Thyrium, how the one was departed out of this life, and the other lay sick of a grievous and dangerous malady. The sorrow for the one, and the fear for the other, happening to just at one time, broke his heart and oppressed his spirits, in such as the next morning, when his servants entered betimes into his bed-chamber, they found him hanged by a cord, and strangled. It was thought abroad, that he had never been his own man, since he was Consul, and commonly it was spoken, that Juno Lucina in wrathfull displeasure against him for spoiling her temple, bereft him of his right wits. In the room of Emilius M. Valerius Messala was substituted Decemvirs, and in stead of Fulvius there was elected Archbishop, Cneus Domitius Arbiter, who to say the truth was very young to be made a priest.

In the year wherein P. Licinius and Q. Cassius were Consuls, not only the City of Rome, and the whole land of Italy, but all the Princes and States of Europe & Asia, were amused respectively upon the war between the Macedonians and Romans. Enneus (King of Asia) not only carried an old rankred malice against Philip, but also was pricked forward with new despite and anger upon a fresh occasion, in that by the wicked practise of Perseus, he had like to have been sacrificed at Delphi. Perseus King of Bithynia, was resolved not to enter into arms, but attend the issue of the war. For he thought it not reason and seemly for him to take arms in the defence of the Romans against his wives brother; and this account was made, that if Perseus happened to have the better, he might soon obtain pardon at his hands by the mediation of his sister, Arrianus King of the Cappadocians, over and besides that he had promised aid to the Romans in his own name, ever since that he had linked in affinity to Enneus, drew the same way which he went, and joyined with him in all his counsels both of war and peace. As for Antiochus [King of Syria] he teeth watered verily at the Kingdom of Egypt, as he, who despised as well the childhood of the young King in his oblige, as the weakness and negligence of his guardians; and considering there was some controversie about the title of Celestria, he supposed that he should have good occasion to levy war, to manage also and exploit the same without apprehension, while the Romans were busied in the Macedonian war; howbeit as well by his own Embassadors sent unto the Senat, as also unto theirs addrest unto him, he promised stoutly to be for them. Ptolemy [the young King of Egypt] being yet under age, was at the disposition of others; his tutors and protectors, as they prepared to wage war against Antiochus for the recovery of Celestria, so they promised the Romans withall to do their devoir in the Macedonian war. Masaniassa [King of the Numidians] was altogether for the Romans; he furnished them with coin, and intended to send his son Masagrus with aids both of men and elephants in that service. Howbeit he disposed of his designs as might serve his turn which way soever the world went; for if the victory fell to the Romans, he ordered that his affairs should remain still in the same state; and better he was not to look for, because the Romans would not suffer any violence to be offered unto the Carthaginians; but in case the Romans went down and had the overthrow (who then protected the Carthaginians) then he made full reckoning of Asato to be his own. Gentius [King of Illyria] had so demeaned himself, that he was suspected of the Romans; yet was he not fully resolved which side to take unto; and it seemed he would join to one or the other, more upon a fit as it took him in the head, than with any discretion or advice. Corys the Thracian, King of the Odrisians, took part evidently with the Macedonians. In these terms (I say) stood the KK. as touching this present war. As for the free Cities and States besides, the common people every where (as alwaies lightly it is seen) inclined to the worse part, and ran with the K. & the Macedonians; but the principal persons and men of quality, a man might perceive affected diversly. Some went with the Romans all upon the head, in such as they greatly impaired their authority in excessive favour to them; few of them were induced by the just and upright government of the Romans, but the most part were carried away with the strong conceit, that the more they employed themselves for them, the greater men they should be at home in their own Cities. Another sort there were of the Kings flattering favorites, who being deeply drenched in debt, and desirous of bettering their fortune (if the present state held still) abandoned and gave themselves over to entertain all changes and innovations. And some there were besides, possessed with a vain humor of their own, because Perseus seemed to have more favour of the common people. A third sort there were (and those of the best and wisest of all other) who if it had been in their hands to de-

A they would have to be contented with the lesser lot, under the Romans rather than the Kings. Mary if they might have had their liberty, so as they might freely dispose of their fortune, by their good will they would not have had the one part advanced by the rebellion and subversion of the other: but that the forces and soldiers which were remaining were and unspoiled, and they by might be entertained, and to be well taken care of, and of the Cities should continue the war, when as the one part might have proved the weaker side from the injuries of the mightier. And this that stood affected them, that they might not be so; but being determined to stand, the behaviour and disposition of the soldiers were the more and fiercer of their lot.

The Consuls that day, wherein they entered their government, when they sat down according to the ordinance of the Senate, with greater beauty in all their temples and churches, wherein the most part of the year the several gods and chambers for the gods were prepared, and thereby had presented by good tokens, that their prayers were acceptable to the immortal gods, made report unto the Senate, that their sacrifices were as they ought to be, as also their prayers, which they conceived touching the war. The Bureau-prince likewise by their praying declared, what it they went about any new enterprise, they should make speed, yea, for why? Alas! prognosticome of glory, triumph, and enlargement of their territory. Whereupon the Elders of the Senate commanded the Consuls to propose to the people the first day of the general assembly of the Centuries in this manner: In the name of God, and to the welfare and happiness of the Commonwealth: whereas Pompey the son of Philip K. of Macedonia, (against who stand and imminent tumults with his father's self, and after his death, and with him) has desired to be upon the allies of the people of Rome, to sell their territories, seeking their Cities, temples, and houses to be torn down, and the people of Rome, and to that end hath provided twenty thousand men, and in short, to make satisfaction, please it you that war be enterprise and waged against him. This bill passed by all the suffrages of the people. Then was there an act of the Senate likewise entered, that the Consuls should either agree together, or else cast lots for the provinces of Italy and Macedonia; and look whose lot fell to Macedonia, he should perfect it with fire and sword. K. Perseus and strict sect and faction which took his part, unless they made amends to the people of Rome. It was concluded also, that four legions should be newly enrolled, for either Consul to wait: with this preeminence and advantage to the province of Macedonia, that whereas to the legions of the other Consul (according to the ancient custom) there went but five thousand foot and two hundred horse speece, there should be enrolled for Macedonia six thousand foot and three hundred horse equally to a legion. Also for the one of the Consuls in the army of the allies, the number was augmented; so as besides those six hundred horsemen which Cn. Sittius had conducted already, he should of those allies transport over into Macedonia, sixteen thousand footmen and eight hundred horse. As for Italy, twelve thousand footmen of allies and six hundred horse were thought sufficient. Moreover this prerogative had the Province of Macedonia, that for Centurions and soldiers the Consul might enroll of the elder sort whom he thought good as many as were not above fifty years of age. In choosing of Tribunes military and colonels, the old manner was this year changed; in regard of the Macedonian war; to wit, that the Consuls (by advice and authority of the Senate) should move unto the people, that the said Tribunes might not that year be elected by voices of the people, but that their elections should be referred to the judgment and discretion of the Consuls and Pretors. The charge of command was thus divided among the Pretors as followeth: That Pretor whose lot fell to go whither it pleased the Senate to send, was assigned to take his journey to the fleet at Brundisium, and there to survey and revise the less-torvirs, and look how many he thought not meet for service, them to discharge, & to make up the number with chosen Libertines; and in any wise to order it so, that two third parts consisted of Roman naturall citizens, and the other third of allies. Item, That provision of victuals for the navy and the army, should be brought out of Sicily and Sardinia. And the Pretors of those two provinces had in charge to exact a double tenth of the Sicilians and Sardinians, and this grain to be conveyed into Macedonia for the army. Now Sicily fell to C. Caninius Rebasus; Sardinia to L. Furius Philus; and Spain to L. Cincleius. C. Sulpicius Galba was chief tustice for the citizens of Rome, and L. Junius Annius for the strangers; but C. Lucretius Gallus his lot was to go where the Senate would employ him. Between the two Consuls there was some jar and wrangling, rather then any great debate about their province. Cassius for his part said, That he was by the right to war in Macedonia without any cisting of lots for the matter, forasmuch as his colleague might not enter into lot with him, and save his oath. For he being Pretor, had (worn solemnly in a fre quent assembly of the people) because he would shift off and not go into his province, that he had occasion to select his sacrifices in a certain place and upon set daies, which could not be performed (as they ought) if he were absent. And the same as I take it cannot be well done during his absence now, that he is Consul no more then whiles he was Pretor. Howbeit if the Senate be of opinion and judge, that more consideration is to be had to intitle Caius Licinius his will now in the Consulship, then regard of this oath he took before in the Pretorship, yea will I notwithstanding acknowledge myself to the pleasure of the Senate. The Elders were consulted with hereunto, who judging that it were a proud part to deny him the government of a province, unto whom the people of Rome had granted the dignity of a Consulship, commanded the Consuls to cast lots. This Macedonia fell to P. Licinius, and Italy to C. Cassius. Then they put to lottery also the conduct and employment of the legions: whereby the first and third were to be transported into Macedony, the second and fourth to remain in Italy. In the morning, and choice of soldiers, the Consul went more neatly and straightly to work by far, then customably they used at other times. As for Centurions, he enrolled the elder sort also, as well for soldiers as centurions: and many there were who voluntarily entered their names, because they saw how those thrived well and grew rich, who had served either in the former Macedonian war, against Antiochus in Asia. Now when as the martial Colonel called forth the centurions by name one after another, and the principal first, there happened to be three and twenty centuries

* The Centurions in the service over the Triarii who are called also Pilani. For so besides many of the, witnesseth Ovid. 3^d lib. in these verses, Inde parva centurum decus crevit in orbem. Romulus, Habitos instituitque decem: Et totidem Principes. totidem Pilanus habebat Corpora legitimo quisque merebat equo. And that it was the chiefest place of Centurions in the legion, appeareth by Ligustinus in his oration following.

men (quoth he) have accomplished their full time of service required by law: they carry about them bodies as well spent and crasse for age, as broken by continual travels: howbeit refuse they will nothing, but are ready to do their devoir unto the Commonweal. This only they humbly crave and request, that they may not be assigned to baser places of command, then wherein they have been employed already when they bare arms. Then P. Livius, the Consul, commanded, the act of the Senat to be openly read: wherein it was ordained first to levy war upon Perseus; the next to enroll as many as they could of the old experienced Centurions for that war; and last of all exempt none from soldiery, but such only as were above fifty years of age. After this he earnestly besought them in this new war to need to Italy, and against a Prince so puissant, neither to hinder the Colonels in levying soldiers, nor forbid the Consul that he might appoint to each man what place and degree was thought to stand most for the good of the Commonweal. And in case there arose any doubt and difficulty in this business, to submit the decision thereof to the Senat. After that the Consul had delivered his mind, Sp. Ligustinus one of them who had appealed to the Tribunes of the Commons, requested both the Consul and the Tribunes to give him leave, for to speak a few words unto the people: who having liberty granted with all their good will, made a speech unto them in this wise. "My masters, you Quintus, Spurinus Ligustinus of the tribe Crispina, am descended from the Sabine. My father left me an acre of land and a little cottage to it, wherein I was born, bred and brought up, and whereupon at this day I dwell. So soon as I was come to mans estate, my father gave me to wife my cousin german, his neece by the brother, who brought nothing with her former marriage-good, but freedom of birth, honesty of life, and therewith fruitfulness of womb, as much (I may say to you) as a rich man of some wealthy house may well maintain. Six sons God hath sent between us, and two daughters to them, both maidens marriageable. Four of our sons are men grown, and have put on their mans robe; two are boies still in their Proteida, under seventeen years old. I my self was preft to the wars, the year when P. Sulpicius and C. Aurelius were Consuls. In that army which passed over sea into Macedony, I served in quality of a common souldier for the space of two years against King Philip. In the third year T. Quintius Flaminius, in regard of my forwardnesse assigned me the tenth place of leading among the Hastati in the vanguard. After that Philip and the Macedonians were vanquished, and we brought over again into Italy and discharged, I went immediately as a voluntary servitor into Spain with M. Porcius the Consul. And there is not a commander alive at this day, who saw farther into a souldier, and could judge better of vertue and valour then he: as they know full well, who by long warfare have had experience both of him and also of other leaders. He being my captain reputed me worthy to have the first place, and leading of the formost century of the Hastati. A third time I became a voluntary again in the expedition against the Atolians and K. Antiochus; and M. Calpurnius advanced me to the Captainship of the Principes, in the very first place of the foremost century. When King Antiochus was chased, and the Atolians subdued, we were brought back again into Italy, and two years together I was in pay of the legions that received yearly wages and allowance. Twice after this, I bare arms and served in Spain, once under Q. Fulvius Flaccus, a second time under T. Sempronius Gracchus the Pretor. By Flaccus I was brought home among others, whom for their valour and prowess he thought good to have in train for the honour of his triumph: and at the request and entrety of T. Gracchus I accompanied him into the Province. Where within few years space I had the leading of the first company of the Pilani or Triarii in the rereguard. Four and thirty times have I been rewarded with presents at my General hands, in token of vertue and prowess. Six civick coronets have I received: two and thirty years full have I followed the wars & more then fifty years old I am. Now if neither I had served out all the years required by law,

The oration of
Sp. Ligustinus.

A "law, nor might plead exemption and immunity by mine age, yet seeing I am able to shew four "soldiers for one, my four sons [I say for my self alone] I think it were reason, O P. Licinius, "that I were now freed and discharged. And all this I pray you take, as spoken for the be"hoof of my cause. Now as touching my person thus much. So long as any man who hath author"ity to enroll soldiers, shall judge me sufficient and able to bear arms, I will not go about to ex"cuse and thrust off. And look what place the Colonels and Marshalls shall suppose me worthy "of, it lyeth in his good will and pleasure to assigne me unto it: but to performe that no one per"son in the whole army turne out me in valor, that shall be my own endeavor, like as not only "my captains, but those also who have served with me are able to testifie. That I never had so car"ried my self and performed as much. And you likewise my fellow soldiers, albeit you practise B "and keep in use the priviledge and benefit of appealing to the Tribunes, yet meet and reason it is,
 "since in your youthfull daies ye never did ought in any place against the authority of the Senat
 "and the Consuls; ye now also in your declining age be at the disposition of the Senat and the "Consuls; yea, and to esteem all places worshipfull, wherein you shall defend and maintain the "Common weal. When he had thus said, the Consuls highly commended him, and from before "the people brought him into the Senat. And there also by the advice and authority of that hono"rable house, thanked he was, and the Marshal-Generall, in regard of his vertue, appointed him "to be the principall Centurion of the Pilani in the first legion. So the rest of the Centurions re"nouncing their appeal to the Tribunes, yielded obedience in the muster and levy above said.

To the end that the Magistrats and great commanders might go more timely into their govern"ments, the Latine feasts and holydaies were published to be holden upon the Calends of June.
 C Which solemnity being finished, C. Lucretius the Pretor took his journey to Brundisium, having "sent before all necessary furniture and provision for the fleet. Besides, those armies which the "Consuls levied, a commission was directed out to C. Sulpicius Gala the Pretor, to enroll four "legions of Roman citizens, with the ordinary full proportion of infanterie and cavalerie, and to chuse "out of the body of the Senat four Colonels to command them. Also to levy Latin allies 15000
 "foot, and 1200 horse, and to take order that his army should be ready to go whithersoever the Se-"nat thought good. P. Licinius the Col. at his own instant request (that over and above the armies "of citizens and allies, he might have an addition of auxiliaries) obtained of Ligurians 2000 of Can"didiot archers an uncertain number, namely, as many as the Candidiots upon request would lead. More"over, certain Numidian horsemen and elephants: for which purpose L. Posthumius Albinus, Q.
 D Terentius Culles and C. Aburnius were sent in embassage to Masaniassa and the Carthaginians. Simi-"lably it was thought good to send three Embassadors into Greece, to wit, A. Posthumius Albinus, "C. Decimius, and A. Licinius Nerva.

At the very same time there arrived Embassadors from King Perseus. But suffered they were not "to enter into the City, considering that both the Senat had ordained, and the people assented al"ready to make war upon their King and the Macedonians. So, admitted they were into the Temple "of Bellona before the Senat, where they delivered their message in this manner: That King Per- "seus marvelled why there were armies transported over into Macedony? And if the Senat might "be intreated so much, as to recall them home, the King would make satisfaction for the wrongs "done unto their allies, in such sort as the Senat in their discretion would appoint. Now there was "in the Senat-house at that time Sp. Carvilius, sent back for that very purpose out of Greece from E Cn. Sicilius. He made report and remonstrance, how Perseus was forced by arms, and certain "Cities of Thessaly won: with other exploits that King Perseus had either performed, or else was in-"hind to enterprise. To which challenges the Embassadors were commanded to make answer. But "after they were once to falter in their speech, saying they had no farther commission then that "they had delivered already; they were willed to relate unto the King their master, that P. Licinius
 "the Consul would shortly be in Macedony with an army, unto whom the King might address "his Embassadors, if he minded to do as he said and to make amends. As for sending any more to "Rome, there was no need nor cause, forasmuch as they would not suffer any of them to pass through F Italy. When they were dismissed with this short dispatch, P. Licinius the Consul had in charge, to "command them to go out of Italy within 11 daies, and to send Spirius Carvilius for to guard them "all the way to the sea-side until they were shipped. These occurrences passed in Rome before the "Consuls were gone into their provinces.

Now by this time Cn. Sicilius (who ere that he left his magistracy, was sent before as far as "to Brundisium to the fleet and the army) having put over into Epirus 5000 foot and 300 horse,
 "was encamped before Nymphæum in the territory of the Apolloniats. From thence he sent certain "colonels with 2000 soldiers, to seize the forts and castles of the Dacariats and Illyrians, by oc"casion that they of their own accord made treaties and sent for garrisons, to the end they might be "better guarded & secured from the violence and invasion of the Macedonians bordering upon their G confines.

Some few daies after, Q. Martius, A. Anilius, P. and Ser. both Cornelius and Lentulus, together "with L. Decimius, who all had been sent in embassage into Greece, brought them to Coryra one "thousand footmen: where they both parted between themselves their severall quarters whither
 "they would go, and also their soldiers. Decimius was sent to Gentius King of the Illyrians, with "commandment, if he saw him any waies coming on and inclined to entertaine amity with the Ro"mans, to sound him and give the assay, yea, and to draw him into the association of this war.

These two Lemuli were sent into Thessalia, from thence to traverse and cross over into Perseus, and before winter to search about and compass the coast of the Wells, Marinus, & Antiochus were assigned to visit Epirus, Acidia and Thessalia. From thence they were enjoined to have an eye into Scythia and Bithynia and to sail into Poloponissus, where they appointed meet with the Lemuli. But before that they departed from Gyrrus, letters were brought from Perseus, wherein he demanded what reason the Romans had either to transport any forces into Thessalia, or to set upon the Cities; though good it was to return him no answer by writing, but only by word of mouth thus much to say unto the messenger that brought the letters, That the Romans did it for the defence and safeguard of the said to wit, The Lemuli as they rode their circuit visiting the Cities and towns of Poloponissus, exhorting the Scots and commonalities thereof and specially one as well as another, To aid the Romans at this protest against Perseus, with semblable courage and like fidelity as they had stood with them first in the war against Philip, and afterwards in that with Antiochus; might here in their publick assemblies much animating and grumbling thereof. The Acheans (who from the very beginning of the Macedonian war had been together for the Romans, and during the war against Philip, came to the Macedonians) took it in disdain that they were reputed in the same rank with the Messians and Eleans, and no better then they who had born arms against the people of Rome, for Antiochus their enemies and who but the other day, being enrolled into the commonality and counsell of the Acheans, complained that they were delivered unto the victorious Acheans, as the recompence and guerdon of their conquest. Martinus and Attalus as they went up to Gyrrus a town of Epirus, ten miles from the sea, to a general Council holden there of all the Epirians, had audience with great contentment of them; all Four Hundred of their young and able lusty men they sent into the Ossians country to lie in garrison for defence of those Macedonians who by them were set at liberty. From thence, they held on their progress into Etolia; and after they had sojourned there some few daies (whiles a new Priest was elected in the room of him that was deceased, and Lysimachus appointed the governor, a man known for certain to favour the Romans) they passed over into Thessaly. Thither repaired the Embassadors of the Acarnanians and the banished persons of Etolia. The Acarnanians were enjoined to utter and declare before them what they had committed and done against the people of Rome, being inveigled and deceived by the promises of the two Kings Philip and Antiochus during the wars against the one and the other; since occasion was now presented unto them, for to make amends and lay all that was amiss. For if upon their ill demerits towards the people of Rome, they had made triall and tasted of their clemency, they might now by good deserts prove their boundy another while. As for the Boetians, they were reprov'd and upbraided for entering into association with Perseus; and when they seemed to lay the whole fault upon Ismaeus a captain of one of the two factions, and certain Cities and States which being of a different opinion were drawn to the side; Say ye so? (quoth Martinus again) and that shall soon appear, for we all permit every commonalty and City to answer apart and severally for themselves the best they can.

Now was the Diet of the Thessalians holden at Larissa; where, as the Thessalians took good occasion and found ample matter of thanksgiving the Romans, for the liberty which by their goodness they had obtained: so as the Roman legats had as copious an argument to render them thanks, for that first in the war with Philip, and afterwards of Antiochus, they had been so mightily aided by the Thessalian nation. Thus by this mutuall rehearsal of pleasures and good turns given and taken, the hearts of the multitude were enkindled with a fervent zeal to decree and ordain whatsoever it pleased the Romans to desire. After this council was dissolved, there came Embassadors from K. Perseus unto Martinus, upon a speciall assistance of the private friendship and hospitality which had passed between his father King Philip, and the said Martinus and his father. These Embassadors began the speech with a commemoration of the said familiar and inward acquaintance, requesting him to permit the K. for to have access unto him, and to converse together. Martinus answered, that he also had heard his father speak of the amity and mutuall hospitality between him and K. Philip; in regard and remembrance of which near bond of familiarity he was the more willing to take upon him the charge of that embassy and commission. As to the party, he would not have deferred it at all, if he might commodiously have wrought it: & now for this present he promised (so soon as he possibly could) to send his counties before to advertise the King, that they might come to the river Peneus, whereas the passage lieth from Omolium over to Dium. And verily at that time, Perseus was retired from Dium into the inland quarters of his realm, and had gathered some pretty gale of hope; in that Martinus had given out, how for love of him he had undertaken this embassy. After some few daies they repaired to the place appointed. This King accompanied with a great train as well of his friends, as his courtiers and pensioners which guarded his person. The legats likewise were attended upon with no lesse a troop, by reason as well of many that followed them from Larissa, as also of diverse embassages from the States which assembled at Larissa, and were desirous to carry home with them certain news of the sequel, which they should hear. Every man had an inward desire tesled in his heart to see the manner of the meeting of this noble K. & these high commissioners from the Sovereign state and mightiest people of the whole world. Being come to the interview one of another, they stood still on either side of the river, which only parted them at under. For a while there passed coterpoursiers between, whiles they made it strange on both parts, who should pass the river first, for the Macedonians stood somewhat upon the toll majesty of a King; & the Romans were so respective.

A respect to the reputation of the people of Rome, considering withall, that Perseus sought the means & made first motion for this parley. Whereupon, to end this controversy, Marius cast out a merry word. What needs all this (qd. he) let the younger come to the elder without more ado, and the son to the father: this he spake, for that himself also was turnamed Philipp. The K. soon condescended thereunto. But then arose another doubt and difference, namely, with what number he should pass over. The K. thought it meet & convenient to come with his whole train: but the legats would have had him either to bring over with him three persons, and no more: or else if he were minded to pass with so great a company, to put in hostages for assurance, that during the time of the parley no outrage should be committed. So Perseus sent as pledges, Hippias & Panmachus, the principal and most especial friends that were about him, whom also he had employed

B in the embassage. Now were these hostages required, not so much for a gage & pawn of security, as that it might appear unto the allies there present, that the K. in meeting and communing with the Roman Commissioners, should not keep state comparable with him, but abate somewhat of the port and majesty which they carried. Their mutual greeting and salutation was nothing strange, as between enemies: but kind and amiable, as among familiar friends. Which done, they sat them down upon their chairs set ready for them. After they had thus sate a while in silence and said nothing, Marius began in this manner: "You expect (I suppose qd. he) that we should

But seeing that he who breaketh a covenant must be chastised either by word or sword, (like as I had rather that any other but my self should have commission to make war upon you:) So I will be so bold (however it fall out) to speak rough and tart unto you as to my friend: and herein will I follow the manner of Physicians, who for the health of their patients, otherwhiles minister bitter medicins and apply stinking corrosives. Since time that you first attained unto the crown, the Senat thinketh you have done but one only thing of all that you ought to have done, namely, that you sent your ambassadors to Rome for to renew the league; and yet they judge you had done better in not renewing it, than after it was renewed, to violate the same. Chased you have out of the Realm * Abrapolis, a confederat and friend of the people of

D Rome. The murderers of Artaxarus you have received and entertained, yea, and given the world thereby to understand, that you were well pleased (to say no worse) with his death: and killed they have a Prince most fast and faithfull to the Romans, of all others in Illyrium. Thorough Thessaly and the territory of Malis, you have marched with an army against the tenor of the league, as far as to Delphi: and more than that, contrary unto the said accord, sent you have aid and succour to the Byzantins. With our allies the Boetians, you have entered into a secret association and bound the same with an oath, which by right you ought not to have done. Who it was that murdered the Theban ambassadors Eversia and Callierius who came directly from us, I had rather enquire than charge any man and declare. The civil wars in Aetolia the massacres of their Princes & States, unto whom may they be imputed in any likelihood, but to your people? As for the Dolopians, wisteth they were by your self in person and by no other. It grieveth

E me and goeth to my heart, to speak who it is that K. Eumenes challengeth and burdeneth with this, That in his return from Rome into his own kingdom, he was like to have been killed as a beast for sacrifice & that at Delphi, in a sacred and hallowed place, even before the altars. As for the secret practices which your host of Brundisium hath disclosed and set abroad, I know right well, that not only you have received letters thereof from Rome, but your own ambassadors also have told you all by word of mouth. You might have soon avoided all this, and heard nothing thereof from me, if you would have forbore only to ask & demand. Wherefore our forces were transported over into Macedony, & why we sent garrisons into our confederat Cities? But since you would needs put out such a question, more pride it had been in us to have held our peace, than to utter the plain truth as we have done. Verily, for mine own part, in regard of the hospital and friendly cures that have passed between your father and us, I favour you, and will gladly make the best of your cause: and would to God I had some good occasion ministered from your self, to solicit and further your suit before the Senat.

F To these challenges and imputations, the K. framed his answer in this wise: "Content I am so plead my cause before you, the parties appellants and judges both, which would be found (I doubt not) good, if it were debated and handled in the presence of indifferent and equall arbitrators. And first, as touching those matters which are objected against me, they are such as in part, I wot not well, whether I may not glory in them, or at least will not blush in the confessing and avowing thereof. As for the rest, as they are charged upon me in bare words, so plain words may serve flatly and simply to deny them. For say, that this day I were subject unto your laws, and by them to have my trial, what can either that promoter of Brundisium, or K. Eumenes inform against me, but it will appear, that they accuse me not so much with matter of truth, as exhibit only slanderous and reproachfull terms? A like matter, I wis it is, that neither Eumenes had had any other enemy but me, (he, I say, who hath done such wrong and injury to so many both in common and also in particular:) nor I could find a fitter person to serve my turn in the execution of my projects but this Rammius, a fellow that I never had seen before, nor was ever like

The answer of King Perseus.

"to see again hereafter, I must (forsooth) give account for the Thebans, who as it is well known, H
 "perished by shipwrack: as also for the murder of Arctas; and yet therein I am no deeper "charged than thus, that the murderers of him fled in exile & were shadowed within my realm.
 "Now surely, this hard conclusion and unreasonable condition I will not refuse to undergo, in case
 "you also will be content to take upon you and avow all those crimes and facts, for which they "stand condemned, who as banished persons have fled either to Rome or into Italy: but in case
 "both you and all other nations will disavow that, I also will be one among the rest. And in good "faith, to speak uprightly, to what end should any man be banished from one country, if he may "not find a place in another, and be permitted there to live in exile? And yet (so soon as ever I "found by advertisement from you that they were within Macedony) I for my part made diligent "search untill I had them, and then I commanded them to depart out of my kingdom, yea and ex"pressly forbad them for ever setting foot again within my dominions. And thus much verily "concerning the criminal matters objected unto me as a defendant pleading at the bar. Now let "us argue and debate the rest, enforced and laid against me in quality of a King, namely, which "concern and touch the accord contracted between me and you. For if the words run in this sort
 "and are thus written in the foresaid covenants of accord, That I may not be suffered to defend
 "my self and my realm, no, not if any enemy of mine levy war against me; then I must confess
 "indeed, that the league I have broken, in that I stood upon my guard and defence by force of "arms against Abrupolis, an associat of the people of Rome. But if it were lawful for me to do
 "by warrant of the accord and allowed also by the law of nations, by force to repel force; what "should I else say, what could I else have done I pray you? When Abrupolis had laid waste the "frontiers of my kingdom even as far as to Amphipolis, led into captivity many persons (reco-
 "born, carried away a mighty number of slaves, and driven before him many thousand head of "cattell; should I have sitten still and suffered him untill he had come armed to Pella, even unto
 "my royall palace? But some man may haply say, You did well indeed and justly, in making head
 "and pursuing him by force of arms, may vanquished he should not have been, neither ought he
 "to have suffered those calamities which follow men vanquished. Why if I have endured the for"tune therof, provoked as I was to war, how can he justly complain of taking the like, being him"self the cause and first motive of all? I will not use the same manner of defence. O Romans, to "this, that by force of arms I have repressed the Dolopians: for if I have not done by them accord"ing to their demerits, yet I am sure I have dealt by the verue of the right I have over them be"ing as they are of mine own kingdom, under my obeysance, and made subjects to my father even
 "by a decree of your own drawing. And yet, were I to render a reason of my proceedings against "them, I say, not unto you nor unto my allies, but even to those who like not of any cruel com"mand so much as over bondslaves; can I be thought to have exercised more rigor against them, "than equity and reason would bear? For Enphranor, whom I deputed governor over them, they "killed in such sort, that death is too good for them, and the least punishment of all others that "they have deserved. And as I marched forward in my progress from thence to visit the Cities of "Larissa, Antron, & Pylleon, I ascended up to Delphi, there for to sacrifice, to the end that I might "discharge my conscience & pay those vows which I had of long time owed. Now to aggravate
 "matter in this also against me, it is said moreover, that I was there with my army, and intended
 "(no doubt) for to seiz Cities into my hands, and put garrisons into fortresses; for which at this "present I complain of you. Call the States and Cities of Greece together to a generall assembly, "through which I passed. Let any one man come forth & make complaint of the least harm done
 "by any of my souldiers; then will I not refuse to be reputed for one who under pretence of di"vine sacrifice, went about another thing. We sent indeed garrisons to the Etolians and *Bizan-
 "tins*, yea, and with the Breotians we contracted amity. But these things, in what sort & for what "purpose they were done, my ambassadors have not only declared, but also executed oftentimes
 "before your Senat: where I found some Umpires to hear and decide my cause, although not so "indifferent and favourable to me, ward, as your self are. O Marius, my fathers old friend and fa"miliar, For as yet Eumenes my accuser was not come to Rome, who by false suggestions, wresting N
 "at his pleasure every thing to the worst, to make all suspicions and odious unto you, went about
 "to make you beleve that Greece could not possibly be restored to freedom, & enjoy the fruit of "your gracious benefit, so long as the kingdom of Macedony stood entire and upright. Well, the "world you shall see, will turn about; and anon one or other will be here, to make remonstrance
 "and prove, That to no purpose Antiochus is removed and confined beyond the mountains of "Taurus; that Eumenes is become much more grievous and unportable to all Asiathan Antiochus
 "ever was: and that your allies cannot be at rest nor live in quiet, so long as he keepeth
 "his royal court in Pergamus, a Cittadel (as it were) overlooking and commanding all the neigh"bour Cities bordering thereupon. Right well I know, O Q. Marius, and you A. Atilius, that "whatsoever either you have objected against me, or I answered for my defence & purgation, is O
 "such as the ears and affections are of the hearers: neither what I have done, nor what mind and "intention I have carried in mine actions will be so much regarded, as how you take every thing "either done or intended. Mine own conscience beareth me witness, that willingly I have not "faulted; now, if for want of knowledge and foresight I have been overseen and done somewhat "amiss it may be corrected and amended by this present chastisement. This I am sure, my trespass
 "is not incurable, neither have I committed ought that you should deem worthy to be punished by war & force of arms. And if ye desire to live in a free state, that then goeth this name abroad throughout all Nations of your Country, and greatly both that I say for so light occasions which hardly are worth the conquest and the making of arms, you be ready to enter into arms and levy war upon your Country. Perseus for that time acceded to his speech, and moved him to attend on himself to some kind of advice and opinion himself to try all means to the very last point, and to still working whereof some hope of good might arise. It remained only to be debated in Council, how counsel might pass in safety. And to this purpose, when it was necessary for the King to request a further aid of arms, Marcus himself was willing and desirous from thenceforth for that his duty was to nothing else by all this conference and parley, yet he seemed to make a hard matter and difficulty of it, not to do a special favour and pleasure unto Perseus in granting his petition. The truth was, the Romans yet were not ready nor thoroughly appointed at this point for the war; they had neither army sufficient enough, nor captains sufficient; whereas Perseus (but that he was blinded in all his councils with a vain hope of peace) had all things prepared and in readiness, and might then have begun to wage war, as in the best and most opportune season for himself, so the worst and unprofitable of all other times for his enemies.

After this parley and the continuance of war assured faithfully on both parts, the Roman Commissioners were appointed and resolved to go into Bœotia, where there was begun already some trouble and commotion, by reason that certain States of the Bœotians were departed from the society of the common Council, ever since it was reported back, how the Roman Legats made answer that it should appear and be seen, what Cities they were indeed which took no pleasure to have any association with the King. And first the ambassadors from Cherronia afterwards from Thebes encountered them upon the way, who assured them that they were not present in that Diet and Council, where this association was concluded. To these embassages no answer for this time was made, but willed they were only to give their attendance and follow them to Chalcedon.

At Thebes great variance there was, which arose by occasion of another strife and debate. In their solemn assembly for the election of the Prætor of the Bœotians that year which had the republic in revenge of that injury and disgrace, assembled the multitude and made a decree at Thebes, That the Bœotarches should not be received within their Cities: in such sort, as like banished men they needed to Thebes: from whence for received there they were incontinently without any stay being called again to Thebes upon better advisement and change of mind, they made an ordinance, That if to the number of twelve private persons held any conventicle or publicke meeting together, they should be condemned to die. After this Ismerus the new Prætor, a noble personage and of great valiance, by virtue of a decree adjudged them in their absence for to lose their lives. To Chalcedon they were fled, and from thence to the Romans at Larissa they went; where they declared that Ismerus was the cause of their association with King Perseus. Upon that forbiddance, they grew to hot contention, yet ambassadors from both parts came to the Romans, as well the banished persons and accusers of Ismerus, as also Ismerus himself. But so soon as the Roman Legats were come to Chalcedon, the States and heads of other Cities (whoever by special desire of their own had renounced association with King Perseus) joyntly with the Romans; whereas they took exceeding great contentment and joy. Ismerus thought himself and reason that the Bœotian nation should be committed to the protection of the Romans. Whereupon arose a tumultuous fray, & that that he fled into the Tribunal of the Legats to save himself: he had escaped narrowly from being killed by the said exiled persons, with the help of their supporters and favours.

Also the City of Thebes, which is the capital place of State within Bœotia, was in great trouble and uproar; whilst some came to the King, and others to the Romans. Besides there was a multitude of Citizens and Strangers gathered together to maintain the ordinance and decree as touching the association with the King. But such was the resolute persistence of the principal and chief men, who moved by the late calamities of Philip and Amacinus, how great the forces, and how happy the fortune was of the Roman Empire, that the same multitude repented, and being overcome, passed a new decree to revoke and cancel the former confederacy with the King; sent those that were the movers and persuaders of contracting that amity to Chalcedon for to satisfy and content the Roman Legats, yet also to conclude were of advice to recommend the City to the faithful protection of the said Commissioners. Marcus & Antius took great pleasure to hear that Thebans had thus now they persuaded with them severally apart, and gave them counsel to send ambassadors to Rome for the renewing of that amity: but before all things they took order for the restoring of the banished persons: as for the authors of the confederacy contracted with the King, they by their own votes condemned. Having thus by this means rejoined and made frustrate the Diet of the Bœotians (the thing which above all they most desired) they took their journey to Pharsalus, together with Ant. Caracilius, whom they had sent for to Chalcedon. For their sakes a Council was holden at Aegæa, where they demanded nothing else of the Achaean nation, but only to furnish them with 1000 soldiers. This garrison was sent to the defence of Chalcedon, until the Roman ships were transported into Greece. Marcus and Antius having thus dispatched all the affairs of Greece, did return to Greece in the beginning of winter returned to Rome.

Then will I write how these things were done in Rome, to wit, T. Claudius, P. Posthumus, and
M. Junius. They in their circuit and visitation exhorted all their allies to take arms against Perseus.

for the Romans. And the mightier and more wealthy any City was the more earnestly travelled they there: because the intention was to have the more ample and authority of the people. For of all others the knowledge of their report and consequence every way for that they were not only to have a great countenance, but also and in addition with their forces this way, and by the advantage of which they had got together a fleet of forty sail. Thus they were their resolution, (whom they call Perseus) had by many reasons the tales with the knowledge to abandon the hope they had by entertaining their King, which they had found by their experience how vain it was, and to hold themselves to the society and alliance of the Romans, the third hold in all others at that time in the world, as well for the reason of force as of authority and honour. There is intended war by them too he against Perseus, and no doubt the Romans will receive of us the same provision and assistance of ships and soldiers, which they have received lately against Antiochus, and before that against King Philip, and then you will be to see and forced in great haste to provide a fleet, which if were more time it should be far more plentiful, forth, unless ye begin betimes to repair and fit your ships, unless I see you fit in haste to furnish the same with sailors and mariners. And with so much more endeavour ought ye thus to do, that by your deed and effectual employment you may refute and disprove the false insinuations wherewith Enimetus hath charged you, by these reasons, that they were no more as at the arrival of the Roman Legats afore said they were able to draw unto them an armada of 40 ships ready rigged and well appointed, that they might know and see they looked not to be ashamed thereunto. And this embassage was of great moment and importance, also to gain the hearts of the States in Asia. Only Decimus returned to Rome without any effect of his errand and commission, nay, he ran into an ill name and obloquy, upon suspicion that he had received certain bribes of the Princes in Thyrrhenia.

Perseus upon the conference and communication had with the Romans, retired into Macedonia and sent his Embassadors to Rome, to treat about the conditions of peace begun already with Marius: to other Embassadors also of his he gave his letters to carry to Byzantium and Nicomedia, the tenor of which letters was one and the same directed to them all, namely, that he had communed with the Roman Legats, but he had to place and couched as well what he heard as what he spoke, that it might seem he gave not one look unto them, but gained the better part of dispute & debating with them. These Embassadors added moreover and said unto the Knobians, That they hoped assuredly there would be a peace, for that they by the mission and service of Marius and Arillus were addressed in embassy to Rome. Now if the Romans have accepted the covenants of accord proceeded to levy war against the Knobians, were to create the with all the credit and power they have, to punish the breach again, but with all their power and treaty they might not prevail, then they were to look about and consider this one point, that the might and puissance of the whole world were not devolved into the hands of that one people. And as this imported and concerned all the rest, so the Knobians especially, who were amongst other States in dignity and wealth, both which might be obnoxious and dangerous, if there were regard and respect made of none but the Romans. The letters of the Kings and of the Embassadors, were entertained with friendly silence, other else they took care to change their settled minds: for now the authority of the better part began also to carry the matter with all their hearts: but if it should come to war, their King and Master was well able to resist, not only to exact any thing at their hands, to destroy the ancient army which they had with the Romans, and which they had acquired by many and great desires, it well was to be kept. In their return from Rhodus, they went to the Chief of Rhodes, and thence to Halicarnassus, from whom it seemed a thing expected, that they would have been welcomed and welcomed from the King & thence to the Romans. But the good news and welcome was somewhat they were somewhat discontented with the Romans, both for condoning the crime and principal Citizens, and also for restoring the banished persons. But the Corinthians and Thians upon an invited and taken by hand of the King, sent Embassadors into Rome requesting a pardon for their desert, and the excessive pride of the Thebans to their embassy the King thus answered, That a pardon he might not lend by reason of the crime committed by the Romans: howbeit, he advertised them to maintain and guard themselves against the injuries of the Thebans all that ever they could, but yet so, as they have the Romans to stand to be their heavy friends, and so to proceed to fight against them.

Marius and Arillus being come to Rome, made report of their embassy unto the Capitulum in such manner, as in nothing they gloried more, than in deluding the decreeing the King by means of a cessation from arms, and a pretended hope of peace. For to well appointed was he and furnished with all provision for war, and they could not while he was provided every way, that he might easily have possessed himself of all places of opportunity and advantage, before that their army could pass over into Greece. But now having this reprieve and time by the truce, as the King would come nothing better provided, so the Romans might begin the war more fully furnished with all things convenient. Moreover, they related how they by their coming distressed the King at the general Council of the Romans, so as by no means any more hereafter they could be rejoined to the Macedonians by contract and accord. The greater part of the Senat approved the service of deliver up these proud L.L. together with King and kingdom, in case ye sue for ease wars, and so do whatsoever they will command you. All the while that he delivered this speech, there might be heard fierce exclamations oftentimes, sufficiently testifying the general assent of them all: but these last words they lift up their voices and cried out aloud with anger & indignation, mencing the enemy, part for courage and resolution, exhorting the King to be of good cheer, and the good heart: inasmuch as he was constrained to give over and make an end of his Oration: only he commanded them to be ready for the remove, & to put themselves in the journey against the enemy: for by this time advertised he was that the Romans were dislodged from Nymphæum. After this assembly was dismissed, he gave audience to the ambassadors from the States of Macedonia: for come they were to make promise and offer both of money & grain to maintain this war every one according to their ability. Thanked they were each one and released of all that charge with this answer, that the Kings provision was sufficient. Only he commanded them to find wains and carts for carriages of the pieces of ordnance, the engines of battery, the darts, quarrels and other shot, whereof a mighty deal he had provided: and in sum, all the instruments & furniture of war.

 Then he set forward with his whole army marching toward Erzede, and near unto the lake which they call Begaviter, he encamped. The next morrow he advanced to Elmus, upon the river Helios.
 After this, having passed over the mountains named Camburi through a straight and narrow passage, he descended to those that inhabit Aurum, Pythoni, and Deliche, which quarter is called Tripolis. These three towns staid some while in suspense, by reason that they had given their hostages to the Larissians: but in the end, overcome with the fear presented before their eyes, were content to yield themselves into his hands. Perceiving gracious words to this people making this surrender at his first arrival without any doubt or stay at all made by the inhabitants within. As for the town Cyrena, he assaied to batter it, and the first day he was repulled in a sharp skirmish at the very gates made by the townsmen that put on arms, drew up on a head, and made resistance. But the morrow after, when he had assailed the City with all his forces, they submitted all to his mercy before night. The inhabitants of the next town to it, Myla, presuming upon their fortifications, and standing upon this, That their City was impregnable, were so proud and lusty, that they could not be contented to shut the gates only against the King, but most rudely and maliciously spared not to cast out reproachfull taunts, and give terms against his own person and the Mace- donians. Which manner of dealing, much offended the people, and edged them the rather to enforce and follow the assault, so it kindled them as the more (upon despair of all pardon or mercy) to maintain and make good their place, & stand more resolutely in their own defence. When upon for this gates together the town was assailed by both parts, and defended by the other with mighty courage right valiantly. The Macedonians were so many in number, that by turns they relieved the assault without any difficulty, and entered one in the place of another. But the townsmen who ever more day and night guarded the gate without any change, new supply were not only over-charged with many wounds, but also wearied and cumbered with continual travail and want of sleep. The fourth day, when at one instant the Macedonians were heard against the wall invenged quarter, and the gate failed with greater force and violence, than before the inhabitants being driven from the curtain and battlements, so all to ward the gate, and made a sudden fall upon the enemies: which proceeding more upon misconceit and rashness, than any reason and allured confidence of their own strength, caused them (few in number and unarmed) to be surrounded & put to flight by the enemies fresh and in heart, who entered the town, and made the gate standing wide open. Thus was this City taken and sacked. The bodies of the three born persons as many as remained after the bloody execution, were cast into a river. After he had sacked, rained, and burnt a great part of the town, dislodged and departed from thence to Phalanna, and the next day following went onward and marched to Gyrene. But being advertised that T. Minutius Rufus and Flavius the Pretor of Thebes were entered thither with a strong he passed besides the the town, and he made offer of any assault. But he refused to assault Gyrene, by reason that the townsmen were stricken with exceeding fear upon his sudden assault.
 These two towns are situate upon the very straight which leadeth to Lybia, but Gyrene is the
 And therefore he left it guarded with a strong garrison both of foot and horse, as also fortified with a trebble trench and rampier. He left in person went onward to Syracusa, where there so attend the coming of the enemy. And withal he commanded his army to follow the survey corn every way all over the territory of the enemies, that under him, for he was minded upon the hanging of an hill toward the very foot of the mountain Orus, lying upon the south side of the plain champion of Thebes, under it, but behind on the back Macedonia and Lybia, over and above these commodities, the place is very fruitful and storehouse of all good things, watered also with many quick and running springs round about.

The Roman Consul having his army on foot about that time, marched toward Thebes, as the first found good way and ready passage through Lybia: but afterwards, when he was passed over once into Asiamania, he met with a rough country & rugged, and in many places impassable.

A breaking their ranks after that they were joyned with the aide of Eumenes, they both sought the opportunity to their place who were disbanded in the rout, to retire in safety within their ranks and also saving their own baggage. When the enemies pursued not so thick in troop, they adventured to put themselves forward beyond, and so flaid many of thosenear allies whom they encountered and received in their fight. Neither durst the King's men being now also disarrayed and dispersed here and there in following the chase, come to hand-fight and joyn battell with a host continuing so well in order as they did, and marching firm and strong together: whereas the matter had been disordered and thus was brought to a small end, in case the King who won the better in horse-fight had never to him come in with help and succour. For as he encouraged his soldiers to fight there was in place very busy and in passing good time the Phalaris which Alpion and Lemnos people they would not be behind-hand in this hardy enterprise) brought of their own accord in great haste to loon after they heard of the winning hand of the Cavalry. And whilce the King was red in doubt of successe between hope and fear of this so great an adventure, Eumenes the Cretan whose service Persus had used in the awair aid for K. Eumenes and Dido considering that main battell marching heavily armed under their ensignes ran unto the King and earnestly advertised him to take heed, lest that presuming too much and hearing himself over-confident of his good speed of his he brought not unadvisedly the main chance of all his state into a needles and unecessary hazard. For it (quoth he) you can be content with the happy fortune of this day, and so rest, rather you shall have the means to make an honourable peace, or else (if you had rather prosecute the war) to win exceeding many allies to bear arms with you in the field: who, no doubt, will follow the train of your good fortune. So this way good the Kings mind ever and chither he loon inclined. Therefore having commended Eumenes for his good advice, he commanded the ensignes to retire, and the footmen to return into the camp: likewise to found the retreat unto the Guidons of the men of arms. In this battell 200 Roman footmen that day lost their lives, and no fewer than 2000 footmen, and near upon 200 of the Cavalry were taken prisoners. Of the Kings side there died not past 200 horsemen and forty of the other.

After that the victorious enemies were upon their return into the camp all were jocond & glad in general, but above the rest the Thracians shewed themselves in joy for this their victory over-injunct: for they returned singing full merrily, and carried the heads of their enemies fixed upon their spear-points. But the Romans were not only sad and heavy for this unfortunate journey but fearfull also lest the enemy should forthwith assail their camp. Eumenes gave counsell to dislodge and remove to the other side of the river Pemus, that it might serve them instead of a defence and bulwark, until such time as the amazed souldiers had recovered their spirits and taken heart again. The Col was ashamed and abashed to bewray his fear: howbeit over-ruled with reason, he let his army over the river in the dead time of the night, and encamped on the further bank. K. Persus the morrow after advanced forward to bid the enemies battell, but perceiving they were lodged in safety beyond the river, he confessed that he had faulted indeed for that he had not followed his victory the day before; but more overcame a good deal he was in lying still and taking repose that night for without troubling any else of his own men he might have sent out the light-armed souldiers only to let upon the enemies as they passed over the river in haste and fright, and so defeated a great part of their forces. Now the Romans shook off their fear for the present considering they were encamped in a sure place: but among other damages, the blot especially of their honour and name grieved and troubled them. And as they sate in Council before the Consul, every man for his part laid all the blame upon the Etolians, who first began to be afraid and run away; and whose example of fear the other allies of the Cities of Greece followed for it was said, that five principall men of mark among the Etolians, were seen and noted first of all other to have turned their backs. But the Thessalians were praised in a full assembly of the whole army and their Captains for their vertue and valorous service were honoured with presents. The spoils of the enemies were brought before King Persus: out of which he bestowed freely upon some, brave and gorgeous armours: upon others goodly great horses; and finally, certain were rewarded with the prize of good prisoners. Targets there were above a thousand and five hundred, cuirasses and corselets not so few as a thousand; besides a far greater proportion of murrions, swords, and shot of all sorts. Great matters these were, considered in themselves; but much more amplified and set out by the King himself with a speech that he made in a frequent audience of his army assembled together, after this or the like manner. "You see already by this (quoth he) what you may judge before-hand of the small issue of this war: discomfited ye have the better part of your enemies, to wit, the Roman Cavalry, wherein they took themselves to be invincible. For their horsemen are the very gallants and braves of their youth; their Gentlemen of arms (I say) are the seminary and nuptial garden of their Senat. From them they chuse their Nobles and Peers to make Consuls of yea, and Generals of the field another day. And the spoils of these we have ere while divided among us. Neither is the victory less which ye have gained of the Infantry and legions, who although by night they made an escape from you, yet in hastening to pass over the river, they resembled a sort that had suffered shipwrack at sea, and in fearful haste for their lives have swom & overspread the river every where with their bodies. Sooner shall we & with greater ease I grow get over Pemus, to chase them thus already overcome, than they did making such haste for fear: and being once set on the other side, we shall out of hand had assail their camp, which we might have feared and now this day, but that they took them to their heels and fled. But if they wait come to a field and try the quiver by the footmen; look ye for no other issue of the conflict with footmen, than was before of the other with horsemen. These words, both the horsemen (who bare upon their own shoulders the spoils of their enemies lying slain before their eyes in open view) heard with great pleasure and comment, as measuring the hope of the future speed by the fortune passed; and also the footmen enflamed now with the glory of others, and namely, those that were of the Macedonian Phalanx, wished with all their hearts to have the like occasion offered unto them, wherein they might not only shew their valiant service before the King, but also win sensible glory of their enemies. Thus the assembly was dissolved, and the morrow after the King marched forward and encamped upon Mopsus, which is an hill great in the mid way between Pella and Larissa. The Romans removed their camp into a place of more security, howbeit, not far from the bank of Pelagos. Thence he paired Masines the Numidian, with 1000 horse and as many foot, besides 22 Elephants. Now as K. Persius during these daies, sat in Council what course to take as touching the main conduct of his affairs, when his courage was now well abated and not so lusty for his late victory, some of his friends were so hardy as to advise him to use this good fortune of his for the obtaining and compassing of some honourable peace, rather than upon a vain hope to carry his head aloft, and engage himself and his whole state into some hazard & jeopardy, out of which he should not be able to recover and retire into safety. For to keep a mean and moderation in prosperity, and not over-confidently to trust upon the present flattering fortune, is the part (say they) of a wise man indeed and truly happy. And therefore the best course is, to send certain men of purpose unto the Col. for to renew the league upon the same conditions, with which your father Philip had accepted peace hitherfore of T. Quintius the conqueror. For neither (say they) can the war be taken up with greater honour and reputation, than after so memorable a battell; nor ever will there be presented more firm and assured hope of a peace to continue for ever, than upon this occasion, which will work and mollifie the Romans as a man would have them, to come on and assent to any accord, considering they are well tamed with the infortunity of this battell. But in case the Romans upon an inbred peevishness and engrossed pertinacity of theirs, should not hear reason but refuse an indifferent end, then both God and man shall be witness, as well of the moderation of Persius, as of their pride & insolent forwardness. The King was willing enough to give ear to this, and indeed never misliked such discourses; and therefore the advice was approved by the assent of the most part; whereupon ambassadors were sent to the Col. & in a frequent Council assembled, had audience given them. Peace they demanded, and promised that Persius should pay unto the Romans as great a tribute as Philip had covenanted for; and likewise quit the same Cities, coasts, and territories, which Philip had given up and surrendered. To this effect spake the embas-sadors; who being retired aside, the Romans debated in Council, and in the end, Roman constancy imported and had the upper hand: for in those daies the manner and use was, in time of adversity to bear all out and set a good countenance, but in prosperity to hold an even hand and to use governance. So agreed it was to return this answer, That peace might be granted with this condition, That K. Persius should permit full and free power to the Senat of Rome, for to dispose both of his person and the kingdom of Macedony at their good pleasure. When the Embassadors had made relation hereof, this constant resolution and invincible persistance of the Romans made them to wonder again, as being not acquainted with their manners and fashions: and most of them forbid to make mention any more of peace, saying, That the Romans would be glad most ly to seek for that of their own accord, which now at this present they loathed & rejected when it was offered. But Persius mightily feared, that this arrogant spirit of theirs, proceeded from the confidence they had in their own forces; inasmuch as he gave not over so, but assaid to tempt the Col. if haply by augmenting the sum of money, he might buy peace at any price & reckoning whatsoever. But seeing him nothing to come down, nor to alter one jot from the first answer; in despair now of all peace, he returned to Sycrinum from whence he came, purposing once again to try the hazard of the field. Now the fame of this late fight of cavalry was sown over all Greece, and discovered the minds and affections of men: for not only they that took part with the Macedonians rejoiced to hear this news, but also very many of them who were obliged and beholden unto the Romans for benefits and favours received at their hands, and some likewise who had tasted of their violence and proud government. And this they did for no other reason at all, but only upon a foolish and perverse affection, like to that wherewith the common people ordinarily is carried away in the beholding of sports and trial of masteries, even to favour evermore the weaker and him that taketh the foil.

At the same time Lucretius the Prator had with most forcible means assailed the City of Ha- Nartus in Beotia; and albeit the beleaged defendants within were relieved by no forraign aid, but only the youth of the Coronians (who at the beginning of the siege entred the City) nor hoped for any to come; yet they stood out and made resistance with courage of heart more than with strength of hand: for they issued forth many times, and filled upon the fabricks and engines of the enemy, yea & when the ram approached hard to the wall, they let fall thereupon a mighty weight and counterpoise of lead and so depressed and drove it down to the ground. And if haply the enemies who ran with the ram against the wall, avoided the device of their laid battery, and shook into some other place; the townsmen within, raised presently with great speed another mass,
 - piling

H piling up hastily the stones out upon another, which they found lying among the ruins of the breaches. The Consul seeing this manner of service by way of ordinance and battery, is the more slow and tedious, commanded to divide ladders amongst every company, and purposed to insert the City round about, with the Ekeados supposing that the smaller which he had would be sufficient to exploit this enterprise, because on this side where the Town is defended with a marsh, it was bootless (or rather impossible) to assault it. Himself in person presented 5000 select footsoldiers before that part, whereas two towers, and all the wall between was beaten down and overthrown to the end that in the very instant, whilst he assaied to enter at the breaches the town-men should run all thither to repulse him; and in the mean while the wall void of defence might might in some part or other be scaled and won. But they within bestirred themselves lustily to give him the repulse. For having piled in the very open breaches a mighty number of faggots made of olive vine cuttings and such small brush, they stood ready with flaming firebrands and burning links, there standing ever and anon to kindle the same and set all on fire, to the end that being defended from the enemy by the means of fire between they might have time to oppose an inner countenance against them. But by mistake this device and enterprise of theirs was compeached. For there poured down on a sudden such a mighty shower of rain that the faggot would not easily take fire, and look what was set a burning, it soon was quenched again. By which means not only the passage was made open between the smoking faggots drawn apart one from another here and there, but whilst they all intended wholly the defence of that one place, the walls were taken at one instant by ladders yeared up against many and sundry parts thereof. In the first heat upon the winning of the City, old and young, such as chanced to come in their way, without any respect at all of age were put to the sword. The armed soldiers fled into the Castle, and the next day being past hope to make good the place, they yielded and were all sold into the garland in port sale, to them that would bid most, to the number of 2500 men or very near. The ornaments and beaudies of the City, as statues, images, painted tables and pictures, and whatsoever was found in the pillage to bear a better price, was carried to shipbord, and the Town itself raised from the very foundations, and laid even with the ground. From thence the army was conducted to Thebes, which being won without any resistance he put into the hands of the banished persons, and those that took part and sided with the Romans; but those of the contrary faction, such as favoured the King and the Macedonians, he sold by whole families in open market to the best chapmen. Having performed these exploits in Bacchia, he retired himself to the Seaside to his ships.

Whilst these affairs passed thus in Bacchia, Perseus lodged for certain daies in camp at Sycorium.
 Where being advertised, that the Romans made great hast to inn the corn newly reaped down, and to carry it from all parts of the fields unto the leaguer; and that every souldier before his tent cut and shred off the ears as they lay bound in sheaves, to the end they might thrash and drive out the clearest corn, by which occasion they had made great heaps of straw throughout all parts of the camp; he supposed it was an easy matter to set all their tents and pavillions on fire. Whereupon he commanded to provide torches, links and balls made of tow besmeared with pitch and tar: thus provided and furnished, he set out at midnight, that by the dawning of the day, he might put this device in execution without being desired before. But all came to nothing; for the for-most corps de guard although they were surprised with this sudden coming, by their trouble and affright awakened and raised all the rest, and immediately the alarm was given; so as at one instant the souldiers were ready and well appointed at the gates, and upon the rampier bent and preft for to defend the camp. Perseus likewise incontinently turned about with his ensigns, putting his fardage and carriage before, and then commanded the infantry to march after: himself with the cavalry and light armors staid behind to fortify and guard the rereward, supposing (as it fell out indeed) that the enemies would make after to charge upon the tail of the march. His light armed souldiers had some short skirmishing especially with the forlorn hope and loose avant-courriers, but the horse and footmen both, retired without any impeachment into the camp. Thus when all the corn was cut down about those quarters, the Romans dislodged and removed into the territory of Cyrrhon, which as yet was not endamaged. Whilst they lay encamped in security and mistrusting nothing (because the enemies were so far off, and by reason that the way between Sy-curium and Cyrrhon was so difficult for want of water;) behold all on a sudden early in the morning by day light, the Kings cavalry and light armed souldiers shewed themselves upon the hills that overlooked them from above; and put them into great trouble. Departed they were from Sycorium at noon the day before, and had left the infantry behind, about the break of day upon the plain next thereto. For a while he stood upon those said hills, hoping that the Romans might be raised forth to an horse-fight. But perceiving them not to stir at all, he sent one off horseback to command the footmen to retire again to Sycorium, and himself in person followed straight after. The Roman horsemen made after a pretty distance off, if haply they could spie any advantage in one place or other to charge upon them, disbanded and stragling asunder. But when they saw that in their dismarch they kept close together following their guidons and keeping their ranks, they also returned into the camp. After this, the King weary of making so long journees, di-lodged and removed to Alipsum. The Romans for their part likewise having mowed down all the corn of Cyrrhon, passed into the territory of Phalaennum. The King having intelligence by a sennate souldier that the Romans were scattered all over the fields and reaping the standing corn without any guard of armed men, made a rode with 1000 horse & 2000 Candiots & Thracians:

who marching with as great hast as possibly they could upon the Romans as if all were provided; where he took a thousand carts or chariots together with his train, most of them laden, and upon each even besides. The guard and cobbles of this host into the camp he committed to the charge of 300 Cretans. Himself having settled his train dispersed here and there busily in execution and reinforced with the rest of his footmen left them to the sole charge and organisation of the enemies, supposing that with little ado they might be surprised and vanquished. L. Pompeius a Colonel had the command of them, who seeing his soldiers affrighted with the sudden coming of the enemies retired with them to an hill next at hand for to defend himself by the vantage and strength of the place, considering that otherwise in number and force he was too weak. Where after he had cast his men into a bog for to ward against the shot of arrows and darts by a roof and fence of targets coupled close together over their heads. Prasus having environed the hill round about with armed men, commanded some to mount up and assay to win the place on all parts, & possibly they could and then to fight close hand to hand; others he charged to lance, their darts and shoot, their shafts thick at them a far off. The Romans were beset with a double fear: for neither could they maintain skirmish and fight close together because of those who laboured to climb the hill; and say they had broke any ranks with excursions and thrusts upon them, yet were they exposed and lay open to the shot of arrows and darts. Most hurt they had by certain weapons called Cestrophandone [Sling-darts]. A new kind of dart this was and lately devised in the time of this very war. It had a sharp head of iron the length of two hands breadth, and the stinger fast in a steel which was half a cubit long, stid above the thickness of a mans finger: for to flie direct and streight, three feathers it had about it in man of a shaft: the fling from the middle part had two cords of an unequal size: now when as the slinger swung it about, as it lay even poised in the greater capacity of the leather thong, one flew the dart and was driven with violence like a bullet. Many of the soldiers being very sore wounded as well with this weapon as all other sorts of shot, so as now for weariness they were scarce able to bear their own armour: the King was earnestly in hand with them to yeeld and submit, assuring them upon his faithful word their lives, yea and other whiles promised them rewards and recompences. But there was not a man whose heart inclined once thereto. Now as they stood thus stiff and resolute to die there shone upon them a little comfort and some hope of evasion beyond all their expectation. For certain of the foragers and corn purveyors, who hapned to flie for refuge unto the camp, brought word unto the Consul that the corps de guard aforesaid was besieged so hard, where upon being moved with the jeopardy whereto so many citizens stood (for about 900 they were, and all citizens of Rome), he went forth of the camp with the cavalry and light armed soldiers, and unto them joyned certain new succours of the Numidians as well horse as foot together with the Elephants: and gave commandment to the martial Colonels, that the ensignes of the legions should follow after. Himself in person marched before toward the hill aforesaid taking with him a certain number of skirmishers, for to strengthen the light armed auxiliaries. Eumenes, Antalus, and Misagene also the King of the Numidians, flanked the *Col*s on either side. When as the besieged Romans had a sight once of the foremost ensignes of their friends and fellows, they took comfort and courage again upon their former extream despair. Prasus, who had purposed in the first place not to spend any long time in laying siege to this corps de guard but to content himself with the fortunat success which at a venture hapned, in that he had taken and slain some of the foragers: secondly (when he was in some sort entred into that action) to depart (whiles he had means thereof) without any damage received, as knowing that he had no strength, to speak of, about him: yet puffed up and caried as it were above the ground with the conceit of his late good hand, both staid in person to attend the enemies coming, and also sent out in all hast for the [Macedonian] Phalanx. Which coming later than the present necessity required (albeit in great hast they hurried) it fell out so, that they were to encounter (troubled and disordered as they were in running) their enemies that were well appointed and provided aforehand. And the *Col*s, who had prevented them presently welcomed them with battail. At the first, the Macedonians made resistance; but afterwards being in no respect equal unto the enemies, after they had lost three hundred footmen with four and twenty of the most forward and bravest horsemen out of that corps, which they call Sacra (amongst whom Antimachus also their leader died) they endeavoured to retire and be gone. But the way by which they were to pass, was more troublesome to speak of, than the skirmish and battail it self. The Phalanx being sent unto by a messenger in hast, and conducted as hastily, encountered affront in a certain streight a troop of prisoners, and likewise the waggons charged with corn. Who being laid at to give way, thereupon arose a great trouble as well of the one part as the other: whiles no man took heed how to march in order: but the armed souldiers cast down and overthrew the heaps of sardage and baggage, for otherwise there could no way be made: and the draught-beasts being pricked and provoked forward, ragged and made foul work in the press and throng. Hardly and with much ado were they disengaged and rid of this confused and disordered company of captives, when they met with the King his company and the horsemen discomfited. In which place, the noise which they made crying unto the Phalanx. Back again Back again made a fright among them as if there had been something ready to fall upon their heads: in such sort as if their enemies durst have entred into the streight and pursued farther after them, no doubt they had received a great overthrow. But the Consul contenting himself with a mean good hand, in that he had rescued and recovered his corps de guard from the

A the hill, retired with his forces into the camp. Somewhile that there was a great battail fought that day, and how 80000 men were slain, and among them Sipus and Amipus two of the Kings Captains. Also that there were taken prisoners about 2000, and military coffers 17 carried away. Neither was the victory easily gotten but with blood, for not so few as 4000 were slain of the Consul his army, and the guidons of the enemy were lost. This journey reinforced the Romans, but daunted and quailed the enemy in such sort, as after he had laid a few daies at Thessaly, especially about covering the bodies of his dead soldiers, and left a sufficient garrison at Gomus, he retired his army into Macedonia, leaving also at Phila one of his own Captains named Timarchus, with some small forces, whom he commanded to assay the Magnesium and the borderers adjoining. When he was come to Phila, he dismissed his army out of the field, and sent them to their wintering harbors, but himself together with King Corys went to Thessaly.

B Thither news came that Artabazus a pety King of the Thracians, and Corragus a Captain under King Eumenes, had invaded the marches of Corys, and were masters of the country which they call Marene. And therefore supposing that he must needs discharge Corys to look to the defence of his own realm, he bestowed rich presents upon him at his departure: and gave him 200 talents for six months wages of his cavalry, whereas at the beginning he purposed to be at the charge of a whole years pay.

The Consul after he heard that Perseus was gone, approached with his army neer to Gomus, and there lodged: if haply he might force and gain that also. Situated it was over against Temperat the very mouth and gullet of the streights, and is the very frontier Town, yielding both a most assured defence and strength to all Macedonia, and also a commodious passage for the Macedonians to enter into Thessaly. And being a place impregnable, as well for the naturall site thereof, as the strong garrison therein planted, he gave over the enterprise. So turning and bending his way into Perrechia, after he had forced Mallac at the first assault and put into the rancke: and received Tripolis with the rest of Perrechia, yielded by composition, he returned to Lusitania. And then having sent Eumenes and Antas home into their own country, and bestowed Macedonia and the Numidians in divers Cities of Thessaly neer at hand to remain there for the winter time, and distributed part of his forces throughout all Thessaly, in such sort, that not only they had all commodious wintering but also served in stead of garrisons to the Cities. Q. Mutius his Lieutenant he sent with a regiment of 2000 men to guard Ambracia and keep it in obedience. All the confederats of the D Greek Cities, save only the Acheans he licensed to depart. With one part of his army he went into Thessaly in Phibia, where he rased down to the ground Pileum abandoned of the inhabitants. But Ambracia he won with the good will of the Townsmen. Then afterward he approached before Lusitania with his forces. The City was left desolat, for all the people were retired into the fortres, the which he began to assault: and first the Kings garrison of Macedonians quit the place of whom the Townsmen being forsaken and left to themselves, submitted incontinently. Then he stood in doubt whether he should assail Damascus first, or have an eye and look into the troubles and state of Babia. For the men of Thessa being grievously molested and annoied by those of Corona, had sent for him into Babia: at whose prayers, thither he conducted his army: and besides, Babia was a country more commodious to winter in than Magnesia.

The three and fortieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the three and fortieth Book;

Divers Pretors were judicially condemned, for demeaning themselves with cruelty and avarice in the administration of their Provinces. P. Licinius Crassus the Pro-consul, won by force many Cities in Greece, and cruelly risted them. For which rigour of his, the captives whom he had sold under the garland in open market, were by an order directed out of the Senat, restored afterward to their former estates. The Admirals of the Roman fleet committed many outrages and enormities against their allies. Besides, there are comprised in this book, the prosperous affairs of King Perseus in Thrace, after he had vanquished the Dardaniens and subdued Illyricum, whereof Gentius was King. The troubles which began in Spain by means of Olonicus, were appeased by his death. M. Manlius Lepidus, was by the Censors created president of the Senat.

The three and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

The same summer, wherein the Romans won the victory with horse-fight in Thessaly, the Lieutenant being sent into Illyricum from the Consul, compelled by force and arms two rich Towns to yeeld unto which nevertheless he gave all their goods again, to the end that by an opinion of this clemency, he might win the hearts of the inhabitants of

Cornelius, that strong City. But when he saw that he could not constrain them to repeller, no more than force them by force; because his soldiers should not seem to have been wearied for nothing in the besieging of two Towns, he fell to rife and smelt that, which before he left unattempted. The other Consul C. Cassius neither performed any memorable exploit in Gaul, which was his Province by lot; and having endeavoured to conduct his legions through Hyrcania into Macedonia, all his designment came to no effect at all. That the Consul was entered upon this journey the Senat was certified by the Embassadors of the Aquileians; who complained that their colony newly erected was feeble, and not as yet well secured among those fierce nations of Illyrians and Hyrcians; and wistful they made suit, that the Senat would provide and take order, that the said colony might be fortified: and when the question was put unto them, Whether they would be content that commission should be directed unto C. Cassius in that behalf? they answered, That the said Cassius, having assembled his army at the River Adriaticus in Aquileia, was departed through Scythia into Macedonia. This at first was thought incredible; and every man supposed vainly, that he had been gone to levy war upon the Carnians haply or the Illyrians. The Aquileians were able to reply no farther, nor a firm more upon their knowledge than this, That allowance of corn was made for the soldiers to serve thirty daies, and that guides were sought and brought out, who knew the waies out of Italy into Macedonia. Hereat the Senat (ye may be fore) took great fume and was highly displeased, that the Consul should be so hasty to leave his own Province for to pass into that which belonged to another, and to lead his army an unknown and new way, and the same dangerous, through strange and forraign countries, thereby to open passage as it were, for so many nations to come into Italy. Whereupon in a frequent assembly of the Senators, there passed a decree, That C. Sulpicius the Pretor should nominate three Embassadors out of the body of the Senat, for to depart out of the City that present day, to make all the hast they possibly could to overtake the Consul wheresoever he was, and to give him warning to levy no war against any nation without direct warrant from the Senat. And these Embassadors went, namely, M. Cornelius Cethegus, M. Fulvius, and P. Martinus Rex. The present fear as touching the Consul and the army, was the occasion that the care of fortifying Aquileia was deferred for that time.

After this, were the Embassadors of certain States in both Provinces of Spain admitted to come into the Senat: who complained of the covetousness and pride of the Roman Officers and Governours among them; humbly beseeching the Senat upon their knees, Not to suffer them (being allies and confederats) to be more shamefully pillied and spoiled than the very enemies. Among other indignities for which they shewed themselves aggrieved, notorious it was, that the said Magistrates had taken bribes, yea, and used extortion in wringing monies from them. Whereupon a commission was granted to L. Canuleius the Pretor (unto whom Spain by lot was fall) to ordain five judges or commissioners (and those out of the rank and degree of Senators) for every person of whom the Spaniards claimed to recover such monies; and likewise to permit the plaintiffs to take unto them what Advocats and Counsel they would. Then, after those Embassadors were called again into the Senat, this decree and act of the Senat was read unto them; and willed they were to nominate their Advocats; who named four, to wit, M. Porcius Cato, P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Cn., L. Emilius Paulus the son of Marcus, and C. Sulpicius Gallus. And first they took commissioners to proceed against M. Titinius, who had been Pretor in the higher Province of Spain, when An. Manlius and M. Junius were Consuls. Twice was the cause of the accused party adjourned to a farther time, but at the third session he was quit and found unguilty. Then arose some variance and dissension between the Embassadors of those two Provinces. The Scipios of this higher Spain, took for their patrons and Advocats, M. Cato and Scipio; they of the farther and lower Spain, made choice of L. Paulus and Gallus Sulpicius. They of high Spain convented before the delegate judges, P. Furius Philus; the other of the base Spain, M. Marienus. Philus had been L. Deputy there three years past, when Sp. Posthumius and Q. Mutius were Consuls; but this Marienus two years before, during the Consulship of L. Posthumius and M. Popilius. Charged they were both of them with right grievous matters and imputations, and a farther day granted of a final judgment: but when they were to answer judicially again, they made default, and for excuse it was alledged, that they were both out of the country; and so they departed into voluntary exile, Furius to Praneste, and Marienus to Tyber. The voice went, that the patrons of the plaintiffs would not suffer them to follow process still against such noble and great personages: and the suspicion hereof was more pregnant, by reason that Canuleius the Pretor let this matter fall, and began to take musters and levy soldiers for the war; and so forth with directly went into the Province, to the end that no more men should be brought into question and troubled by these Spaniards. By this means, all former matters past were buried in silence and no more speech made of them; but for future time, the Senat took order and provided for the Spaniards so well, that they obtained an immunity, That no Roman Magistrate should have power and authority to set the price upon any gain, nor force the Spaniards to sell the Pisces at what rate he pleased to set down: also that there should be no commissioners appointed within their Towns for the gathering and receiving of the revenues and monies issuing from thence. Besides, there came another embassy of a sort of people out of Spain, after a new and strange manner: for there were above four hundred persons, avouching themselves the children of Roman soldiers and Spanish women not joyned in wedlock: who appeared before the Senat and besought them, for

A to allow them a City to inhabit, whereupon Clodius was, that they should enter their names and be inscribed before the Pretor L. Cassius: and look where soever of them he attracted and made use, those they thought meet to be sent to Carthage near the Sea side, and there planted also that those Carthaginians who were willing still to keep home and remain there, should be privileged as Colonists and be enrolled, and to enjoy besides a portion of Land assigned unto them. This was the Latin Colony, and was called the Colony of the Libertines.

At the same time there came an Ambassador out of Africa, Gaius the son of Masanius, and he wrote the Carthaginian Embassy. Gaius first was brought into the Senat, who declared what his father had sent unto them against the Macedonians: promising withal, that if it pleased them to support him upon him, he would be ready to perform the same in remembrance of the benefits B received from the people of Rome: finally, he gave the LL. of the Senat a caveat by the way to take heed that the Carthaginians deceived them not in the end: for that resolved they were, and went in hand to prepare a great navy under pretence of sending it to the Romans against the Macedonians: which if it were once ready fitted and furnished it was in their choice then to make whom they would either friends or foes.

Being entered the camp and viewing the heads aloft, they struck such a fear, that if immediately the army had come forward and advanced against them, the camp might have been won: and yet even then as it was, they fled again: and some there were who gave their opinion, to send Embassadors to treat and with prayers to intreat for peace. Upon the news reported hereof, many Cities submitted and were surrendered. Such as made excuse, and laid the fault upon the folly of two persons only, who had of their own accord offered themselves to be punished, obtained pardon of the Pretor. And then forthwith he went in expedition against other Cities: but finding them all ready to do whatsoever they were commanded, he passed quietly with his army through that country in peace, which but a while before was all up in arms and on a fight fire. This lenity of the Pretor, which he used in taming and subduing this most fierce and proud nation without effusion of blood, was by so much more acceptable to the LL. of the Senat and the whole body of the people, as the Consul Ennius and the other Pretor Lucius had warred in Greece with greater cruelty and avance. As for Lucius, the Tribuns of the Commons accused him daily in their ordinary Orations before the people for his absence: Notwithstanding his excuse was alleged, that so long as he was, and employed about the affairs of the State. But in those daies, so unknown were

D things done hand by, that even at that present he was at his farm within the territory of Arpinum, and busy in conveying a conduct of water out of the river Crus unto Arpinum: the charges whereof he defraied with the money which out of the tale of prizes taken from the enemies. Some say that he bargained to have that piece of work effected, for the sum of a hundred and 1000 Aes. Moreover he embellished and adorned the Temple of Esculapius, with the painted tables found in the pillage. The envy and ill will, the obloquy also and dishonor like to grow to Lucius, turned upon his successor Hortensius, by occasion of the Embassadors of Abdera, who in private were complained with tears before the Senat, that their Town was by Hortensius forced and ransacked. How the cause of this ruin and destruction of their City was no more but this, that being enjoined by him to make payment of a hundred thousand Denarii, and allowance of fifty thousand Modii of wheat, they requested some respite of time, wherein they might address their Embassadors, as well to Hortensius the Consul as unto Rome, concerning this imposition. For scarcely were they come unto the said Consul, but they heard how their City was forced, the principal Citizens thereof beheaded, and all the rest sold in port-sale under the yoke. These were grievous indignities in the sight of the Senat, whereupon they passed the same ordinance in the behalf of the Abderites, that the year before had been directed in the like case as touching the Corinthians: and commanded the Pretor Q. Manius to publish the said decree before the publick assembly of the people. In like manner two Commissioners were sent, namely, C. Sempromius Blaesus, and S. Julius Cæsar for to re-establish the Abderites in their freedom: who also had in charge to signify from them, both to the Consul Hortensius, and also to the Pretor Hortensius. That the Senat judged the hostility offered unto the Abderites unjust, and the war unlawful, and therefore that all such as were brought into servitude, should be sought out and restored again to liberty.

At the same time presentation was made unto the Senat of certain complaints against C. Cassius who had been Consul the year before, and at that time was employed in quality of a Colonel-marshal together with A. Fabius in Macedonia. Likewise there arrived the Embassadors of Clitarchus a pery King of the Gauls. A brother of his having audience granted in the Senat made a speech, wherein he complained, that C. Cassius had given the waite to the lands and territories of the people inhabiting the Alps, who were their allies and confederats, and from thence had led a way into captivity many thousand persons. And much at one instant there came the Embassadors of the Carnians, Illyrians and Iapides with complaints against Cassius. That first he had enjoined them to furnish him with guides for to shew and direct him the best way to march with his army into Macedonia, and so departed in peace from them, as if he had meant to ware else where: but afterwards out of the midway of his journey he returned upon them and in hostile manner overran them from front, robbing, spoiling & burning where soever he went: and to this day they cannot devise and know the reason, wherefore the Consul should hold them for enemies and deal so cruelly by them. As well the Prince of the Gauls aforesaid being absent as these Embassadors in place received this answer, That as touching the outrages for which they shewed themselves grieved, the Senat neither knew thereof beforehand, that ever they were intended, nor yet approved of the same, since they were committed. But against all right and equity it were to condemn unbesought in his own defence, and absent, such a personage as he is, namely a man who had been Consul: considering also that his employment about the C. W. is the occasion of his absence. When C. Cassius once returned out of Macedony, then if they would they themselves and accuse him face to face, the Senat would hear the cause and take knowledge accordingly: yea, and endeavour that they should be satisfied and contented. Moreover, thought good it was that these nations should not be dispatched only with this bare answer, but that Embassadors also should be sent: two unto the foresaid King beyond the Alps: and other three to the people above named, for to acquaint them with the resolution of the Lords of the Senat. And they gave order besides to send presents to each of the Embassadors to the value of two thousand Asles over and above, to the two Princes that were brethren, these gifts following, to wit, two chains of gold weighing after they were wrought five pound of gold: also five peeces of plate in silver, amounting to the weight of twenty pound: two bard horses with their riders and lackies: likewise horsemens armour and their cassocks: and liveries likewise for all those of their train, as well bond as free. These were the things sent unto them. But at their own request granted it was besides, that they might for their money buy each of them ten horses, and be allowed to transport them out of Italy. The Embassadors sent with the Gauls beyond the mountains, were C. Laelius and M. Emylius Lepidus: to the other nations C. Sicinius, P. Cornelius Blasio, and T. Memmius.

* Rome a goddess.

Moreover, there met together in Rome at once, the Embassadors of many States both of Greece and Asia. And first the Athenians were brought into the Senat, who related, That they had sent unto the Consul P. Licinius and the Pretor C. Lucretius, what shipping they had, and all the fighting men they were able to make: but seeing they had no use of them, they had raised a levy of a hundred thousand Modii of corn. Which albeit their land was but barren for tillage, and the very husbandmen themselves lived of forrain corn brought in unto them, yet they had made means to do accordingly, because they would not seem to be wanting in any dutifull service: and willing they were yet, and prest to perform whatsoever they would require. The Milesians for their part said, That hitherto they had done nothing, marry they offered themselves to be ready to accomplish all that the Senat should command them toward this war. The Alabandians shewed, That they had built a * Temple to the City of Rome, and obtained besides, that in the honour of that goddess there should be a solemnity of games and plaies exhibited every year. Also, that they had brought with them for a present, a crown of gold weighing fifty pound, to set it up in the Capitol as a gift and offering to Jup. Opt. Max. and withal, three hundred horsemens shields, which they were minded to bestow upon those, unto whom it pleased them to appoint and command. Their petition was, that they might be permitted to offer their present in the Capitol, and there to sacrifice. The men of Lampascus came with a golden crown weighing fourcore pound, protesting, That they had quit and abandoned Perseus, so soon as ever the Roman army was arrived in Macedony, notwithstanding they owed allegiance unto Perseus, and were homagers to his father Philip before him. In which consideration as also for that they had performed their devoir to their full power to the Roman Generals, they requested no other favour to be gratified withal, but to be received into the amity of the people of Rome: and in case there should be peace concluded with Perseus, that they might be excepted and exempted in the accord, for being reduced under his obedience. The rest of the Embassadors had a gracious answer returned unto them. As for the Lampascens, order was given to Q. Manius the Pretor, to enter and enrol them in the number of allies. Every one of these Embassadors were rewarded with a present worth two thousand Asles. The Alabandians were appointed to carry back with them into Macedony their shields aforesaid, and to deliver them unto A. Hostilius the Consul. Over and besides, the Carthaginian Embassadors out of Africk, made relation that they had brought from thence ten hundred thousand Modii of wheat, and five hundred thousand of barley, which they had on shipboard at the sea-side, ready to cary the same wheresoever the Senat would appoint. This benevolence of theirs they accompanied with good words, saying, they knew well that this gift and recognisance of their duty, was inferior either to their own good will, or the demerits of the people of Rome. Howbeit many times heretofore they had shewed themselves to do the part of thankful, faithful, and trusty allies, in all things tending to the profit and good of both states. In like sort the Embassadors of Masanissa promised the same proportion of corn, with 1200 horse, and twelve Elephants, assuring them in his name, to do whatsoever the Senate would impose and should be thought needful: and that with as free an heart as the benevolence offered of his own accord. Thanks being given both to the Carthaginians and also to the King, requested they were to transport over into Macedony to the Consul A. Hostilius, those things which they had promised. To the Embassadors were sent by way of presents, two thousand Asles apeece. The Cretensian Embassadors, related how they had sent into Macedony such a number of Archers, as the Consul P. Licinius had imposed upon them: and when they denied not upon the question asked, that there served more Archers of theirs under Perseus than with the Romans, this answer was made unto them, That if the Cretensians would well and truly and in good earnest prefer the friendship of the people of Rome before that of King Perseus, the Senat of Rome likewise would give them answer as certain and assured allies: in the mean while, they should let their country-men to understand, stand, that it was the will and pleasure of the Senat, that the Cretensians should with all speed possible call home all those souldiers whom they had in any garnison of King Perseus. The Candians being dismissed with this dispatch, then the Chalcidians were called in: and at the very first sight of them, it soon appeared upon what terms of necessity they were driven to send an embassage: when Micion the chief man among them, by occasion that he was lame with the gout in his feet, was brought into the Senat in a litter, in which extremity diseased as he was, there was no pleading of any excuse by his lameness, nor craving pardon, since he was to go without, when he had all done. He began by way of preface and preamble, saying, "He had nothing left alive but his tongue, for to deplore and bewail the calamities of his country: then he went forward, and first shewed what courtesies and good turns the State wherein he lived had performed to the Caprains General and armies of the Romans, both of old, and also of late in the war against Perseus. After this he declared what parts of pride, covetousness, and cruelty, first C. Lucretius a Roman Pretor had exercised upon his countrymen, and afterwards what L. Hortensius practised, at that time above all others: also how the Chalcidians were resolved to endure all calamities, were they more grievous than those which they presently suffered rather than they would yield to Perseus. And as for Lucretius and Hortensius, they knew full well, that it had been better and more for their safety to have shut their gates against them, than to receive them into their City. For such as had excluded them forth, as namely they of Emathia, Amphipolis, Maronea, and Euss, remain still entire and in good estate; but with us (say they) the Temples have been robbed of all their beautiful ornaments, and utterly spoiled by these sacrileggers, C. Lucretius hath carried all away by water over to Asinum, and hath led away into bondage and captivity the persons free born. So as the goods and fortunes of the allies of the people of Rome both have been and daily are pillaged & rifled. For according to the use & fashion brought up by C. Lucretius, Hortensius likewise houseeth his mariners as well in summer as winter, and our houses are full of a rabble of these sailors and sea-men, in such sort as our wives and children be forced to converse among such grooms as make no account at all what either they say or do. Hereupon thought good it was to send for Lucretius into the Senat, that he might see his accuser, answer face to face, and purge himself of these challenges. But when he was come in place, he heard much more in presence, than had been spoken against him in his absence. Over and besides, there shewed themselves and joined together against him two other more stout adversaries and bitter accusers, to wit, M. Inuentius Tullius and C. Hostilius. And these two not only coured him before the Senat, but also having drawn him perforce into the general assembly of the people, and charged him before them with many reproaches, took out process also and arrested him to make his appearance and answer judicially at a day before the people. Then Q. Manius the Pretor, by order from the Senat, answered the Chalcidians in this manner: Whereas ye alledge and say, That ye have well deserved of the people of Rome both heretofore and also in this present war now in hand, the Senat knoweth all that to be true, and accepteth the same thankfully in the best part, as of right they ought. As touching your grievances and complaints for the lewd parts which C. Lucretius hath plaied, and which L. Hortensius still practiseth (both Pretors of Rome) the same neither have been nor are committed and done by the will and allowance of the people of Rome. For who would not judge so of it, that knoweth how they levied war upon King Perseus and his father Philip before him, for to enfranchise Greece and set it at liberty: and not that their allies and friends should thus hardly be intreated by their Magistrates and Governors sent from hence? Write therefore they would unto L. Hortensius the Pretor, to let him understand, that the Senate is not well pleased with these pranks of his which the Chalcidians complain of. Also if any free born persons were become thrall and bound; that with all convenient speed he should take order to seek them up and restore them again to their former freedom. Last of all, that they deemed it meet and reason, that no sailer or mariner, but only the masters of ships should be lodged and entertained in your houses. And these were the contents of the letters written unto Hortensius, by commandment from the Senat. Unto the Embassadors were gifts sent, to every one as much as came to 2000 Asles. As for Micion, he was allowed his carriage in chariots at the charges of the City, and order given that he should with all ease ride in them to Brundisium. As for C. Lucretius, when the day of appearance was come, the Tribuns commended an action against him before the people, to be a fined at a million of Asles. And in a general assembly and Session holden for this purpose, cast he was and condemned by the suffrages of all the tribes, even thirty five and no fewer.

In Diguntia no memorable exploit was that year performed: for neither the enemies entred into arms, nor the Consul led his legions into their country: and when he was assured of peace for that year, he discharged the souldiers of two Roman legions, within 60 daies after his first coming into the Province. As for the army of the Latine allies, he brought it early into the Cities of Luna and Pisa, there to winter: and then himself with the cavalry visited most of the Cities in the Province of Gallia. In no place was there any war but in Macedony: howbeit they had in suspicion Geminus and the King of the Illyrians. Therefore the Senate ordained to send from Brundisium eight ships ready armed and fully furnished, unto the Lieutenant C. Furius at Issa, who was Governor of the Iland with the guard and strength of two Issian Vessels: in which were put aboard and shipped 2000 souldiers, which Q. Manius the Pretor by a warrant directed out of the Senat, enrolled in that quarter of Italy which lieth opposite to Illyricum. In like manner the Consul Hostilius sent

In the beginning of the year next following, after that the new Coss, Q. Martins and Q. Septimius, had moved in the Senate as touching their provinces, advised it was, That with all speed possible they should either agree between themselves, or else call lots for the governments in Italy and in Macedonia. And before that the lots determined this matter so doubtful and uncertain, to the end that nothing afterwards should be done for favour partially, thought good it was, to ordain before hand a competent and sufficient number of soldiers for the supplement of the armies in both Provinces; namely, for Macedonia 6000 footmen of Romans, and as many of Latine allies: 250 horsemen Romans, and 300 allies: also to call the old soldiers, as in every Roman legion there should not be above 6000 foot and 300 horse. As for the other Coss, he was not paged with any certain list of Roman citizens to be levied for the full accomplishment of his legions.

Only this was determin'd for down, That he should enrol two legions, and either of them to contain 500 foot and 200 horse: but for footmen of Latins, he had a greater number allowed than his colleague: namely, 1000 foot and 600 horse. Moreover, commandment was given to enrol four legions more, to be led forth into the field, upon what need and occasion forever should fall out. The Marshal-Colonels of the army the Consuls might not be permitted to elect, but created they were by the people. The allies of the Latine nation were enjoined to set out fifteen thousand foot and a thousand horse: And this power was only to be in steadiness at all hours wanting, for to be led forth as occasion should be offered. Their principal care was about Macedon. Ordained also it was, That for the service at Sea, there should be enrolled to serve the navy, of the Roman citizens (such as were libertines and newly enfranchised) but of all parts of Italy not thousand; and as many out of Sicily: And unto whether of the Consuls the Province of Macedon fell, he should give order for their transporting thither, to the armada wheresoever it was; For Spain there were three thousand Roman footmen and three hundred horsemen appointed to make up the decayed bands. There also, a certain number was set down for every legion, to wit, five thousand foot and three hundred and thirty horse. Moreover, that Consul whose lot was to govern in Spain, had commission to levy of the allies four thousand footmen, and three hundred horse.

I am not ignorant, that from the same prophane negligence and irreligion, whereby commonly men now saies are of belief, that the Gods portend and fore-signify nothing to come by signs and tokens: it proceedeth also, That no prodigies which happen, should any more, either be published and reported abroad, or recorded in the annals and chronicles. Howbeit, for mine own part, in writing of these acts and monuments of ancient times, I know not how, but me thinks I carry a mind, that is become (as it were) antique also: yea, and some scrupulous devotion inquit in my spirit, which moveth me to account the things not unworthy to have place in my histories, which those sage fathers and most prudent personages in old time thought meet to be considered of by the State, yea, and to require publick expiation. Well, to proceed, from Anagn were two fearful fights reported that year, namely, That alarming and blasting flame was seen in the skie; and a cow known to speak, lapt and nourished at the publick charges. At Mimurna also much about those daies, the well in flames to be on a light fire. At Roma there fell a shower that raised bones. In the forests at Comis the image of Apoll wept three daies and three nights continually. In the City of Rome, two famous or keepers of the Temples made report, the one, That in the Church of Fortuna there was a Serpent seen by many men, crested with a mane: the other, That about the chappel of Fortuna Primigenia, which standeth upon the Capitol hill, there hapned two divers and different prodigious signs, namely, That in the Chappel-yard there sprung up a palm-tree; and all one day it rained blood. Two other strange things there were, whereof there was no regard nor account made: the first, because it chanced in a privat place; for T. Martius Figulus reported, That there grew up a palm or date-tree in his corn-field: the second, because it hapned in a forrain place: for spoken it was, That at Fregellan in the house of M. Aruns, a lance or spear which he had bought for his son a souldier, burned in the day time for two hours space and more, yet so, as the fire consumed nothing thereof. In regard of those publick prodigies, the Decemvirs had recourse to the books of Sibylla, who one of them declared, That the Consuls should sacrifice forty head, of greater beasts, and they flewed also to what Gods. They added moreover and gave advice to hold a publick procession, and that all the Magistrats at every shrine and upon every altar of the Gods should sacrifice greater beasts, and the people wear garlands and chaplets of flowers. All things were executed accordingly, as the Decemvirs suggested and directed.

After this, the assembly was published for the chusing of Censors. In election there were for this dignity of Censorship, the very principal persons and of best note in all the City, C. Valerius Maximus, L. Postumius Albinus, P. Mucius Scaevola, C. Junius Bruttus, C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. These two last regarded the people of Rome these for Censors. When as by occasion of the Macedonian war, a greater care was had about the taking of musters, than at other times before, the Consuls found much fault with the common people, and complained unto the Senat, that the young and able men for service being called would not answer to their names. But C. Sulpicius and M. Claudius two Tribunes of the Commons, maintained the cause against them in the behalf of the Commons, saying, That it was no hard and difficult matter for Consuls to levy souldiers: many for corrupt, affectionate and popular Consuls, it was not so easy a thing, and namely, such as would be sure to enrol no souldiers against their wills. And to the end that the LL. of the Senat might know this to be a truth, they should see the Pretors (if the Senat were to content, and thought well thereof) which power of not man had liberty of government it was left them the Consuls, to go through with the duties of government, but because charge was committed to the Pretors with the great authority, they were not without some backbiting and detraction of the People, and the Consuls, to avoid this forward charge, made it known, and notified in the full assembly of the people, that they would publish nothing as touching the raising and estimate of every mans duties, nor of his liberty, but beside the ordinary path of all citizens, they that were to these powers in this sort following: As the usual duty, six and forty years of age: then by virtue of the edict made by the Consuls, Ætæadæus and Tib. Sempronius, come forth and show thy self, or the musters of others, so that shall be only levy taken, and what Consuls hereafter shall happen so be in place, this shall be observed in case thou wert not a prest soldier before. Moreover because they perceived, that many soldiers of the Macedonian legions were absent from the army, and had obtained large passports without limitation of return, and that through the corruption and favour of the Generals, they published an edict as touching the soldiers enrolled by Macedonius when P. Ælius and G. Papirius were Consuls, or any time since. That as many of them as remained within Italy, after they were enrolled and registered first under their hands, should within thirty daies return again to their countries into the province: and whosoever of them were in the disposition of further grandeur, their names should be preferred and declared before the People. Scarcely, they would take knowledge of their caities who were clean dismissed and called: and look in themselves whether judged to have obtained their discharge by any special grace and favour, before they had served out their full term by law: quited they would command them to be enrolled soldiers again. By virtue of this edict of the Consuls as also by their letters sent out and divulged abroad in all incorporate City and places of resort for market and men hand, there assembled together and came to Rome such a multitude of lusty, young, and able men, that their unusual and extraordinary number was chargeable and cumbersome to the City. Thus besides the former levy taken of those that were to be sent and employed in supply of the old armies four legions more were enrolled by G. Sulpicius the Pretor, and within eleven daies the musters were accomplished and ended.

Then the Consuls cast lots for their provinces. For the Pretors had their governments allotted unto them before, and the sooner, by reason of the civil troubles which required their jurisdiction. The one over the citizens was given to G. Sulpicius, the other over soldiers to G. Decimus. M. Claudius Marcellus obtained the regiment of Spain, Ægrius, Quintilius of Sicily, P. Furius of Capitula ruled Sardinia, G. Marius Fignulus had the conduct of the navy. And then, Isid. to Q. Servilius one of the Consuls fell the government of Italy, and to Q. Marius that other of Adriaticum. This Marius so soon as the Latin league were solemnised, departed toward his province immediately. After this, upon the motion of Capitula to the Senate to know their pleasure, which two legions of the new be should conduct into Gallia? the Senate answered, that the Pretors G. Sulpicius and M. Claudius should give unto the Consuls, which it pleased them of those legions that they had enrolled. This he took to the heart, that he a Consul was thus subjected to the will of the Pretors: yet after the Senate was risen, he stood waiting at the Tribunal of the Pretors, and required them according to the order set down by the Senate to sign him his two legions. But the Pretors submitted the choice thereof to the Consuls. This done, the Censors took a review of the Senate and chose new Senators, and M. C. Cæcilius Lepidus was elected president of the Senate and these were the third Senators that made choice of him: consequently one after another seven were displaced and deposed from their Senators dignity. Now in taking the number of the people, and in assessing them, they compelled conscription into Macedonia those who were departed from the army there: and by means of this assessment, they soon knew who were absent from their companies: they examined them for what causes they were discharged from soldierly, and whose licence they judged not to be grounded, edged, and sufficient reason that they found to make the military oath again in this manner and form: According to the edict of G. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius the Censors, thou shalt well and truly swear, to return willingly and with all thine heart, into the province of Macedonia, and this shalt thou do to thy power without fraud or covin. In making the review of them that served on horseback their custom was executed with great rigour and extremity. They took from many their horses of service: upon which occasion having given offence to the whole state of Knights and Gentlemen of Rome, they blew the coals and kindled the fire of ill-will and heart-burning against themselves: by a certain edict of theirs besides, whereby they intimated, That none of them who in time that Q. Furius and An. Postumius the Censors had taken to farm the revenues, fruits and profits of the City, or undertaken at a price the publick works and provisions, should be so hardy as to present themselves to their spear set up, either to be farmers or undertakers, no, nor to be pinner, or have any thing to do with those that were in such negotiation, commerce and bargain. The old Publicans and farmers had oftentimes complained hereof to the Senate: but when they could obtain no comfort from them, to moderate and abridge this infinite power of the Censors, at length they met with a Tribune of the Commons, one Rutilius, to stand with them and defend their cause: a man who upon a particular and private quarrel of his own was offended and bare a grudge against the Censors. And this was the occasion: They had commanded one of his late vassals and enfranchised retainers, to pull down a wall standing in the street Servius over against a publick edifice: pretending that the said wall was built upon the City ground. The man a private person, called upon the

the Tribunes for their lawful help and favour: but when as one of them all but only this Rutilius would meddle in the matter and interpose their helping hand, the Censors sent to strain and take gages for to bind him in answer thereto, and before the body of the people intended and stood against him, and for a glorious fine upon the head of his party aforesaid. By means, I say, of this debate begun upon such an occasion, when as the old publicans betook themselves for succoured this Tribune, presently there was a bill presented and subscribed with the name of the said Tribune alone, in this form. That what public revenues and profits of the State, C. Claudius and T. Sempronius had to farm for, for a year, nor what public works and provisions they had put out to be made and purchased at a price, the same laws and bargains should not stand for good but be cancelled, and new demands drawn and made. Also that it might be lawful for all men indifferently either to be farmers or undertakers of the premises. And the said Tribune assigned a day for a general assembly and session, to have this bill to be cast by the voices of the people. When the day was come, the Censors advanced and put themselves forward to dissuade and plead against the bill. So long as Gracchus spake, he was heard with patience and silence. But at Claudius, when he opened his mouth, they hissed and kept muttering, so as he was forced by an ovium made by the criers to procure audience, which being made, the Tribune found himself grieved and complained that the people there assembled were withdrawn and called away from him, to the prejudice of his authority and honour, and with that sang out of the Capitol where this assembly was holden. The next day, he kept a great coil and made a toul stir: first, he interdicted the goods of Tib. Gracchus as condemned and accursed, for that in setting a fine, and straining gages of him, who had appealed to a Tribune, and in not obeying and condescending to his opposition, he seemed to set light by his Tribunes authority, and prejudice his reputation. As for C. Claudius, he arrested him to answer at a day, for that he had withdrawn the assembly from him: nay, he professed that he would indite both the Censors of treason or felony in the highest degree, and required Sulpicius Petron for the citizens, a day of affixes for their judicial tryal. The Censors refused not to have this matter put to as issue with all speed, and to be tried by the doom of the people. So the time for the hearing and determining of this heinous crime of majesty or treason aforesaid, was assigned the 8. daies immediately before the eight and seventh calends of October. Upon this, the Censors incontinently ascended up into the Porch of Liberty, where after they had made fore and sealed the public Registers and Records, shut up and locked all the offices of the Chancery, and discharged for the time the public Clerks and proto-Notaries attending upon that Court, they promised that they would not go in hand with any public affairs of State, before the sentence and judgment of the people were passed upon them. The day came, and Claudius first pleaded his own cause and spake for himself: and when of twelve Centuries that were of Gentlemen, eight had found the Censors guilty and cast him, yea, and many other centuries of the first Classis. Then presently, the principal persons of the City in the very sight of the people, changed their weed, laid away their rings, and went about from one to another in humble manner, to crave the commons to be good unto the Censors. But that which most of all either staid or reversed the definitive doom against him, was (by report) Tib. Gracchus himself the other Censor: for that when the commons cried from all parts, that there was no danger growing toward Gracchus, he swore by express words, That if his colleague were condemned, he would (without attending the judgment of the people as touching himself) accompany him into banishment. Howbeit the defendant and accused person, was driven to this meer point and hard exigent of extremity, that he came within eight centuries of being cast and condemned. Thus when Claudius was acquit, the Tribune said he would not trouble and molest Cynabrus.

This year at the earnest suit of the Aquileian Embassadors unto the Senat, for to have the number of their colonies increased: a shopland and five hundred families (by vertue of a decree granted out of the Senate) were enrolled: and for the conducting of them to Aquileia, were sent as Triumvirs or commissioners these three, to wit, T. Annius Luscus, P. Decius Subulo, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. The same year C. Papilius and Cn. Octavius Embassadors, who had been sent into Greece, having first read and published at Thebes the act and ordinance of the Senat, carried it afterwards throughout all the Cities of Peloponnesus, to this effect, That no person should contribute toward the wars, and put into the hands of the Roman Magistrate, more than that which the Senat had set down. This put them in good hope and assurance for the future time, that they should be eased of those charges and expenses, by which they were impoverished and wasted, while every one imposed upon them some taxation or other, and never gave them repose. In the Achean general council holden at Argos, they had audience given them and were heard in gracious sort: from whence leaving a most loyal and faithful nation in singular good hope of happy estate for the time to come, they passed into Ætolia. There was as yet no sedition broken out there: but all were in jealousy and suspicion one of another, and full of mutual accusations: in regard of which jar and troubles, the Embassadors only demanded hostages, and without any other end made, went directly into Acroania. The Acroanians granted unto these Embassadors a Dia to be holden at Tyrrebania, where some debate was between the partakers of diverse factions. Some principal men of the States, required that there should be garrisons received into their Cities, to bridle the wilful folly of those that inclined to the Macedonian nation: others gainst this course, and besought the contrary, for fear lest that peaceable and confederat Cities should be put to receive that disgrace and dishonour, which usually falls upon known enemies and those that are conquered by force of arms. And this request was happily granted. Then the Ambassadors returned to Drusus unto Ulpian the Pro-consul for from thence they were employed in embassage. Octavius he retained still with him; but Agrippa together with his roots soldiers on very secret, he sent to Ambracia, there to lodge for the winter time. Perseus in the beginning of winter durst not go forth to the frontiers of Thrace; for he knew the Romans would invade with violence his realm in some place or other. If they found it cold and disurnished. But toward the middle of December about mid-winter, when by reason of the deep snow the mountains are impassable and unsupportable from out of Thrace, thinking he had then a fit season and opportunity to cut off the hopes and break the hearts of the neighbour-borders, that when he should be averted another way and bashed in the Roman war, he might be secured of danger from them: considering that from the parts of Thrace he had peace with Corys, and likewise from Epirus side (by the means of Cephala, who suddenly of late was revolted from the Romans:) moreover having newly vanquished the Dardanians in war; and seeing only the quarter to infect and annoy Macedony, which regardeth and affronteth Illyricum; and that those Illyrians also were not quiet and at peace, but ready to give entrance unto the Romans: but if he had subdued and tamed those Illyrians which were next unto him, then King Gentius also, who a long time hung between in doubtful terms; might be induced & drawn wholly into society with him: he resolved at length, and with ten thousand footmen hourly armed, whereof part were Phalangites, and other two thousand lightly appointed, and five hundred horse, he made a rode and presented his forces before Scutaria: from whence after he had provided himself of corn to serve for many daies, and given order that the ordinance and engine of battery should follow after the third daies end he lodged near Uscana, the head City of all that Land Penninsula. But before that he offered any assault, he sent certain of purpose to sound and solicit the affections, one while of the Captains of the garrison, and another while of the Townsmen. Now there lay within the City, together with the manhood and youth of the Illyrians, a garrison also of the Romans. And when he saw that they brought no news of any peaceable dealing from thence, he began to bend his forces against them, and assailed to invest them round about, and so to force the City. And albeit both night and day without any rest and intermission they pressed upon the inhabitants, and evermore one succeeded another: while some reared ladders against the walls, others threw balls of fire against the gates, yet the defendants of the City held out and endured that furious and violent tempest: because they hoped that neither the Macedonians lying abroad were able any long time to endure the rigor of the cold winter: nor the King on the other side could have so much release and relaxation from the Roman war, as to stay there and make his abode. But after they perceived once the mantles approach, and the frames of currets and fabricks erected, their persistence was over-matched & they began to relent. For besides that in plain force they were the weaker and not able to resist, distressed also they were for want of corn, neither had they store of any other provision, as being taken on a sudden, and looking for nothing less than siege at such a time of the year. Therefore when they were past all hope to be able any longer to resist, C. Carvilius Spolatus and C. Afranius were sent from the Roman garrison, to crave of Perseus, first that he would permit them to depart in their arms, and to carry with them their bag and baggage: secondly, if they might not obtain so much, that he would but give them assurance of life and liberty. The King was more free and liberal to promise, than fast and faithful to perform. For after he had commanded them to go forth, and carry with them all that was their own: the first thing that he did was to disarm them and take away their weapons. They were not so soon departed out of the Town, but both the company of the Illyrians, to the number of 3000 men, and also the inhabitants of Uscana rendered themselves and their City. Perseus when he had put a garrison in Uscana, led away the whole multitude of the yielded Townsmen (and those were well-near as many in number as his own army) and transported them to Scutaria where, after he had sent the Romans (all besides their Captains) who were 2000 fighting men, into sundry cities to be kept in ward, and sold the Uscanians and Illyrians; he led his army back into Penninsula, intending to be master of Oryzium, a Town seated otherwise commodiously, and withal it is the very key and highway that openeth passage into the country of the Libeatis, within the realm of King Gentius, and where he kept his royal state. As he passed by a strong borough-Town well inhabited, named Drandicum, one about him that was well acquainted with the coasts of that country put into his head, that bootless it was and to no purpose to win Oryzium, unless he had Drandicum also in his hands; as being a Town situate more commodiously in all respects. Whereupon he advanced forward, and so soon as ever he presented his army before it, incontinently all the inhabitants submitted and yielded. Being much animated and encouraged with this surrender of theirs, which they made far sooner than he hoped or looked for: after that he perceived how terrible this redoubled army of his was, all the way as he marched he brought under his subjection eleven other Castles and strong holds, upon the like fear that they were put into. Violence he used against very few of them: the rest yielded willingly, wherein were taken 1 god Roman soldiers, placed there in several garrisons. In great stead and to very good use served Carvilius Spolatus in all their parties, who evermore gave it out that there had been no cruelty nor rigor exercised upon him and his fellows. At length the King came before Oryzium, which could not possibly be won without a second full siege. For the Town had far more youth and able men

A men within it then therof, was fortified with a strong wall about it, and defended on the one side with the river called Araxus, and on the other with an exceeding high mount, and the same of hard and difficult access. All these things considered, the townsmen were in good hope to be able for to make resistance. Perseus, having encircled the town and cast a rampier round about it, began likewise to raise a terrace & mount from the upper part thereof, so that he might have firm mount and over-top the walls. But during the time that this peece of work was in hand and brought to perfection, a great number of the inhabitants within were consumed by divers and sundry adventures, whiles they skirmished oft and falshed forth, endeavouring both to defend their own walls, and also to impeach the fabricks and devises of their enemies. And those that remained alive, what with toilsome labour night and day, and what with many a wound, were past all service and good for nothing. So soon as the terrace and mount store laid was raised close unto the wall, both the Kings cohort (whom they call Nomades) mounted up into it, and also with ladders the assault was given unto the City in many places at once. All that were above fourteen years old he put to the sword: their wives and small children he cast into prison. The rest of the booty and pillage fell to the soldiers share. As he returned from thence with victory to Sindera, he sent as Embassadors unto Gentius, Plauratus the Illyrian (a banished person who sojourned with him) and Agaveus a Macedonian of Berbera. Then he gave in charge to declare unto Gentius, what he had achieved against the Romans and Dardanians the summer past, together with the late exploits performed in that winter expedition; and withall to perswade the K. for to be knit in amity with him and the Macedonians. These Embassadors having transmounted the top of the hill Scordus and traversed the wilds and wolds of Illyricum, which the Macedonians of purpose had laid wast and desert, to the end, that the Dardanians might have no easie passage either into Illyricum or Macedony after much pain and travell they arrived in the end at Scodra. Now was K. Gentius at Lissus, and thither were the Embassadors sent for, where they delivered their message with gracious audience: but they went away with an answer to no effect; namely, that he wanted no will, and his heart was good enough to war upon the Romans; but his coffers were empty, and he lacked mony especially, to go in hand and enterprise that which he desired. This answer they related unto King Perseus at Sindera, at what time as he was most busie in selling of his captives taken in Illyricum. Then forthwith were the same Embassadors addrest again unto him, accompanied with Glaucius one of the Kings guard and squire of his body, without any mention made of mony, and that was the only means to induce the bare and needy Barbarous Prince to levy war. After this, Perseus ransacked the City Ancyra, and once again reduced his army into Penestines country, and having strengthened the garrisons in Vscana, and in all the forts and peece about it, he returned into Macedony.

L. Calvus a Roman lieutenant, lay in guard for the defence and rule of Illyricum, who durst not stir so long as King Perseus was in those quarters: but in the end after his departure, he endeavoured to recover Vscana in the Penestins country, but was repelled from thence by the garrison of the Macedonians there, and carried away nothing but many adry knock and bloody wound, & so retired with his forces to Lychidum; from whence, some few daies after he sent M. Tribellius Fregellanus into the Penestins country, with a strong power, for to receive hostages of those Cities who faithfully had persisted in amity & friendship. He commanded him also to go forward to the Partins (for they like wise had covenanted to put in pledges) for that of both these nations, the said hostages might be gotten without any stir and trouble. The hostages of the Penestins were sent to Apolonia, but those of the Partins to Dyrrhabium, which in those daies was more usually called by the Greeks Epidamnus.

App. Candrus, desirous to rase out the blemish and make amends for the dishonour received in Illyricum, set in hand to assault Phanices a fort of Epirus, having brought thither with him the Athamans and Thesprotians (over and above the Roman army) to the number of 6000 men; but he got nothing there but travell for his paines, by reason that the place was valiantly defended by Cleodas, left there with a strong garrison by K. Perseus. Perseus likewise made an expedition to Elymus, and after he had taken a solemn survey of his army about it, he conducted his power to Siratus at the request of the Epirots. This Siratus then, was the strongest City of all Etolia. Situated it is upon the gulf of Ambracia, neer the river Achelous, he advanced thither with 10000 foot & not above 300 horse of them he took the fewer with him in number, by reason of the streight passages and rugged waies. Being come at the third daies end so far as to the mount Citus, after he had with much difficulty passed over it, the snow lay so deep, that hardly and with much ado could he find a convenient place to encamp in. From thence he removed, more for that he could not there abide and remain, then for any intolerable way and weather he met withall in his dimarch and journey forward: so with passing great travell and trouble, of his beasts especially, the second day he arrived at the temple of Jupiter called Niceus, and there lodged. Then after he had taken an exceeding long journey, he abode at the river Arachibus, being staid there by reason of the deep water: during which time, he made a bridge over and transported his forces; and when he was gone a daies journey onward, he encountered on the way Archidamus a principall person of the Etolians, by whose exam the City of Siratus was to be delivered up unto him. And that day he lodged upon the frontiers of Etolia: from whence next morrow he journeyed as far as to Siratus, where having encamped neer the river Achelous, he looked that the Etolians would run out unto him by heaps at all their gates, to yield themselves to his protection: but in stead thereof he found their gates shut & garisons of the Romans received into the City that very night when he came, together with the lieutenant C. Popilius. For the chief of the City (who induced and enforced by the authority of Archidamus while he was present in place, had sent for the King) became more slack and negligent, by occasion that Archidamus was gone forth to meet with him, and thereby gave advantage and opportunity to the adverse faction, to send for Popilius with a 1000 footmen from Ambracia. In very fit time and to right good purpose came Dimachus also a captain of the Etolian Cavalry, accompanied with 600 foot and a 100 horse. Known it was for certain, that he marched toward Stratus, as intending to band and take part with Persens; but changing his mind together with the turning of fortune, he joyned with the Romans, and banded against him for whom he set out at the first. Neither was Popilius, among these wavering and inconstant spirits, more secured then he should be; and therefore incontinently got the keyes of the gates into his hands, and possessed himself of the guard of the walls. And for Dimachus and the Etolians, together with the youth and able men of Stratus, he bestowed them all in the towresse, under a colour of guarding the same. Persens, having assaid to parly with them from the hills which commanded the higher part of the City, finding them perverse and obstinate, and seeing them ready to set him farther off with shot of their darts, encamped five miles off from the City, beyond the river Peropis. There, he called a councill; in which, Archidamus together with the revolts and renegats of the Epirots, exhorted him there to sojourn and continue; but the captains of the Macedonians contrariwise were of advice that there was no striving with that troublesome and dangerous season of the yeer, considering their provisions were not ready; and the assailants were like sooner to feel the scarcity and want thereof, then the defendants: in regard whereof, and especially for the enemies wintred not far from thence, he dislodged and removed to Aperantia. The Aperantians by reason of great credit of Archidamus among them, received him with a generall consent. And the same Archidamus was made captain there over a garrison of 800 souldiers. And so the King returned into Macedony, with lesse trouble both of his men and beasts, then he came thither. Howbeit the bruit blown abroad, that Persens led his forces against Stratus, caused Appius to levy his siege from before Phanoes. And Cleuas with a brave regiment of lusty men well appointed, followed hard after him, and at the foot of the hills which were almost unpaissable, he slew wel-neer a 1000 of them as they marched heavily armed, and took prisoners above 200. But after that Appius was passed through streights & come into the plain called Eleon, he lay encamped there some few daies: mean while Cleuas, accompanied with Philostratus the chief commander of the Epirots, passed over into the territory of Antigonia. The Macedonians went about to rob and spoil: but Philostratus with his cohort set him down in a wait, under a covert and hidden place for the purpose. And when as those of Antigonia issued forth in arms & charged upon the forragers as they ranged over the fields, and dispersed in stragling-wise, pursuing them too eagerly in their flight, they chanced to engage themselves over far within the valley where the enemies lay in ambush: and there to the number of a 1000 of them lost their lives, and almost a 100 were taken prisoners. And so the enemies having sped well in all their enterprises, removed their camp close to that of Appius, to the end that the Roman army might do no violence and outrage upon their friends and allies. Thus Appius spending the time in these parts to no purpose, and doing no good, after he had discharged the companies of the Chalonians, & as many of the Epirots as were with him, returned in Myricum with his Italian souldiers; and when he had distributed them among the confederat Cities of the Partynians, there to winter, returned himself to Rome by occasion of a certain solemn sacrifice. Persens sent to Cassandra for to lie in garrison there, a 1000 foot and 200 horse, whom he had caused to come again out of the countrey of the Penestins. And they that returned from Gentius related still the same long from him, yet never rested he nor gave over to tempt and importune him, sending Embassadors after Embassadors unto him, knowing right well, that in him rested great importance: yet could not by any meanes possible bring the man to expend ought and to be at any charge, in a matter of very way of great consequence.

Quintus Martius Philippus passing through wilds and woods, entered into Macedony and surprised many Cities. The Rhodians sent Embassadors to Rome, breaching to aid Perseus, unless the people of Rome would conclude peace and contract amity with him: whereas was taken great scorn and disdain. Now when the charge of this war was committed to L. Aemilius Paulus the Consul now the second time for the year following, Paulus before the public assembly of the people prayed unto the gods, that all infelicity and cursed fortune coming towards the people of Rome, might be

A a verted from thence, and light upon his own house. And so having taken a village into Macedonia, vanquished Perseus and subdued all Macedonia. A little before he should strike a blow, C. Sulpicius Gallus a Martial Colonel, forewarned the army that they should not wonder & be troubled in mind at the eclipse of the moon which was to happen the next night following. In like sort Gentius the King, of the Thyrans having entered again into arms, was overcome in field by Aricius the Pretor, and having submitted himself to him, was with his wife, children and kindred, sent to Rome. From Alexandria there arrived the Embassadors of Cleopatra and Ptolomeus King and Queen of Egypt: complaining of Antiochus King of Syria for that he wanted upon them. Petrus having followed Eumenes King of Pergamus, and Gentius King of the Thyrans to aid him, was abandoned, for that he made not true payment of money according to his promise.

The four and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

B *I*N the beginning of that spring which immediately followed the winter wherein these occurrences hapned, Q. Martius Philippus the Consul came to Brundisium with five thousand men, whom he intended to transport over the sea for the supply of his legions. And M. Popilius (one who had been Consul) and other brave gallants of noble parentage as well as himself, followed after the Consul to be martial-Tribunes in the Macedonian legions. Also about the same time C. Martius Figulus the Pretor, and Admirall of the navy, repaired to Brundisium. Who weighing anchor, looked to sea from Italy together, and arrived the next day at Cephæ; but the morrow after that, they put within Albanum, an haven of Acarnania. From thence the Consul set sail for Ambracia, where he disembarked and travelled by land to Thessaly. But the Pretor having doubled the point of Leucas, entered the gulf of Corinth; leaving his vessels at Crusa, journeyed likewise by land to Chalcis unto the naval forces, making such expedition that he croized through the midst of Boeotia in one day. At the same time A. Hosilius lay encamped in Thessaly, neer to Palapharsalus. Who albeit he had performed no memorable exploit of warlike feats, yet he had reclaimed his souldiers from all licentious looseness, wherewith they were corrupted, and ranged them within good order of discipline. Also by his faithfull corraige in government, he had entertained and kept the love of the allies still, yea, and protected them from all manner of wrong and injury. Now when he was advertised of the arrivall of his successor, he assembled with all diligence his forces both men and horse, & gathered together all armor, as well offensive as defensive: and so with a brave army right well appointed, he went forth to meet the Consul upon the way. As their first encounter and meeting was honourable, and besitting as well their own reputation as the greatest state of the Roman name, so for the managing of the affairs afterward [* it was very expedient to the Consul Philip. For the pro-consul turning to his own army, exhorted the souldiers to perform valiant service; and so when he had delivered it to the Consul, returned to Rome.] Some few daies after, the Consul made an oration in a solemn audience of all his souldiers: Wherin first he began with the parricide of Perseus, committed upon the person of his own brother, but projected against his very father. Then he proceeded forward and declared the wicked and divelish means whereby he attained to the crown, allo his practises of poisoning, his bloody murderers, he laid await for King Eumenes his life by way of detestable brigandage and robbery: moreover, the injuries offered to the people of Rome, and sacking of associat Cities against the covenants of accord. All which dealings of his he should find one day (quoth he) by the issue of his affairs, how odious and cursed they are in the sight also of the immortal gods. For the gods are evermore favourable and gracious to piety and fidelity, the only means whereby the people of Rome is mounted to that pitch and height of felicity. Then he compared the forces of that State which already compassed the round world, with the strength of Macedony; he let armies to armies, making remonstrances how far greater was the puissance of Philip and Antiochus before, and yet was it defeated utterly by no greater power then the Romans now were able to shew. Having thus enkindled and enflamed the courages of his souldiers by this manner of exhortation, he began to debate in counsel as touching the principal and main point of the whole war. And thither repaired unto him from Chalcis, the Pretor C. Martius, after he had taken the charge of the armado and sea-forces. Resolved it was and concluded to make no longer abode in Thessaly, and there to lose time, but presently to dislodge and remove directly into Macedony: that the Pretor also should endeavour and cast, how at one and the self same time he might infest and annoy the sea-coasts of the enemies. Now after that the Pretor was dismissed & sent away, the Consul commanded his souldiers to bring every man with him provision for a month: and to the tenth day after he had received the conduct of the army, he removed the camp and set forward. When he had gone a daies journey, he called together the guides, and after he had commanded them every one to declare before the Council there assembled, which way each of them intended to direct the army, he caused them to go aside; and then debated it was in counsel, which course to take above all others. Some were of opinion to lead by the way of Pythium; others advised to passe over the Camburian mountains, like as the year before Hosilius the Consul conducted his army; and there were who gave advice to go neer to the moor of Ascuris. Now thereremained yet some part behind of the way, which lay indifferent still and common to all these places; and therefore their consultation of this point was put over to the time when they should encamp neer to the parting and division of the said waies. So from thence he led the army to Perrhabia, and sat him down between Axrus and Dolobe, for to consult once again for all, which way to take.

* The place is here defective, but may be supplied, as Sigonius thinketh in this manner as you see between these marks []

The same time Perseus knowing that the enemy approached, but yet ignorant which way he meant to come, determined to beset all passages with strong guards. Whereupon he sent ten thousand young and lusty men lightly armed, to the pitch of the Cambanian hills (which the inhabitants themselves call Volustana) under the conduct of captain Aselepidemus. But he commanded Hippias with a power of twelve thousand Macedonians to seize the streights of a certain fort situated upon the marsh Asenris, and is called Lophus. Himself in person accompanied with the rest of the forces, lodged first neer to Dium: but afterwards seeming as if he were unprovided of counsel and void of sense and understanding, he with his light horsemen made rodes and comes along the strand, one while toward Heraclia, and other whiles to Phila, and so backward again the same way to Dium. In this mean time the Consul resolved fully to lead his army by that path where we said before that the army of King Philip encamped sometimes neer a place called Ossa-lophus. Howbeit he thought good to send out before four thousand armed men, for to prevent the enemies and be possessed first of the most commodious places of advantage: this regiment was commanded by M. Claudius and Q. Martius, the Consuls son; and incontinently all the forces in general followed after. But the way was so steep and difficult, so rough, uneven and rugged, that in two daies space, they which were sent before, albeit they were not charged with the carriage of anything, had much ado to march fifteen miles: where they lodged, and the place which they made choice of was called the Tower Eudirru. From whence the morrow after they journeyed seven miles forward and seized a hill not far from the enemies camp: where they dispatched a courier back to the Consul, to give intelligence, that they were come neer to the enemy, and seized in a place of safety, commodious also for all purposes; and withall to advise him for to make all possible speed after, for to overtake them and join together. This messenger encountered the Consul at the Meare Asenris, where he was greatly perplexed as well for the difficulty of the way which he was to enter himself, as also in regard of the danger of them whom in so few number he had sent before, even through the midst of the enemies corps de guard. Whereupon he took a better heart to himself, and having united all his forces, encamped upon the foresaid hill which his men already held, on that side which (considering the nature of the ground) was most commodious. And there they might discover within the view of eie, not only the enemies camp distant from thence a little above a mile, but also the whole countrey as far as to Dium and Phila, yea, and all the sea-coast by reason that the high pitch and top of the mountain yielded a prospect far and neer round about. And this was it that set on fire the souldiers hearts, when they beheld the whole weight of the war, the Kings forces altogether, and the enemies countrey so neer unto them. In which spirit of cheerfulness when they were earnest with the Consul, and exhorted him to advance directly against the enemies camp, they had but one day granted them to rest after their wearisome journey. So upon the third day the Consul leaving part of his forces to guard the camp, led the rest against the enemy. Now had Hippias been lately sent from the King to keep and guard the passage, who since the time that first he espied the Roman camp upon the hill, had prepared the minds of his men to a battel, and so encountered the army of the Consul and met it half way. The Romans advanced forth to fight, nimble appointed; and the enemies likewise were lightly armed, and by reason thereof most fit and provided for to give the charge and begin skirmish. So soon as they affronted and encountered one another, presently they fell to lancing of their darts on both sides. Many a wound was given and received of the one part as well as the other by their rash charging at random, and few of both sides were slain. Thus were their stomachs whetted and edged against the morrow, and then had they skirmishes, and maintained fight with greater forces, and more deadly feud, if the ground would have served them to have displayed their battallions at large: but the top of the mountain was streight and arose to a sharp crest in form of a con or wedg; and hardly afforded room enough for three ranks of armed men affront; and therefore when some few were in fight, all the rest and specially they that were heavily armed, stood as lookers on. As for the light armour of one part, they would run forth at the broken crags of the hill, and ever from the sides join battel with the like of the other part: yea, and find meanes to charge their enemy, were the place even or uneven, it skilled not whether. But after that more that day also were wounded then killed, the night at length parted the fray. The third day, the Roman General was to seek and wist not what to do; for neither could he stay any longer upon that hill, for want of all things; and retire back from thence it was not possible, without dishonour and danger both. Moreover, if he had retired, the enemy might presse upon him from the upper ground with advantage. There remained therefore no other meanes to mend that which was the audaciously enterprised, with as resolute & hardy persistence in execution; a thing that other whiles proveth well in the end, as if it proceeded from wise and deliberat counsel. And verily to this hard passe and difficult terms they were come, that if the Consul had been to deal with an enemy like to any of the Macedonian Kings in old time, he might soon have received a great foil and overthrow. But K. Perseus as he coasted and ranged with his cavalry upon the strand neer Dium (albeit for the space of 12 miles wel-neer, he heard the cries and shouts of them that were in fight;) neither reenforced the companies by sending fresh souldiers in place of the wearied, nor shewing himself in person at the battel (which had been a thing I assure you of most importance) whereas the Roman General being above 60 years of age, corpulent besides, & unwieldy, performed himself right lustily all military services of a valiant warrior, persisting in that to the very end most bravely, which he had begun and enterprised so boldly:

And having left Popilius to guard the hill and guided over places that had no tracks at all to direct them, by sending out before, Antius and Asinius with the auxiliary soldiers of their own sides to guard them that crossed the river. Then he putting before him in the night the lightning with beggars, many behind with the legionaries in the forefront. No tongue is able to express what a toil and painful labour they found in going down the hill, the sumpter horses with chills back and castles tumbled to down one with another: in so much as when they had scarcely gone four miles forward, they withed in their hearts nothing more then to return the way they came, if it had been possible. The elephants troubled the march as much in manner as the enemies could: for when they were come to a place where they could see no way down, they cast their riders and governors, lying them along on the earth, and with the horrible braying that they made, affrighted their horses especially, until such time as a device was found for their passage. They began first to make the bed or entrance of the bridge at the very bow and edge of a steep downslope: this done, in the lower ground beneath they let lay in the earth good strong and long posts of wood, two by two distant one from the other a furlong, while little more then the largeness of one of their beaks. Upon which rested fast joined I with ten on & mortise certain rafters like wall plies 30 foot in length, and those being couched with planks, crosse over in form of a bridge, had earth and mould cast thereupon. A little way off beneath it, such another bridge was made, and so a third likewise, and many more consequently according as the craggy ground was broken and uneven. Now the elephant from the firm ground entered upon the first bridge, stood still: but before he was gone as far as to the foot and end thereof the posts above mentioned, were cut in two underneath: so the end that the bridge might fall, and in the same reeling thereof the beast also gently slide, as it were, and be carried therewith as far as the head of the second bridge. Thus some of them slid and kept themselves standing upright on their feet, others tumbled upon their buttocks. Again, when they were come to the plain and level floor of another such like bridge, by the fall of it in manner aforesaid they were driven unto a third bridge beneath it, until such time as they were come to a more plain and even valley. In this order the Romans could rid little more then seven miles that day. And the least part thereof went they upright on their feet but were thin most what to tumble and roll over, no over with the armor and fardels about them, and thus they got forward in all kind of pain and trouble, in such sort that he, who induced them to this journey & conducted them therein, could not deny but the whole army (with a small power coming against them) might easily have been defeated. By night they arrived at a pretty plain, but the place being enclosed on all sides, they had no space and room to view round about, whether it were dangerous or no. At length after much ado and beyond their expectation, they met with a firm piece of ground, whereas they might take sure footing: and there they were forced the morning following to attend in the hollow valley the coming of Popilius and the companies left with him: who also were exceedingly sore vexed and plagued with the roughness of the way, albeit the enemies troubled and affrighted them no whit at all. The third day after they had joined their forces together, they took their way through a pass, which the inhabitants call Callicrates. The fourth day they passed over a place that had no more means to direct them, then the other before: but by use and experience there were grown more skillfull, and better hope they had, for that the enemy in no place appeared, but approached neer to the sea. When they were come once down into the plains between Harmonia and Lebethrus, the footmen (whereof the greater part kept the hill) pitched their tents and took up the valley, and a good part of the plain wherein the horsemen should quarter. As the King was bating himself, it is said that word came, How the enemies were neer at hand: at which news he was so leared, that he leapt out of his bathing vessel, and in haste got him out of the barge, crying aloud, That he was vanquished without drawing sword and stroke given: neither will he for fear which way to turn him, taking no counsel one of another, and commanding he knew not what, sometime this and sometime. In this perplexity he sent for Alcibiades (one of his two especial friends) out of the place where he lay in garrison to go to Pella where all his money and treasure lay: and by this means opened all the avenues for the Romans to make war. Himself, after he had had in great haste bestowed and piled up in his ships, all the gilded images at Dium, to the end that the enemy should make no prize of them, sailed with all speed possible to trade up and to remove to Pydna: & hereby gave occasion, that the enterprise of the Consul which might have seemed rashness (in that he had engaged himself so far that he could not possibly to retire again without leave of the enemy) proved in the end up inconsiderate and unadvised judgement. For now the Romans had the choice of two passages through which they might escape away, the one, by Tempe into Thessaly, the other into Macedony, by the way neer Dium, both which before were held by the King's guards. So as it: refulant and feeble captain could have held out and endured but one ten daies the first appearance and shew of terror that approached the Rom. could never have returned them Thessaly by Tempe, nor found way for convenience of provision & victuals to the place where they were: But Tempe is of itself a difficult passage, even without any force of arms to make it dangerous, and why besides the straight gullet five mile in length, yielding a very narrow way, for one beast to go charged with burden, the rocks of either hands are so steep and upright, that hardly a man is able to look down from them, but his eye will dazle, his brain turn, and his head be giddy withall. Moreover, the found and noise, yes, and the depth of the river Peneus running directly

As Drusus, but he started and weakened the enemy, and put in his head new a length to regain those matters, which had been lost before through his dependance. For hearing that the Consul was departed, he returned himself directly to Drusus, where he repaired what ever had been demolished and rebuilt by the Romans: the battlements of the walls which were cast down he set up again in the right place; and in all parts fortified the muns and bulwarks of the City. Which done, he encamped five miles off on this side Sapientis, intending that the river itself (which is very hard to be passed over; should serve in stead of a rampier and trench of defence. This river runneth out of the vale from under the mountains Olympus, and in summer season is small and shallow, but in winter it fills high and spreads broad by reason of rain: running also with a forcible current and stream, it throweth great rocks, and amongst his stony crags and shelves maketh many whirlpools. By occasion likewise, that from thence it carrieth away with it into the sea, store of earth, there are many gulfs of exceeding depth: and by reason that it hath even a hollow channel in the midst, the banks of each side are very high and steep upright. Perseus, supposing that by the means of this river the enemies were debarr'd from all passage, purposed in his mind to hold off, and drive on the rest of the summer in that sort.

But the Consul in the mean while sent Papilius from Philae into Heraclea with 2000 armed fighting men. This Heraclea standeth about five miles from Philae, situate in the mid-way between Drusus and Triump, upon a rock that commandeth this river. Papilius, before that he caused his men to approach the walls, sent certain persons of purpose to persuade the magistrats and chief of the City, to make proof of the faithful protection and clemency of the people of Rome, rather than to use their rigor and violence. But this motive and advice prevailed not, because they might discern the fires out of the Kings camp near to Sapientis; whereupon both from the land and sea-side for the fleet also being arrived (anchored near the shore) as well by force of arms as by fabricks and engines of battery, they began to assail the town. Moreover, certain young and lusty Roman soldiers (making use now in war of exercise which they had practised in the games Circenses) gat over the wall where it was lowest. The manner was in those daies (before this wall prodigiously came up of filling the whole circus or show place with beasts ferret out of all countries) to devise and seek sundry sorts of publick fights & spectacles to be hold, & not running out course with the enactor, and another on horseback; and to an end, to employ at both races the space of one full hour. Among others feats of activity exhibited, the masters and wardens of those exercises and games brought into the race commonly 60 (and other whiles more) lusty young men in arms well appointed. Their training in part represented a shew and apparance of two armies encountering and encountering and charging one another, in part also the use and practise of a more gentle and elegant exercise then military profession, and coming nearer to the handling and managing of weapons after the order of sword-fencers. These young gallants, after they had performed other ordinary running courses, put themselves into a four-square squadron, with the buttlers or targets close couched and joined together over their heads: in this manner they that were foremost in the front stood bolt upright; the second rank stooped somewhat lower under the other; the third course more then they; and so the fourth untill the hindmost kneeled on their knees: and by this means they resembled a pavilaine rising up higher & higher, like the pent-house or roof of a edifice.

This done, two men well armed, fetching their run fifty foot or thereabout back ward from thence, and seeming to desie and challenge one another, mounted the foresaid pavilaine, ran from the neither end up to the top upon those targets so jointly united and set close and thick together: and one while they set their countenance as though they would defend the sides and edges thereof, other whiles in the midst they seemed to performed their devoir and maintain combat one with another, as upon firm and steady ground. Like for all the world to this, was there a pavilaine framed and brought close to that part of the wall; and when armed men were mounted upon it, they that stood upon the very ridge thereof, were as high fall as the defendants which kept the walls who being once beaten back and turned down, two ensignes of soldiers gat over into the City. The only difference between this pavilaine and the other above described was this, that they only who stood in the front before and in the flanks, bare out their targets aloft above their own heads, because their sides and bodies should not be united and exposed to hurt, but carried them before after the usual manner of fighting men in a battail. By which means, neither the arrows and darts discharged from the wall hurt them abroad, nor the shot that light upon their targets fence took any hold, but glanced and slid down ward from the top without doing any harm, like to rain water that slueth from the ridge of a house, and runneth down the eves. The Consul likewise, now that Heracles was won, advanced forward with his army thither, pretending as though he marched toward Drusus, and as soon after he had chased and driven the King from thence, he minded to passed for what also into Perseus. But preparing now against winter, he commanded to make the walls firm and handsome, for the carriage of provision out of Thessaly, and to chuse out commodious places for garners: also to build certain houses, wherein they that brought the provision, might live in cover and lodge commodiously. Perseus in the end having taken heart again and gathered his was together, upon the late night which had amazed his spirits, wished then within his heart, that his commandments had not been obeyed, at what time as in a last will he gave expresse charge to cast the treasure into the sea at Pala, and to offer on fire the wealth at Thessalonica, and Andronicus being sent for to the same purpose to Thessalonica made no halt to execute his will, but rised out the time for the nonce, leaving the King some repulse to repent, as it fell out indeed. Nicias was not so provident and well advised as Pericles, in throwing away some part of the money which he there found: howbeit his thought in that manner was recovered by the means of certain divers that fished for it under water, and fetched it up from the bottom of the sea. But the King himself was constrained of this foolish fear, that in a moment he commanded those poor divers to be secretly murdered: yea, and afterwards Nicias and Nicias also; the end that no person should remain alive that was privy to that foolish commandment of his.

Amids these affairs, C. Marcius having looked to sea from Heraclea, and with his fleet sailed to Thessalonica, landed his armed souldiers in divers places of the shore, and made wast in the territory all about: and when they made sallies out of the City and charged upon him, after some fortuit skirmishes, he chased them back and beat them within the walls. So at length he terrified the town it self: but not only they who ranged up and down here and there, unadvisedly approached the walls, were wounded with shot discharged out of instruments of all sorts, planted upon the walls: but those also who were in the ships, were hurt with stones, weighed and levelled from engines afar off. Upon which occasion he commanded his souldiers to retire a shipboard, and leaving the siege of Thessalonica, they passed from thence to Eris, a City fifteen miles off, situate in a fertile soil just over against Pydna. When they had spoiled the territory lying to that City, they coasted along the shore and arrived at Amigoneia. Where, being set a land, first they spoiled the country in every quarter, and brought good store of prizes to their ships: but afterwards, as they straggled out of order and disbanded, the Macedonians, as well footmen as horse, ran upon them, and chased them as they fled space to the sea-side: in which rout they slew about 500 and took as many prisoners. And nothing else provoked the courage of the Romans (in regard as well of utter despair, otherwise to save themselves, as of the indignity it self, so to hazard their honour, but only the extreme necessity, where in they stood having no means to recover their ships in safety. Whereupon they turned head, and renewed the fight upon the very sea strand. They also who were a shipboard, succoured and helped them. In which conflict, two hundred Macedonians lost their lives, and as many were taken prisoners. From Amigoneia the fleet weighed anchor, & made head toward the territory of Pallina, where the souldiers were set on shore to spoil the country. The territory appertained to the confines of the Cassandrians, the most fruitful tract of those parts which they had coasted and sailed by. There King Eumenes being departed from Elea with twenty war ships met with them. So likewise five other covert ships were lent from King Prusias. The Pretor seeing this good encrease and addition of his forces, took a better heart unto him, even to besiege Cassandria. This City was built by King Cassander, in the very strait & gullet which joineth the territory of Pallina with the rest of the Macedonian country, enclosed on the one side with the Toronian sea, and on the other with the Macedonian. For there leeth out a bank or shelf like a sponge into the sea, upon which the City standeth, and beareth unto the deep, no less in compass, and quantity then is the mountain Asko. It butteth full against Magnesia, with two promontories of unequal bigness: of which the greater is called Pepidema; the lesser Canastrium. This town they began to assail in two divers parts. The Roman (Pretor) drew his fortifications to a place called Cilia, opposing certain strong forked stakes for to debar, and shut up the way from the Macedonian sea to the Toronian. On the other side there is an Enripe or arm of the sea, from which quarter Eumenes gave the assault. The most trouble and toil that the Romans found, was in damming and filling up the trench, which Perseus had cast against them a little before. And as the Pretor enquired where the earth was bestowed which was thrown out of the trench foresaid, because he could see no heaps thereof any where, there were shewed unto him certain vaults and arches within, which bewraied a new wall, not built to the thickness of the old, but with perpend work, laid with one course of brick and no more. Whereupon he resolved to pierce through the said wall, and so to make way into the City. The which he thought to execute and perform without being discovered, in case he scaled the wall in another quarter, and by making a shout and alarm there, witherew all the defendants of the City to the guard of that one place. There lay in garrison at Cassandria (being a sufficient number of servicable young men of the City) eight hundred Agrians, and two thousand Peneltins of Silavony, sent from thence by Pleuratus: and both these nations are hardy warriors. Whiles these defended the walls manfully, and the Romans endeavoured with all their might to mope over, the thin walls of the vaults and arches foresaid were wrought and digged through in the turning of an hand, and gave entrance into the City. Now if they who brake in, had been armed (as they were but pioneers) the town had been taken at that instant. But when as the souldiers heard news that the said work was finished, they suddenly set up a cheerful shout for joy, being ready some in one place and some in another to rush into the City. The enemies at the first wondered what the meaning should be of that suddain cry: but the captains of the garrison, Pycho and Philippus, Pro being once advertised that the town lay open, supposing that herein consisted the vantage, who could first prevent the other and give the charge, sallied forth with a strong band of Agrians and Illyrians: and whiles the Romans sallied themselves some from this place, and others from that, and were called together for to enter the City with banner displayed, they set upon them unready as they were, and not ranged in any good order, put them to flight and chased them as far as to the trench, where they overthrew them one upon another by heaps: 600 or very were there killed;

* Cassandria

A and in manner whom they could reach between the wal & the trench were sore hurt. The Pre. thus overtaken in his own enterprise, was not so hally to project any new designs; neither sped Eumenes any better, albeit at one time he assaulted the City both by land and sea. Whereupon they accorded both, to set strong guards, for to impeach the passage of all garrisons out of Macedony thither; and (since open force took no better effect) to assail the wals with fabricks & engins. As they were busie in preparation thereof, there arrived ten frigots of the Kings, sent from Macedony with certain select auxiliary Gauls. These when they perceived their enemies ships siding at anchor, sailed in single range one after another, as close as possibly they could to the shore in the dark night, and so entered the City. The Brut that went of this new succour and garrison, forced as well the Romans as the King to give over the siege; so fetching a compassse about the promontory, they arrived before Torone. And when they began to lie against it, after they perceived once that there was a valiant company there to defend it, they abandoned their enterprise without effect, & sailed to Demetrias. Being approached thither, and seeing the wals full of armed men, they passed by and anchored at Isole; intending after they had spoiled the territory, to set upon Demetrias. Mean-while, their Consul also, because he would not sit still doing nothing in the enemies countrey, sent M. Popilius with five thousand soldiers to give the assaile to the City Melibeas. Seated it is at the foot of the mountain Ofa, on that side which looketh to Thessaly, and very hilly for the purpose commandeth Demetrias. The first arrivall of the enemies put the inhabitants of the place in great affright; but after they had recovered their spirits danted with so unexpected fear, they ran in arms to the gates, and up to the wals, where they doubted and inspected any place like to give entrance, and incontinently cut off all hope from the enemies, that it could possibly be forced at the first assaile. Whereupon they prepared to lay siege unto it, & began to make fabricks and engins to batter the wals. Perseus having intelligence, that in one instant both Melibeas was beleaguered by the Consul, and also that the fleet anchored before Isole, to the intent that from thence he might go in hand to assail Demetrias; sent Euphranor one of his captains, with a choien regiment of two thousand soldiers to Melibeas; with this charge and direction, That if he could raise the siege from Melibeas and force the Romans to depart, he should march secretly to Demetrias, & put himself within the town, before the Romans could remove from Isole, and advance before the City. The assailants of Melibeas discovering him with his forces all at once upon the higher places, quit their fabricks and engins in fearful hast, and let them all on fire; and thus they departed from before Melibeas. Euphranor having levied the siege from the one City, forthwith led his army to Demetrias. And then the citizens assured themselves, that they should be able not only to defend the City against the siege, but also to save their territories from wast and spoil: and so they made sallies upon the forragers dispersed loosely here and there, not without drawing blood of their enemies. Howbeit the Pretor and the King rode about the wals, and viewed the situation of the town, if peradventure they could espie any one place which they were like to force, either with battery of engins or force of arms. The voice went, that by the means of Cydas the Cretensian, and Antiochus governor of Demetrias, there was a treaty of peace and amity between Philip and Eumenes. But howsoever it was, this is certain, both Eumenes and the Pretor departed from Demetrias. As for Eumenes, he sailed to the Consul, and testified unto him the joy that he conceived for his safe and prosperous entrance into Macedony; and from thence returned to Pergamus into his own realm. But Martius Figulus the Pretor, when he had sent part of his fleet into the harbor of Sciatibus there to winter, with the rest of his ships went to Orreum in Bœotia: supposing it a commodious City, from whence victuals and all provisions might be sent to the armies that abode either in Macedony or Thessaly. As touching Eumenes, sundry authors have written diversly. If a man should go by Valerius Antias and beleave him, he reporteth, that neither the Pretor had any help from him by his navy, notwithstanding that oftentimes he had sent for him by his letters; nor took his leave of the Consul in good terms with favour, at what time as he was to depart into Asia, as being highly displeased, that he was not permitted to quarter with him in one of the same camp; inasmuch as he could not possibly be entreated by him, to leave behind that Cavalry of Gauls which he had brought thither with him. As for Artalus his brother, he remained still with the Consul (as Valerius saith) and continued sincere and faithful unto him without any change and alteration, yea, and performed right good service in all that war.

F During these wars in Macedony, there came Embassadors from beyond the Asp, to Rome, sent from a petty K. of the Gauls (Balaus he had to name, but of what lineage he was descended it is not recorded) promising aid to the Macedonian war. Thanked they were from the Senat, and presents were sent unto them: to wit, a chain of gold weighing two pound, certain golden cups of four pound weight, a brave courler barbed and trapped, and an horsmans armor. After the Gauls were gone out of place, the Embassadors of Pamphylia brought with them into the Senat a golden crown, valewed at 20000 Philippæces of gold: their request was, that they might be permitted to set up the said present and oblation in the chappell of Iup. Opt. Max. and likewise to sacrifices within the Capitol. Their petition was granted: and when these Embassadors were desirous to renew the amity between them and the Romans, they received a gracious answer, and had of them a reward sent of two thousand Alces. Then the Embassadors of King Prusias, and anon after, others from the Rhodians had audience: who of one and the same argument, discoursed diversly, for both tended to one thing, namely, a treaty for reconciliation of peace between the Rom. & K. Perseus. Prusias seemed to intreat rather then to demand: protesting that he had

"had ever to that day stood with the Romans in that war; and willingly would stand them still
 "to the very end thereof: but since that there came Embassadors unto him from Perseus, and
 "dealt with him to make an end of the war between him and the Romans, and for that he pro"mised them to be a mediator and intercessor for him to the Romans: therefore his request
 "unto them was, (if they could so find in their hearts) to stifle their anger, & so they should use
 "him in any service, as one that would acknowledge himself beholden unto them for a favor, in "ending this agreement and reconciliation. In this manner (I say) spake the K. his Embassadors.
 "But the Rhodians contrariwise, in a proud humour of theirs, reckoned up a bestdroll of their "demerits towards the people of Rome, attributing the greater part (believe me) of the victory of "K. Antiochus to themselves: moreover they added and said, that when the Macedonians and
 "Romans were at peace, they began to enter into league and amity with K. Perseus: which they "had interrupted and discontinued against their will: not upon any desert or occasion given of "his part, but only because it pleased the Romans to draw them into the association of the war.
 "Three daies now already (say they) have we felt the smart of this war and lived by the loss: by "reason that the seas are shut up from us, and our land is decayed and distressed for need and "want, having lost our tollage and customs issuing from the seas, which we are not able to en"dure any longer, have addressed Embassadors to Perseus into Macedony, to intimate unto him,
 "that the Rhodians will and pleasure was, that he should grow to a composition and be at "peace with the Romans. Our selves also are sent to Rome to declare the same: and likewise to "denounce, that whosoever shall impeach and hinder this course tending to pacification, the "Rhodians will consider of them accordingly & bethink how they are to protect against them.
 "I am verily perswaded, that there is no man at this day, who can hear or read this, but his sto-
 "mack will rise thereat with indignation: guesse then thereby how the LL. of the Senat of Rome
 "were affected and touched as then, at the hearing thereof. Claudius mine author saith, that there "was no answer at all given unto them. Only an arrest or decree of the Senat was read before them, "importing thus much, that by order from the people of Rome, the Carians & Lycians were made "free: and presently were letters dispatched to both nations to signifie so much unto them. Which "when the principal persons of the embassage once heard, even he, whose big and brave words a "little before, the whole Senat-house was hardly able to contain, fell down flat before them in a "wob and extasie. Other Historians write, that this answer was returned, "That the people of "Rome at the very beginning of this war, knew assuredly (by intelligence given from persons of "right good credit) how the Rhodians had secretly complotted with Perseus against the state of "Rome: and if there had been some doubt thereof before, yet the words of the Embassadors ere-"while delivered, made all clear and put it past peradventure: and no marvell, since that for the "most part it falleth out, that such cautelous practises, howsoever at the first they are covertly & "cleanly carried, yet one time or other are bewraied and discovered. Let the Rhodians send their "messengers over the world and spare not: let them make themselves judges to determine of "war and peace at their pleasure: as for the Romans, they will take arms in hand, and lay them "down again at the will and appointment of the gods in heaven. We are well holpen up now in "deed, if we must have the gods no more to be witnesses of our accords, but the Rhodians for"sooth. And must the Romans (I would not else) be ruled by them, and withdraw their forces "out of Macedony? They will consider and advise themselves how to proceed against us! How "shall we do then? What the Rhodians will see to, well may they perhaps themselves know:
 "but the people of Rome (that is certain) will consider indeed and resolve after that Perseus is "vanquished (which they hope will not be long first) to recompence and requite every City and "state according as they have deserved in the service of this war. As sharp as this answer was, yet "they sent a reward to these Embassadors to every one of them 2000 asces; but none would they receive.
 "After this, were the letters read of Q. Marcius the Consul, containing thus much, namely,
 "How he had passed over the streights of the forrest, and was come into Macedony, where he had
 "provision of victuals which the Pretor had given order for out of other places to serve for win"ter: and besides, had taken up of the Epirots twenty thousand Modii of wheat and ten thousand "of barley, for which corn they should make money ready at Rome to content their Embassadors.
 "Also that they must send from Rome souldiers liveries and other apparel, and need he had besides
 "of 200 horse or thereabout: especially of Namidia: for in those parts he had no plenty of any thing.
 "Hereupon an act was granted out of the Senat, That all these things should be done according to "the tenor of the Consul his letters. So C. Sulpicius the Pretor bargained for the transporting over "into Macedony of 800 fide casocks and 3000 short coats or jackets, together with horses: for
 "to be disposed and distributed at the discretion of the Consul: and besides paid the Embassadors
 "of the Epirots good money for their grain. He brought also into the Senat. Oneimus the son of "Pytho a noble personage of Macedony. This man was evermore of counsel with the K. perswading
 "him to peace: and admonished him as his father Philip before him observed an order even to the "time of death to read over twice a day from point to point the instrument of the accord & cove"nants between him and the Romans: so he also would take up that good custome and practise
 "the same, if not so continually, yet at leastwise many a time and often. But when he could by no
 "meanes scare him nor avert his mind from war, he began at first to withdraw and absent him"self, alledging for his excuse one while this occasion, and otherwhiles that, because he would

A that he was had in some jealousy, & other whiles charged to be a traitor, he changed his allegiance revolted to the Rom. and served the Consul in right good stead This Onofimus being brought into the Senat house, related all these premises: whereupon the Senat ordained, that he should be enrolled formally in the number of allies: also, that he should be provided of a lodging, and his ordinary expences for the time allowed at the Cities charge. Moreover, 200 acres of land in the territory of Tarentum, which was confiscat to the people of Rome, should be set out for him; and a messuage in Tarentum bought for his habitation. To see all this performed, C. Decimus the Pretor had in charge.

The Censors upon the * thirteenth of December, took a survey of the number of citizens and an estimat of their goods, more strictly then aforetime. Many were unknighted and had their B horters taken from them; and P. Rutilius among the rest, who when he was Tribune of the Com. had been their accuser and called them to reckoning; degraded he was besides and displaced out of his own tribe, & made no better then a very labourer in the Cities works. When as the one moiety of the Cities renewes and profits for that year, was set by, and allowed unto them by the treasurers (according to an ordinance of the Senat) Tib. Sempronius out of the mony assigned unto him, purchased the house of P. Africanus on the back side of the old Curia neer the image of Fortunus: the shops also wherein they sold wooll and the other adjoining thereto, all to the use of the City. He caused likewise the stately palace to be built, which afterwards was called Sempronia Basilica.

Now was the year come about and well neer at an end, when by reason of the great care principally about the Macedonian war, men began to talk, whom they were to create for Consuls against the next year, to achieve and end the said war? Whereupon there passed a decree of the Senat, that Cn. Servilius with all speed possible, should make hast to Rome for to hold a general assembly of election. This decree Sulpicius the Pretor within few daies after read to the Col. to the end that he should repair home into the City before the day prefixed. Whereupon both the Col. hastned; & the said election was also furnished by the d.y appointed. Col. these were created, L. Emilius Paulus the second time (even 14 years after his former Consulship) with C. Sicinius Crassus. The day following were the Pretors also chosen, to wit, Cn. Babius Tampilus, L. Anicius Galus, Cn. Octavius, P. Foncius Balbus, Mar. Ebutius Helva, and C. Papirius Carbo. The carefull regard of the Macedonian war caused every thing to be done with greater expedition And therefore it was thought meet, that these new elect magistrats should cast lots out of hand for their provinces, that it might be known to whether Col. Macedony, and to which Pretor the conduct of the navy should fall, that thereupon they might presently consider and provide for all things requisite to the war, & require the advice of the Senat as need required. Ordained it was when the Consuls were entered into their office, to solemnize the Latine festivall holidays as soon as they might conveniently, without offence of the gods and breach of any religious order: that the Consul whole lot fell to go into Macedony, were not detained behind upon any occasion. After these ordinances, Italy and Macedony, were nominated for the provinces of the two Consuls, and for the Pretors, the two civill jurisdictions within the City of Rome, the navy, Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia. In five; Macedony fell to Emilius the Consul, and Italy to L. Emilius, Of Pretors, Cn. Babius was lord chief just ice of the pleas of citizens, and L. Anicius of aliens. And if the Senat thought good to send the navy any whither, Cn. Octavius had the charge thereof as L. admiral. P. Foncius was appointed by lot L. Deputy of Spain, M. Ebutius of Sicily, and C. Papirius of Sardinia.

All men soon saw, that L. Emilius intended not to go coldly about the managing of that war; both for that he was not an ordinary man, but singular above all other; and also because that night and day he mused and studied upon nothing else, but that which was requisite and pertinent thereunto. The first thing of all wherewith he went in hand was this; a request to the Senat for to dispatch certain delegat commissioners into Macedony, to visit the armies there and the armado; to make true report upon their certain knowledg, what was needfull to be done for the supply of the forces as well by land as sea; also to lie in espiall, & estimat as much as possibly they could, the Kings power; moreover, what quarter of the province were taken by our men, and which the enemies kept; whether the Romans lay encamped still within the Forrest, or if they were passed beyond the streights and come into the even ground; who continued trusty allies, who were suspected, who hung in doubtfull terms, as whose faith depended upon fortune: who seemed to be professed enemies: how great the provisions were of victuals; from whence they were conveyed by land; from what places transported by water; & lastly, what exploits had been done the summer past both by land and sea: supposing, that for a light given and certain intelligence delivered of these things, he might be sure y directed in the casting and flying of future plots & designments. So the Senat granted out a commission to Cn. Servilius the Col. for to send the delegats into Macedony, such as L. Emilius thought good of. Whereupon within two daies after, Cn. Domitius Enobarbus and A. Licinius Nerva, took their journey as legats and commissioners. News came in the latter end of this year, that it rained stones twice, namely in the territory of Rome, and likewise about Vesii: and therefore a novendiall sacrifice was celebrated. This yeer there died certain priests, namely, Pub. Quintilius Varus, a flamin of Mars, and M. Claudius Marcellus a Decemvir, in whose room was substituted Cn. Octavius. And now noted it was, that the magnificence and port of the people of Rome encreased, for that in the plaies called Circenses exhibited by Publius Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and Publius Lentulus Aediles Curule, three score, and three

3 wild beasts out of Africa, with 40 bears & elephants, were baird to make sport to the people. AH
 When L. Aemilius Paulus and P. Licinius entered their Consulship upon the nineteenth of March, which was the beginning of the year following, the PE of the Senat were in great expectation, and especially what the Consul would propose unto them as touching the Macedonian war, which was his proper province. But Paulus said that he had nothing to propound and put to counsel, seeing that the Delegates aforesaid were not returned. And at Brundisium (quoth he) they now are, having twice in their voyage upon the sea been driven back by tempests, and cast upon Dyrrhachium. But so soon as I am once advertised and have perfect knowledge of those things that first are to be known, I will then consult; and that will be within very few daies. Now to the end that nothing may stay and hinder his journey, he told them, that the even before the Ides of April, was appointed for the solemnity of the Latine festival holidays. And after sacrifice duly performed [upon the Albane hill] the Senat should no sooner ordain, but he and C. Octavius would set forth and put themselves on their way. As for C. Licinius his colleague, his charge should be in his absence to provide and send all things requisite and needfull for this war. Mean while (quoth he) the embassies of forraign nations may have audience given. So when he had sacrificed as the manner was, before they took in hand the great affairs of State, the Embassadors of Alexandria, from King Protolomaeus and queen Cleopatra, were called in. Clad they were in poor array, the hair of their head long, their beards side and overgrown, and carrying in their hands branches of the Olive-tree, they entred into the Senat, and fell groveling and prostrat upon the floor. Their habit and apparel was not so simple and mournful, their look and countenance not so heavy and sorrowfull, but their speech was more piteous and lamentable. Antiochus now King of Syria, and who had sometime been hostage at Rome under a colourable pretence of honesty and equity to restore Protolomaeus the elder to his Kingdom, made not war upon his younger brother, who then held Alexandria: and after a victory obtained in sea-fight neer Perisus, he made a bridge of hasty work upon the river Nilus, over which he transported his army, & now laid siege to Alexandria: so as by all likelyhood he would shortly by way of conquest be lord of a most rich and wealthy Kingdome. In which regard, these Embassadors made pitefull moan and grievous complaint, beseeching withall the Senat, of their aid and succour to that realm and those Kings, who were such friends to their feignory and dominion. For perswaded they were that the people of Rome had done so much for Antiochus in particular, & were of that account & authority with all other Kings and nations, that if they would but send their Embassadors to intimate thus much, that the Senat was not well pleased with waging war upon confederat Kings, he would presently raise his siege, depart from before the walls of Alexandria, and withdraw his army clean away into Syria. But if they protracted the time long and delayed thus to do, then should Protolomaeus and Cleopatra within a while be driven out of their realm, and forced to come to Rome with some shamefull spot of dishonour to the people of Rome, in that they had not let their helping hand in that extreame danger of all their fortunes. The LL of the Senat moved with compulsion at the prayers of these Alexandrians, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimus, and A. Hostilius as Embassadors to determine and make an end of the war between those two Princes. In commission they had first to go unto Protolomaeus, and then to Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that unless they surrendred and gave over arms, they would take him neither for friend nor confederate, whom it was long of that the war was not given over. So these three together with the Alexandrian Embassadors, took their leave within three daies & departed. Then the forsaide Delegates returned from out of Macedony, the last day of the feastivall games to Minerva called Quinquatrus, and not before they were welcome; for so looked for they were, had it not been evenide when they came, the Consuls would immediately have called the Senat together. But the morrow after the Senat sat, and those commissioners had audience given. Report they made first, that with more danger then profit ensuing, the army entred into Macedony, over those passies and streights, where was no way nor passage at all. Item, that the King kept the countrey of Pueria, into which the Roman armie was now advanced, and were so neer encamped one to the other, that nothing but the river Enipus between kept them asunder: that neither the K. made offer of battel, nor the Rom. were of sufficient strength to challenge & force him to fight; moreover, that the winter had overtaken them (a time unreasonable for warlike exploits) that the souldiers were nuzled and nourished in idleness, notwithstanding they had victuals to serve no longer then six daies; also, that by report the Macedonians were thirty thousand strong. Were it so that Ap. Claudius had a good and sufficient power about Lychnidum, he might be able to trouble the K. and put him to his trumps in a battel; but now both Appianus and the garrison with him, are themselves in extreame jeopardy, unless with speed either a complete army be sent thither, or else they draw from thence: where they are, into Macedony. Over and besides they related, how from the camp they went towards the fleet, where they heard say, that some of the sea-faring men and mariners were dead of sickness, others, and namely, those of Sicily above the rest, were gone home again to their own houses, inasmuch as there were not men enow to serve the ships; & those that remained, had neither their wages paid & mony to put in their purse, nor liveries & apparel to hang on their backs. As for Eumenes & his fleet, they (like ships driven to a coast by force of wind and weather, without any other errand or cause else) were come and gone again, and it seemed the mind of that K. was not well settled and resolved. But as they reported also Eumenes suspiciously & in doubtful terms, so they assured them of the singular fidelity & constancy of Antiochus his

A his brother. When these Legates had spoke then said L. Aemilius, let us debate now in council what is to be done as concerning this war. So the Senat ordained, that for eight legions the Consuls and the people should elect an equal number of martiall Tribunes or Colonels, the one as many as the other, and that none should be created and advanced to that place for that year, but such as had borne some honourable dignity: then, out of all those Tribunes thus elected, that L. Aemilius should make choice for those two legions which were to go into Macedony, of whom he would himself: also, that after the solemnity of the Latine feasts performed, L. Aemilius the Consul and C. Octavius the Praetor and Admirall of the fleet, should depart into their Province. A third was joyned in commission with them, to wit, L. Anicius the Praetor and L. chief Justice for strangers. And ordained it was, that he should pass into Illyricum about Lachnidum, for to succeed Ap. Claudius. The charge of taking misters was put upon C. Licinius the Consul. He had commandment to enroll seven thousand [foot] Citizens of Rome, and two hundred horsemen, and to charge the Latine allies with a levy of seven thousand footmen, and four hundred horse. Also to send letters unto Cn. Servilius, who governed the Province of Gaul, to enroll six hundred men of arms. This army he had commandment to send with all convenient speed to his Colleague into Macedony, so as in that Province there should not be above two legions, and the same full and compleat, containing six thousand foot, and three hundred horse apeece. As for the increase, as well of the Cavalry as Infantry, they should be disposed and bestowed in sundry garrisons. And all such as were unmeet for service, were to be called and sent away. Moreover, the allies were put to set out and find 10000 foot, and 800 horse. And those were to serve in garrison under Anicius. Over and above the two legions, which he was commanded to lead into Macedony, consisting of 5000 foot, and 300 horsemen either of them. Also for the navy were enrolled 5000 mariners and rowers. Licinius the Cos. was appointed to defend and keep in obedience his Province with two legions, and to take besides of allies ten thousand foot, and six hundred horse.

After these ordinances of the Senat were accomplished, L. Aemilius the Cos. went forth of the Senat house into the common place before the assembly of the people: where he made a speech unto them in this wise following: "Me thinks I perceive and see, my good friends and Citizens of Rome, that ye have shewed more apparent tokens of joy and gratulation in my behalf, for that the Province of Macedony is faine to my lot: than either at the time that I was declared and saluted Cos. or that day whereupon I first entered into government: & for no other reason in the world, but upon the opinion which you have conceived, that the Macedonian war, which hath so long continued, may be brought by my means to such an end as becometh the greatness and majesty of the people of Rome. And for mine own self I have good hope, that as the gods in favour have directed this sortilege, so they will be present and propitious unto me in performing the service. In these matters, I say, I am but carried partly with conceit and partly with hope. But this one thing I am assured of, yea and I dare affirm and promise on my own head, that I will endeavour my self and employ all that is in me, that this your good opinion of me may not be in vain conceived. As for all things necessary and requisite to this war, both the Senat hath ordained: & also, for that they have thought good I should depart immediately (for which my self am well pleased and contented, neither in me there shall be any delay) my Colleague C. Licinius, a singular man, and of great valour, will provide with as great care and diligence, as if himself had the full conduct of this war. For the effecting whereof, see that whatsoever I shall write either to the Senat, or to you, ye beleieve for true: as for running rumours which have no certain author give no ear and belief thereto: neither feed them with your foolish credulity. For now I advise you, (a thing that I have observed so fall out ordinarily in this war) there is no man set forth so far by the common bruits that are blazed abroad, but his spirit and courage may be thereby quailed and dented. In all meetings now, yea and at every board (I would not else ye shall have them) that in their table talk will lead your armies into Macedony: that know where they are to lodge and encamp: what commodious places are to be seized and kept with garrisons: what time and through which pass the entry must be made into Macedony: where the garners and storehouses for corn should be built and set: which way by land and sea both, the provisions of victuals ought to be brought, when the time serveth to encounter and fight with the enemy, and when to sit still and rest. Neither are they content to set down and pronounce, what is to be done for the better: but it ought hap. to be managed otherwise than they have judged expedient, they are so bold as to controule the Cos. yet, and ready to commence a quarrel with him unjustly. These are throwd hindrances, I may tell you, to warriors & men of action. For all men have not the gift of resolution and constancy to neglect the speech and talk of men, as some times Fabius had, who chose rather to have his authority & command diminished and impaired by the folly and vanity of lewd people, than with their favourable applause and good opinion to manage his affairs but unworthily. Yet take me not so, as if I were a man that would have no respect to be admonished and advised by others: nay contrariwise, of this judgement I stand, that he who worketh all by himself, is as followeth only his own head is self-willed and is blind and working age & waste. What is then to be done? First in mine opinion, Generals and Commanders of armies are to be instructed by discreet and prudent men: by such as are skillful in the practice in sorts of armed military science: by those also that by long practice are thoroughly experienced: say more than that, they are to be taught and counselled by them that are usually present and conversant in the execution of affairs, who daily see the advantage of "The 1. of February.

During these occurrences in Italy, Perseus who (because he was to be at the charges of disbursing money) never thought of it, to go through with that which before he had begun, namely, to ad-joyn unto him Gentius King of the Illyrians: so soon as he perceived that the Romans were chrred the straights, and the war come now to this extremity of hazard: thought good now to make that sure and put it off no longer. Whereas therefore he had covenanted & promised by his Em-bassador Hippas three hundred talents of silver, with condition also, that for security hostages should be put in of both parties interchangeably: he sent Pantaneus one of his most trusty friends to dispatch and make an end of this affair. This Pantaneus met the Illyrian King at Medon in the Country of Labacis: where he both took an oath of the King, and also received his hostages.
 Gentius likewise sent his ambassador, named Olympio, to demand the semblable oath of Perseus, and require hostages accordingly: with him were certain persons sent of purpose to receive the money, who also by the advice of the said Pantaneus were to go in embassy with the Macedonians to Rhodes: and the men hereto appointed were Parmenio and Morycus. But they had in charge and commission after the oath taken, after hostages & money received, to go to Rhodes, & not before. L Good hope they conceived that the Rhodians might be solicited and induced to take arms against the Romans, by using the name of these two KK: at once: and this account they made, that if this State which carried the renown and honour above all others for sea-service, would once combine and band with them they should leave the Romans no hope at all, either on land or sea.
 When these Illyrians arrived, Perseus departed with all his Cavalry from before the river Enipeus where he was encamped, and encountered them near Dium. There were all the complements performed according to the covenants, in the sight and midst of the Cavalry, whom the K. of purpose would needs have to be present at this accord of association made between him and K. Gentius, supposing that it would comfort & encourage them the more. So the hostages were given and taken in the presence of them all. They also who were to receive the money were sent to Pellæ M where the K. his treasure lay: and those that should go to Rhodes with the Illyrian ambassadors had commandment to embark at Thessalonica. Now was Metrodorus there, lately come from Rhodes who assured them by the means of Dion & Polyarchus, two principall personages of that City, that the Rhodians were prest and ready to war. Whereupon the said Metrodorus was appointed the chief in this embassy of Macedonians and Illyrians together. At the same time likewise was addressed and imparted both unto Eumenes & also unto Antiochus, such advice and counsel in common, as the present condition wherein their affairs stood, might minister & afford argument namely, "That a free City and a K. were two; by nature, enemies that possibly could not live together:
 "That the people of Rome went in hand with them severally one after another & (that which was
 "a greater indignity & unsupportable) used the force of KK to overthrow the state of KK. For so, N
 "by the aid of Attalus they had brought his father Philip to ruin: by the help likewise of Eumenes, "& partly also of his father Philip, Antiochus was defeated; & even now against himself both E-
 "menes and Prusias were put in arms, if the kingdom of Macedonia were once subverted have it
 "Asia next; which the Romans have in some part seized already for their own under a colour
 "of enfranchizing Cities, & setting them free: & then they will not leave until they have Syria "too. For now is Prusias preferred in honour before Eumenes; & Antiochus for all his conquest is "chased & debarr'd out of Egypt, which ought to have been the recompence of the war by him "enterprised & achieved. In these regards Perseus advertised each of them to consider & provide
 "therefore either to force the Romans to make peace with him, or else to hold them for the com"mon enemies of all KK. in case they persisted still in so unjust a war. The commission that the em-
 "bassadors had to Antiochus was open & open: but unto Eumenes an ambassador was sent under a "pretence of ransoming certain captives: but privily there were under hand more secret plots:
 "which caused Eumenes even then to be suspected & odious unto the Romans, yet & charged after"ward with more grievous matters, although contrary. For he was reputed like better than a traitor
 "& a professed enemy to their state, whereas indeed both he & Prusias strove who could compass "surprize, & overtake one another better in fraud & avarice. Now there was one Cylas a Greek-

An inward & most secret threat to Emilius had also had commended him at Amphipolis with one Chimius a confidant of his, who served under Perseus in the wars; and afterwards at Demetrius conferred with another named Antiochus also with a certain third person called Antiochus, all captains to Perseus, even under the very walls of the foresaid City. Over and besides, Erophen who at this time was sent, had beforetime been employed in two several embassies to the same Emilius. These secret communications and embassies were badly spoken of; but no man knew what was concluded between the two Kings. However, that the calistood Emilius as he had no mind nor intention to war upon Perseus, so he was not desirous in his heart that he should have the victory of the Romans; not so much for the old enmity which had been between both their fathers as for the hateful quarrels kindled among themselves. For this concurrence & emulation there was between these two Princes, that Emilius could never abide to see Perseus (or to purchase so great wealth & so much honour as he must needs acquire by the conquest of the Romans; he saw moreover, that Perseus from the first beginning of this war fought by all means possible for peace, & the nearer he was to danger & damage, aimed thereat every day more than others, employing his whole study & care about nothing else. He perceived also that among the Romans, because the war grew to be longer than they hoped and looked for, as well their captains as the Senate were well enough content and very desirous to see an end once of so troublesome, hurtfully, and difficult a war. Knowing thus as he did the mind and will of both parties, he declined & framed to that which, or it left as he thought might fall out, where the stronger was weary and the weaker in fear; and therein desired he to shew his double diligence, thereby to win a thank & purchase favour of both parts. For he entered into bargain with Perseus for a sum of money, one while not to aid the Romans either by land or sea; another while to be a means for peace and to treat with the Romans thereabout, and not to meddle at all in the war, but to sit still: he capitulated (I say) for 1500 talents; making semblance and shew, that for the assurance both of the one and the other, ready he was not only to free, but also to put in good and sufficient hostages. Perseus was the willingest man in the world to set on hand with this as being driven thereto by the exigent of fear; and presently without delay dealt with him as touching the hostages which were to be received; and in this concluded it was that they should upon their delivery and safety be sent into Greece. But when they came on to take of the money aforesaid, he halted and stuck at that; and to lay a truth either of these two lumps (between Princes of so great name and honour) was but a dale and dishonest consideration; a thing much unfitting (I say) the giver, and more the receiver. Perseus very far for his part in hope to purchase peace with the Romans, was willing enough to be at the expense of so much money; more, he said, that he would make payment thereof when the thing was done and accomplished; & in the mean time lay in his life for that purpose within the temple of Demetrius. Emilius again considering that the said sum was an assistance to the dominion of Perseus, could not see but that it was all one for it to be there and in Italy; and therefore was careful to have part thereof in hand. Thus between them there was nothing but lying in the wind for the vintage, who could over-reach the other; & what was gained in the end but infamy and discredit. As for Perseus, he not only let fall this design and lost his opportunity (and that by his negligence only) when by the means of Emilius, he might have had either his money more enough, or peace or in (which indeed he should have bought, if it had cost him the one half of his kingdom, and been once received into state & liberty of the people of Rome) he might have detained and brought into oblation and danger his country, by charging him to have received a piece of money for a bribe, and so justly have let the Romans upon his top; but also the association with King Perseus, which now was at the point of a conquest, was neglected; yea, and a mighty army of Gauls (read at that time all over Italy) and was sent, but was even then recruited and discharged by his purchasing and laying of his money. Nor these same and offered their service to Emilius and Romans and as many more, and those so well practised and in good of foot, manly as that they were able to hold out a pace with horses, and manly to the rider, such as they were, which were unpurged and full could walk & mount on the empty horse backs ready to fight in their own way. These had bargained to have for pay every horseman ten Philip pieces [of gold] paid down aforeshand, and a footman five, and their Captains thirty and. Perseus departed from his league lying past the river Enipeus, and with the one half of his own forces met these coming from the war, and caused proclamation to be made in all towns and villages near the high ways, To make ready and bring abroad their provision of victuals, and see that there were plenty of corn, of wine, and cattle. Himself though with him horses and trappings, and his footmen, all armed with bare horse. Thus he came to the City of Aloneus, and encamped there the last of the month of April. But his army of Gauls were lodged about Aloneus in the country of Aloneus and called there a meeting he promised the money aforeshand according to contract. But Perseus sent go to them, Antiochus one of his gallants and courtiers, to wait and command the soldiers for the money to be paid, and to move to Aloneus, a place in call of Aloneus, and a good sort of the rich of to report unto him. Nay, were they three score and thirty miles from the river Aloneus and the King's army. And when Antiochus had delivered these words to the soldiers, he had in shew, and ended besides, with what care and diligence the King had laid his provisions by the way of all things in great plenty for the army, and with what gifts of apparell, silver, and horses, he purposed to receive and entertaine these Captains. At their first coming unto him: as for that (say they) we shall take no more than when we are in presence personally: but now for this time, we demand, Whether he will give us with you in ready coin according to bargain, that gold which is to be paid to the soldiers, as well horse as foot? And when he could make no answer thereto, but was yet unpersuaded, then the said Cloniscus their Prince, Go your waies then (sayd he) and tell your King and Master, that the Gauls unless they may receive the gold, and hostages besides for their security, will not stir one foot forward. Relation being made hereof unto the King, he called his Council: and when it was soon less than hold the royall estate of his kingdom, began to enter into a discourse of a disloyalty and savage nature of these Gauls; making remembrance, how he had experience by the calamities and losses of many before him, that dangerous it was to receive so great a multitude of them within Macedony, for fear the Gauls would be found worse neighbors than the Romans were enemies. Five thousand horsemen are sufficient (sayd he) and so many well we may have good use of in wars, and need not be afraid of them for their number. But every man saw well enough, that it was the waging of such a number that he feared, and nothing else: but when no man durst give him counsell, albeit he seemed to ask their advice, Antigonus was sent again with a message unto the Gauls. That the King stood in need of five thousand horsemen and no more, as for all the rest he weighed them not. When these Barbarians heard that, all the rest began to mutter and grumble, yea, and to take great scorn and indignation, that they were levied and departed out of their native country for nothing: but Cloniscus redemanded, Whether he would make present pay to those five thousand according to covenant, yea, or nay? but seeing that he was to seek, and made shifts to avoid a direct answer, he let this deceitfull messenger go his waies, and did no harm unto his person (a thing that Antigonus himself would scarcely have thought could possibly have been.) And so after they had given the wasse unto those parts of Thracia which lay near to their way, they returned back again to the river Ister. Which power of men if it had passed the straits of Perrhaebia into Thessaly against the Romans (although Perseus had not hired at all, but been still at Enipeus) might not only have spoiled and laid bare the territory all about, and embarked the Romans for expecting any victuals there, but also destroyed the towns utterly, whiles Perseus held the Romans play at Enipeus that they could not relieve and succour the Cities of their allies and confederats. Nay, the very Romans should have enough to do to look unto themselves, considering, that there was no carrying for them, after that Thessaly was lost, which nourished and maintained their army, and past forward they could not possibly, having the Macedonian camp to affront them. But Perseus by that deed, as he confirmed the hearts of the Romans, so he quailed not a little the courages of the Macedonians, who depended upon the hope and expectation of other aid. By the same miserable pinching of his he changed also the heart of K. Gentius from him. For when as at Pella he had paid 300 talents unto those that were sent of purpose from Gentius to receive the same, well content he was that they should feel up that money. Afterwards he sent unto Pantheus their taken, and commanded him to deliver the same to the King in person. As for the rest figured up with the seal of the Illyrians, he commanded his own men who had the convey thereof, in going with it to take small journeys, and when they were come to the utmost frontiers of Macedony, there to rest and attend the messengers from him. Gentius, after he had received a counsel that small portion of the whole sum aforesaid, being called upon continually by Pantheus and for on to provoke the Romans by some hostility or other, made no more ado, but committed to prison M. Perseus and L. Perilius, who chanced at that time to come thither him in embassy. Which when Perseus once heard, he had enough of thought, how he might have done that, whereby of necessity he must be forced to wage war with the Romans; and thereupon sent out presently to call those back who had the carriage of the foresaid talents: as if he had studied and thought for nothing more, than to reserve as great a booty as possibly he could, for the Romans, as for those that they had vanquished and subdued him, Eropon returned likewise from Eumenes, and with him what had been contrived secretly between them. That their treaty was about certain captives, they themselves had given forth abroad, and likewise Eumenes advertised the Romans so much, for avoiding of all suspicion.

23. Perseus after the return of Eropon from Eumenes was much distressed and cast down. Whereupon, he sent Antenor & Calippus (admirals of his navy) to Tenarum with forty prizes, unto which number five Gallions were adjoynd: who from that coast depending themselves all about the Islands Cyclades, might wait and guard the lighters and holes charged with corn, as they sailed to Macedony. These ships were gone to sea at Dafanion, and first they fell with the haven that he under the foot of the mountain Atthos and from thence sailed to Tenarum with pleasure to catch, where finding certain Rhodian open ships riding in the harbour, they spoke courteously to Eumenes their Admiral, and let them alone without any hurt at all done unto them. But afterwards upon knowledge, that fifty hulks of theirs on another side were shut up and sent to by the war-ships of K. Eumenes (which rid in the mouth of the haven, and were commanded by Dionysius) he turned about in all haste, & dispersed the enemies ships with a sudden terror, that he put them in, & sent the said hulks & vessels of burden into Macedony, with a convoy of ten brigantines to wait them over: with this charge, That after they had conducted them past all danger into place of safety, they should return again to Tenarum. After the date they retired toward the straits, having then

In the Iode of Sigam. From whence they crossed over to Sabota, an Island lying between Ella and Chios. It fortuned, that the morrow after the fleet was arriv'd at Sabota, five and thirty Bells which they call Hippagoga [serving for the transporting of horses] which came from Ella, having aboard certain horsemen of Gaul and their horses, made head toward Phana, a cape or promontory of the Chians, from whence they might cut over into Macedony. And these were sent from Eumenius to Antenor, Antenor being advertised by a signall given him from a watch-tower, that those ships were discovered under sail in the open sea, loosed from Sabota; and between the cape of Elythra and Chios, where the sea is most narrow, he encountered them. The admirals of K. Eumenius thought nothing less, than that any fleet of Macedonians were abroad in those seas: but imagined one while they were Romans, otherwhiles, that it was Attalus or some sent back from Attalus,

B who from out of the Roman camp were sailing toward Pergamus. But as they approached nearer, they took knowledge by the form and fashion of their pinnaces who they were, by their busy rowing also and making head full against them they were out of all doubt that their enemies were at hand. Then were they mightily afraid as having no hope to resist and withstand them, considering the ships were unweildy and unhandsome, and the Gauls besides could hardly brook the very sea without any other trouble. Some of them therefore, who were nearer to the firm land saved themselves by swimming to Brythra; others set up their sails, and being cast upon the Island Chios, forsook their horses, and ran as fast as they could for refuge to the City. But the barks discharged their armed souldiers nearer to the City in a more commodious place for landing, where the Macedonians overtook the Gauls and slew them; some in the way as they fled, others before

C the very gate of the City, being kept out and excluded from thence: for the Chians not knowing either who fled or who pursued, had shut their gates upon them. Nine hundred Gallo-greeks, or very near doth their lives and were hewn in peeces, and 200 taken alive. As for the horses, part perished in the sea after the ships were split and broken, and the Macedonians haught and cur the strings of their gambrels of as many of them as they found upon the shore. Twenty of the best and fairest horses, together with the prisoners, Antenor commanded that those ten barks which he had sent before, should transport to Thessalonica, and return again with all speed to the fleet, for that he would expect their coming at Phana. The fleet staid about three daies under the City side, but afterwards went forward to Phana; and when the ten pinnaces aforesaid were returned sooner than they looked for, they set up sail in the Aegean sea for Delos.

D In this while the Roman Embassadors, C. Popilius, C. Ducentius, and C. Hostilius, departed from Chalcis, and arriv'd with three Quinquageme galiees at Delos, where they found forty Macedonian pinnaces, and five royall Quinquageme galiees of K. Eumenius. The holiness of the Temple and Island wherein it stood afforded security to them all, so as there was no hurt done nor violence offered from one to another. And therefore, as well Romans as Macedonians, and besides the sailors and mariners of K. Eumenius confled together, intermingled one with another in the Temple, and the religious devotion of the place yielded them truce and surcease of hostility.

Antenor, the admirall of K. Persius, when he was advertised from the watch and sentinell, that certain ships of burden were seen far off in the sea, set sail, & made after them himself with part of his pinnaces; and part of them he bestowed in war among the Cyclades, and having those that directed their course toward Macedony, he either drowned or spoiled them all. Popilius did the best he could, and Eumenius with his ships likewise to save some; but the Macedonians, who sailed by night with two or three pinnaces at the most, deceived them and were not discovered.

Much about this time the Macedonian and Illyrian Embassadors came together to Rhodes, who banded the greater authority and credit with the Rhodians, by reason not only of the coming of their brigantine, which sailed to and fro ranging over the Aegean sea and among the Cyclades, but also by the conjunction and association of the two K. Persius and Gentius, together with a rumor that sometime Gauls, who were coming with a great number, as well of horse as foot. And now both Dionysius and Polyarchus, who took part with Persius, took more courage and heart unto them, by whose means there was not only a gracious answer returned to the Kings, but also pronounced openly, it was that by their authority they would make an end of the war. In regard whereof, the Kings also for their parts were to be disposed and well willing to accept of peace.

E Now was it the prime of the spring, when as the new legions were arriv'd into their Provinces, Lucius the Col. into Macedony; Oppidius to the navy at Oreus; and Anicius into Illyria, whose commission was to levy war against Gentius. This Gentius was the son of Plautus King of the Illyrians, and Enkidia was his mother: two brethren he had, to wit, Plator of the whole blood by father and mother both, and Caracanthus only by the mothers side. This half brother he was suspected by reason of his base parentage from the father; but as for Plator he murdered, together with two especial friends of his Etricus and Epicadus (brave men of action) to the end that he might reign in more liberty and security. The voice goeth that he carried an envious eye to

F his brother of his, for that he had espoused Elena the daughter of Hannus the Prince of the Dardaniens; and by this marriage he meant to make himself strong and combine with the Dardaniens; and the more likelihood this carried with it after he married the damoell indeed, Plator made away Plator, and rid himself of the fear that he might have of his brother. He began to molest and oppress his own natural subjects; and as he was by nature given to violence, so that disposition of his he set on fire with untemperat drinking of wine. But as we said before, being moved and incited to war against the Romans, he assembled all his forces together unto Lissus, to the number of 15000 armed men, and sent his brother from thence with 3000 foot and 500 horse against the Cavianes, for to subdue that nation either by force or fear, whiles himself led his army five miles against the City Bassania from Lissus. Now, while the Bassanians considered allies of the Romans: and therefore when they were first solicited by messengers to yield they resolved rather to endure a siege than do so. As for Gentius he was graciously and friendly received at his first coming into Durina, a town of the Cavianes: but Caracanthus, another City, made the gates fast against him: and as he gave the watch to the sentinels about it, certain of his soldiers stragling here and there, were by the peasants and villagers killed, who came forth and made head against them.

And now by this time Appius Claudius having taken with him, over and above his own army, the auxiliaries of the Bullians, Apollonians, and Dyrhachians, dislodged out of the place where he had wintered, and encamped near the river Gentius. For hearing of the alliance made between Perseus and Gentius, and incensed besides with the outrage committed upon the Roman ambassadors, whom Gentius put in prison, he resolved certainly to war upon him. Anicius the Praetor being at that time at Apollonia, and advertised in what terms the affairs stood in Illyricum, dispatched letters beforehand to Appius, willing him to attend at Gentius for his coming: and so within three daies after came himself to the camp there: and to those aids which he had of his own, he took with him two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, drawn out of the youth and flower of the Partians. Of the Infantry Epicadus had the conduct, and Agathus commanded the Cavalry. With this power he prepared to go into Illyricum, principally for to levy the siege before Bassania: but this design projected by him, was impeached by a bruise that was blown of certain pinnaces which wasted and spoiled the sea-coasts. A fleet they were together of eighty sail, sent from Gentius by the instigation of Pantuncus, to forrage the territories of Apollonia and Dyrhachium. Then the fleet

Which being surrendered, they submitted also and yielded themselves. And so consequently other Cities of that country one after another did the semblable: and the inclination & disposition of mens minds that way, was much set forward by the clemency and justice of the Roman Praetor which he used toward all. Then they marched to Scodra, the capital place and seat-town of the war: not only for that Gentius had seized upon it for his own self, as the chief strength and fortress of all his realm, but also because it was the strongest peece of all the Labeate nation, and very difficult for access. Enclosed it is with two rivers: so wit, Clanfala which runneth along the East side of the City, and Bathana on the West, arising out of the marsh Labeatis. These two rivers joyn in one, and are discharged together into the great river Oriundus: which springing from the mountain Scodrus, and increased still with the confluence of many other waters and rivulets, fallerh at length into the Adriack sea. This Scodrus is the highest hill by odds of all other in those quarters: on the east it hath Dardania under it, on the South Macedony, and Illyricum on the West. Albeit, this town was strongly situated, by the naturall site of the place, and defended by the whole nation of the Illyrians and the King himself in person: yet the Roman Praetor (encouraged with the good success he had at the first, and supposing the fortune of the totall war would be answerable to so happy beginning, and that a sudden terror also would serve him in much speed and prevail) approached the walls of the town with his army ready embattelled, and displayed his banners against it. Now if they had shut their gates, and defended their walls and towers over the gates, with armed guards bestowed accordingly, surely they had repulsed the Romans from the walls, and defeated them of their enterprise clean: but they issued forth of the gate, and in the plain and even ground gave battell with more animosity and courage, than they maintained it with persistence. For being discomfited and driven back, and in the chase hindered by heaps together as they fled, after 10000 above were slain in the very straight entrance of the gate, they put the rest within in such a fright, that Gentius incontinently sent unto the Praetor, as Orators, Tentulus and Bellus, the principal persons of that nation to treat and intreat for a increase of arms, that in the mean while he might debate in council and be advised as touching the main estate of his affairs. And when for this purpose he had obtained a grant for three daies, and the Romans lay encamped from the City half a mile: Gentius took a barge, and sailing along the river Bathana, passed into the lake or meare of the Labeates, as if he had sought some secreet place to consult in. But as it appeared afterwards, he was moved upon a certain vain hope of his brother Caracanthus his coming, who was said to be near at hand accompanied with many thousands of fighting men, whom he had levied and brought out of that quarter into which he was sent. But when this rumour was over-blown & vanished to nothing, down the river he went again with the stream the third day after in the same vessel to Scodra, and sent courriers before him to the Praetor, requiring leave to parley & commune with him: which being granted, he entered into the camp. First, he began his speech with accusing and confounding himself at the Praetor his feet, he submitted to his devotion. The Praetor at the first had him take a good heart unto him and be of good cheer, and invited him to supper: and so he returned to his own people into the City, where he was honorably settled that day by the Praetor. But afterwards he was delivered to the guard and keeping of C. Cassius, a martiall Colonell: and then received he of K. Perseus only ten talents (a mean reward and hardly sufficient to contract a simple and displeased) to engage himself into a world of dangers and being a King, as he was, to fall into this extreme calamity and misery. Anicius having entered upon Scodra, first before all other things, sought out that that the two Embassadors, Phidias and Barchanes should be sought out and brought unto him: whom after he had restored to their native state and reputation, he sent Perperna presently to summon his friends and kindreds of the King: who took his way directly to Ades, a City of the Libyans, and brought with him into the camp at Scodra Ellyria the King's wife, with her two sons Scandianus and Phanias together with Carvantius the K. his brother. Thus Antiochus having ended the Illyrian war within the compass of thirty daies, sent Perperna to Rome with tidings of this victory: and within few daies Antiochus himself after him together with his mother, his wife and children his brother and other I.L. of the Illyrians. This was the only war achieved and brought to an end before they heard at Rome that it was begun.

During the management of these affairs, Perperna also was in great fear and affright, by reason of the coming of Lucius Scipio a new Consul (who as the voice went, marched against him with great menaces) together with Oppianus the Pretor. Neither was he less terrified with the Roman army and the danger of the sea-coasts. Eumenes and Athenagoras had the keeping and command of Thas Calymna with a small garison of two thousand targettiers. Thither he sent Captain Antiochus also with commandment to encamp close to the very harbor where the ships lay in rode. Unto Antiochus he sent one thousand horsemen under the leading of Antigonus, to guard the sea-coast; so the end that in what part soever they heard the enemies ships were arrived, they might incontinently advance to the succour of the peasants and country people. Five thousand Macedonians were likewise sent to lie in garison at Pythium and Petra, under the conduct of Hippinus, Tibullus and Asiden. After these were departed, he went in hand to fortifie the bank of the river Enipeus: because it was passable over the very channell on dry foot. And to the end that all the multitude should be employed hereabout, the very women were compelled out of the towns adjoining to bring victuals into the camp. The souldiers were commanded from out of the woods near by

Finally, the water-bearers in leather bits or bottels, were commanded to follow him to the sea, which was a quarter of a mile off: and thereupon they stood to dig pits, some in one place, and some in another, a pretty distance asunder. The exceeding high hills all about him in good hope (so the rather because they sent out from them no rivers to be seen in open view) that they contained within them some hidden springs, the veins whereof draining into the sea, were intmingled with the sea-water. They had scarcely sunk through the uppermost course of sand above, when they might see small sources to boil up, at the first troubled, but afterward they began to yield shier and clear water in great abundance: by a speciall gift (as it were) of the gods above. And even this occurrent also increased the name and reputation of the Captain with his souldiers. Therafter he had commanded his men to make ready their armour, himself with the martiall Tribunes, and the principall foremost tanks, marched to recognise and view the passages, and to see where the armed men might descend with ease; and where they might with least trouble mount up the bank on the further side. When he had taken a sufficient survey hereof, he foretold & gave direction aforehand, for all things to be done in the army in good order without trouble, and tumultuous noise, even at the very beck and commandment of their leaders. For when a thing to be effected is pronounced to all at once, it falleth out that every man is not within the hearing: and so receiving an uncertain signal and commandment, some put more of their own sense to that which was commanded, and others do less again for it: and so there arise out all sorts of dissensions, cries, and by this means the enemies know sooner whereabout they go, than many of themselves. Therefore to avoid this confusion, he ordained that every martiall Colonell should give a secret watch-word to the principall Centurion of the legion; and round him in his ear what he would have done: then he and forth every one should deliver unto each Centurion the word in rank and place, what was to be executed: whether it were that the commandment was to be carried from the front of the army to the tail, or from the reterguard behind to the vanguard before. He brought up a new order and custome, forbidding the watchmen to carry with them any targets or their sentinels: for that the watchmen went not out to fight, whereby he he armed and armed, but to keep watch: that when he desired the enemies coming, he might know himself, and give others to take arms. From he ordained that the helmettiers or motions should stand upon their feet, having their shields upright before them: and when they were weary to lean and bray upon their javalins, and resting their head upon the edge of their shields, as to take a nap and sleep to the end that their glittering armour might be discovered as off by the enemy, whereas himself could not see far before him. The manner also of warding in the day time was of the Scythians & Germans he altered cleane. For whereas they were wont to stand all the day long upon horse, and the horsemen holding their horses bridled, it fell out so, that in summer daies when the sun is extreme and scorching hot, both horse and man became weary and languished, and with abiding in many hours in the heat, and oftentimes the enemies being fresh, although they were but few in number, set upon them and put them to trouble and hazard enough. These things he commanded, that the morning guard should break up at noon, and others succeed in their place to watch in the afternoon. By this means the enemy fresh and in heart could never take them weary and in charge upon them. When he had pronounced in a publike assembly as the soldiers, that he will have that that he desired should be observed accordingly, he delivered unto them a watch-word, and commanding the watchword Otarion, which he used before to the people within the camp to be. Namely, that the Centurill of an army ought only to foresee and provide for the safety of the army, and not to be concerned by himself, or otherwise with those whom he had joynted

* He speaketh of L. Pausanias.

"assistants unto him: as for such as are not called to be of his counsell, they ought neither in public like nor in privat to shew their bolts and give their advice. Three things indeed the souldier was to care and provide for: namely, to have a body most strong and nimble withall, his armour and weapons decent and fit: and thirdly, a spirit prompt and ready at all assaies to execute any commandment on a sudden. For all things else he ought to know, that the gods immortal and his Generall will take care: forasmuch, as in that army wherein the souldiers, the Consul, and chief commander, suffer themselves to be carried away with rumours and bruits of the common sort, it is not possible for any thing to go well forward & come to good effect. For his own part (according to the duty and devoir of a captain General) he would endeavour and provide to give them the occasion and opportunity of brave exploits: as for them, they were not to enquire after any future thing: but so soon as the signall is given, then every man to perform the service of a doubty souldier and valiant warrior. After these good precepts and instructions, he dismissed the assembly: and the old souldiers themselves confessed commonly in plain terms, that they had taken forth a lesson that day as young and raw novices, yea, and learned in military profession that, which they never knew before: neither shewed they only by these and such like words, with what content and general liking they heard the Cos. his speech, but also testified the same by present deed and visible effect. For immediately, you should not have seen over all the camp, one man idle and doing nothing: some fell to whet and sharpen their swords: others furnished their head-pieces, buffs, and beavers: some scoured their shields and bucklers: others their cuirasses and corselets: some fitted and buckled their harness to their bodies, and tried how they could bestir their limbs and rule their joynts under it: some shook their pikes and couched their javellins: others brandished their swords and lookt that they were sharp at point: So as a man might easily perceive by them, that upon the first occasion presented of encounter with the enemy, they would enter into conflict, either to achieve a brave victory, or to die an honourable death.

Persons also on the other side, perceiving that upon the arrivall of the Consul and the beginning of the spring together, the Roman camp refounded and hung again with their firing and rattling of armour, as if there had been some new war towards: that they were dislodged from Phylis and encamped upon the bank just over against him: and that now their leader and commander rode up and down to view and behold his fortifications and works, to see (no doubt) some way or other for passage

* Namely, the news that K. Gentius was vanquished, and that he and his kingdom was at the devotion of the Romans.

This encouraged the Romans hearts, and danted not a little the Macedonians and their King. At the first, Perseus endeavoured to suppress secretly and stop the bruit and fame thereof, by sending out certain of purpose to Pantancus (as he came from thence) to forbid him in any wise to approach the camp. But by this time were certain children seen brought by their own parents among the Illyrian hostes: and look how much more carefull order was taken to conceal all, so much the sooner was every thing set abroad and blurted out by the prattle and babble of the Kings servants attending about his person.

About the same time the Rhodian Embassadors came into the Rhodian camp, with the very same charge and commission as touching peace, which at Rome had set the LL of the Senate interceding heat & choler; but far worse audience had they in the council of the camp, & with greater discontentment. And therefore when some advised, that they should be thrust on by head and shoulders without any answer at all: the Cos. pronounced, That he would shape them an answer after fifteen daies, and not before. Mean while that it might appear what a gooly reckoning was made of these Rhodian peace-makers who came about a pacification: he began instead thereof to debate in Council as concerning the means and manner of making war. Some were of opinion (and principally the elders and ancients) to give the assault, and force the mighty Illyrian defence planted upon the bank of the river Entipus: for that the Macedonians were never able to resist, if they came upon them lustily and charged them by thick troops: for why? No longer ago (say they) than the year before, disleized they had been of so many holds both higher and better fortified and the same holden with strong garrisons. Others were of mind, that Onias the Admiral should with the fleet sail to Thessalonica & by laying waste the maritime coast, to weaken the Kings forces: to the end, that upon another war showed from behind at their backs, they might be withdrawn & trained about to defend the heart of his realm, and thereby forced to some sort to open & lay naked the passage over the river Entipus. And Onias himself was of this judgment, that the bank as well by the natural site thereof as for the forces made upon it by mans hand, was insuperable and not to be gained: so besides the engines planted every where thereupon, he heard say, that the enemies had the sight and skill to discharge all kind of shot far better and shew more dead sure than the invention of the General Scipio was worthy to command war: and after he had dissolved the assembly of his Council, he called unto him the Merchants of the Perthabians namely, Schemus and Menophilus (men of approved fidelity and wisdom) and of them in great secret enquired, What kind of passages there were over into Perthabia when they answered, That the waies were nothing difficult and dangerous: the only way they were kept and beset by the Kings guards: he conceived some hope, that if he assaulted them by night with a select company, and took them suddenly at unawares before they looked for him, he might chase them from their holds: for darts, arrows, and all other shot served to kill or to maim in the dark, when a man cannot see his mark as far off before him: but close sword-fight, dead to hand pell mell, was it that must do the deed: wherein the Roman souldier had no fellow, winning therefore

 "moon sometimes more bright out at the full, otherwhiles in the wain giving light only with the "small tips of her horns: even so they ought not to make a wonder and miraculous matter of it,
 "that the moon be dark when as her body is hidden by the shadow of the earth. Thus the moon
 "was eclipsed at the hour before prognosticated, overnight before the Ides of the Nones of "September. By occasion whereof the Roman soldiers held Calpurnius for a deeply learned sage, and a di"vine Philosopher: but contrariwise, the Macedonians were troubled with the sight thereof as an "heavy prodigy, portending and preluding the ruin of that realm and the utter destruction of the "whole nation. And surely the howling and yelling which they made in their camp all the while "until the moon recovered her full light again, was a very demonstration and prediction of wo-
 "rels. The morrow after both the armies were so fierce and greedy of fight, that both sides "were blamed by some of their own soldiers for that they went out of the field the day before,
 "and struck not battell. As for the Roman side, Paulus had his estate and defence ready, not only because the "enemy refused the fight in an open view of all men, and so retired his forces into his camp, but also "because he had placed and ranged his engines in such a place, into which the Macedonians could "not come nor advance, considering that with the smallest disadvantage of the ground
 "there is no use at all thereof. The Consul for his part, as the day before he seemed to have pre-
 "meditated and lost the opportunity of a combat, yet, and to have given the enemy advantage to depart in
 "the night season (if he had to say) to bow also he timed out the time making remembrance of his "free, whereas the height of battell at the point of day was but total for the footmen to come into "the field. Well at the last when the sentence was only pronounced about the third hour of the day,
 "he assembled his Council about him, where, some there were that thought the best course was
 "the time to offer purpose with his own butt, and an unreasonable consideration, and spent that opportunity
 "to which should be employed better in night, and a season of some worth. Calpurnius however "after some speeches passed, the Consul made an Oration unto his soldiers in this wise:
 "The only man that offered his mind and acquainted me with his Council, yet as I have
 "he held his peace, and kept silence in such sort, as he seemed to change his opinion, and to be of "my mind in the end. Some others there be that have taken a several course by themselves, and "thought it better to carp at their General behind his back, than to admonish him to the point "of fight. I will not think much nor make a daily, to render a reason both to you, and to "me, that I am of this better rather now by such means and policy, than I have the whole "of mine without you could let him consider & discourse together with me. I think to good
 "what advantage the enemies had, as how many things made against us, and to most show "that they surpass us in number, assured I am that none of you either was before, or "could chide but observe and mark yesterday, seeing their army how he was drawn and ordered "together. And of that small number which we see, the youth part of our gentles was less
 "behind to guard the baggage, & yet we work that to let nor the most cowards to the keeping of "our baggage. But suppose we had been all there together, how then I think we, I pray you, that "we

- A^c we have not enough of it, even out of this very camp wherein we have rested one whole night, to go either this day or to morrow at the battles, with the leave and power of the gods, into the field, if you shall also think good? Soldiers & not indeed, and is it all one, to bid a souldier take arms, whom neither the travel of this dayes journey, nor toil of laborious work hath rained and wearied, but is at quiet yea and fresh within his tent & so to bring him forth into the field for a battel lusty and strong, full of bodily vigour of heart? or to offer and expose unto the enemy who is heavy and fresh, who hath taken his rest and ease, & hath brought with him to a fight, his strength whole and whole, not soiled or spent upon any occasion: to present, I say, unto such an enemy, a souldier tired out with long journey upon the way, wearied with carrying his burden, all molten to sweat and dropping therewith, his throat scorched for thirst, his face and eyes full of dust, and all his body roasted against the noon-sun? Now tell me, by the ye ow to the gods, what is he that being in this so good a plight, were he the veriest beast and coward otherwise in a country could not foil and beat out of the field the hardiest & most valiant man that is? Moreover, what should I say how materiall & important this also was that our enemies had marshalled their battailions with great leisure after long time of rest, that they had repaired and refreshed their own strength, & stood ranged every man orderly in his own rank, whereas we were at one instant both hastily to embattel and set our men in array, yea, and also to fall to skirmish pell mell without all order? But may some men say, True it is, our battel indeed we should have had much out of square and thrust in great confusion: yet our camp was well fortified: we had forecast and provided for good watering, the passage thereto was good & safe by reason of strong guards placed every way: & all coasts were cleared about us by our elipses. Nay, I wis, but contrariwise, nothing (to say truly) was ours, but the bare & naked plain field where we were to fight. Your ancestors in times past, esteemed a camp fortified with rampiers and trenches, as good as a port and harbor of sure refuge, for an army against all chances and misfortunes whatsoever: from thence to take forth, & thither to retire for safety, after they had been toiled and beaten with the tumult of a battel. And therefore when it was empaled round about with good defences, they had a care also to re-enforce & strengthen it with strong guards: forasmuch as he that hath lost his camp & is turned out of it, is ever holden for vanquished, notwithstanding he won the day & had the better in the field. The hold of a camp serveth for a place of retreat to the conqueror: & of refuge to the conquered. How many armies could I reckon, which having sped but badly in the battel, were driven to take their leaguers: yet afterwards seeing their time, and spying their vantage, otherwhiles sallied forth & in the turning of an hand repuled and discomfited the enemy for all his former victory? This feat and retreat of souldiers in time of war, resembleth as a man would say, another native country of theirs: the rampier serveth instead of walls, the tent and pavilion is to every souldier his house and home. And should we have fought indeed like vagabonds without any place of mansion wherunto we might betake our selves after victory? But against these difficulties and empeachments of giving battel, this one thing is objected: How and if the enemy (say some) had gone his waies last night between, what a foul deal of trouble & sorrow should we have endured again in pursuing him as far as to the heart say to the farthest frontiers of Macedonia? But I for my part verily hold this for certain, that if he had ever meant to have sallied from thence, he would never have said thus here as he hath done, nor brought his forces out into the field. For how much more easie was it for him to depart & be gone when we were farther off, than now when we are ready to tread upon his heels and go over his back? Surely he could not possibly have given us the slip, but we should have been aware of his dislodging either by day or night. But, say he had gone his waies, what could we have wished more at the gods hands, than to let upon the back part of the enemies in the open plain ground, departing in disarray disbanded one from another, as they about doing their fort and strong hold, and whole camp situate most sure upon an exceeding high and steep bank of a river, fortified also with a rampier, and many a sconce and tower thence, we gave the venturo to assault? So, what the cause were, why the battel was put off from yesterday to this present. For I must tell you, I am as willing my self to try the fortune of a field as any other, and to that end, because the adventures to the enemy over the river Enipeus were stopped up, I have found a new way through another pass and straight by differizing the guard of the enemies there left: and never will I live over until I have defeated him quite, and brought this war to an end. After this oration all kept silence, partly for that many of them were won to his opinion, and partly because they feared to find fault to no purpose & so to give offence, when a thing was never out of question to be resolved and amended. But that day neither, was there battel fought, for any great desire that the Consul or King had thereto. The King wished it not, because he was now to change his enemies, not weary of their way as the day before, nor troubled about their countrolling as he had been & hardly at the last brought into order. The Consul also had no great desire thereto, for that his camp newly pitched, was provided neither of fewell nor forage, though he had laid in stores: and for the purveyance thereof, out of the villages and towns near at hand, many of the souldiers were gone abroad forth of the camp. And thus when all things were thus, more chance and fortune (which is more powerful than the counsell and policy of man) made means and gave occasion of a battel. There was a river not very great, next to the enemies camp, whereat both Romans and Macedonians watered: and on either bank had certain guards kept their stations for the safety and security as well of the one part as the other. Two Cohorts there were of the Romans of Alatrin and Fregens, footmen; two troops of corned soldiers, Prætorii horsemen; all commanded by M. Servilius Sulpicius a lieutenant. Over and besides, another Prætorii corps of heavy-armed men on the cliffs, containing three cohorts, namely, of Flaminii, Vetuliæ, and Cælonia footmen, together with two troops of Placentine and Cherman horsemen, all conducted by Publius. When all was well and quiet about the river, and no one provoked or challenged other, it happened that a sumpter horse of the Romans about the fourth hour of the day broke from the hands of those that had the tending and keeping of such, took the river and made toward the bank of the farther side: & when three soldiers followed after, cross the water almost knee-deep to catch him, the Thracians began to train the side from the midst of the river to their bank, but after one of them was slain, the Romans recovered the beast again & retired to their own guard. Now there was a strong corps de garde of 800 Thracians upon the bank which the enemies kept, from whence some few at first, taking it to the heart that a countryman of theirs should thus be killed before their face, traversed over the river in pursuit of those that had slain him; afterwards more and more, and in the end all followed after, and together with that guard leader to the battle. Men were moved with a reverence of the majesty of his place, as he was L. General; also with respect of the honour and glory of the man otherwise, and above all, with the regard of his age: for that being about three score years old he did undergo the offices and parts of young men in the adventures of greatest travell and danger. That void space which was between the light targetiers, called Cetræi, and the thick battalions named Phalanges, the legion took up clean, and broke within the battell of the enemies. Behind the Cetræi was this legion and had a front them the Pavoiuers called Asclepiades, with resplendent or shining shields. L. Attilius, who had been Consul beforetime, was commanded to lead against the battailon of other Pavoiuers called Leucopides with white shields. And that was the main battell of the enemies. Against the right flank, from which quarter the skirmish first began about the river, the Elephants were conducted together with a wing of confederat horsemen and from thence began the Macedonians to fly. For like as many new devices and inventions of men carry some show in apparence of worth when they are first spoken of; but come to practice and try them once, and not to argue and dispute how they should be put in execution, they vanish away without effect and prove just nothing: even so at that time, the Elephants bare a name only in the battell, without any use and service at all. That violence of the Elephants (such as it was) the Latine allies seconded immediately, and forced the left flank to retire. Then the second legion was put forth, and in the midst entered upon the Phalanx and put it to flight; neither was there any cause of victory more evident than this, namely, that many skirmishes there were in divers places, which at the last troubled the Phalanx, and afterwards discomfited it. True it is that to abide the force thereof it is impossible so long as it keepeth close united together & putteth forth their many pointed pikes bent thick couched together breast-high: but if a man by charging the same here and there, force them once or twice about those pikes, which for their length and heavy weight are slowly and hard to guide, they soon are intangled and catch one within another unto deadly hurt; but in case it fall out that there be any thrust made either a flank or behind, then there ensueth a general trouble and confusion of all, as if they all at once came tumbling down: like as it happened then when as against the Romans who assailed them by troops in many parts, they were driven to break their battailon into many pieces, as if were, and so to make head & affront the enemy. But the Romans chose where there was a breach made and a hole left between, and there they would intrude and wind in with their ranks and files: who, if they had run upon the front of the Phalanx close and together with their whole battailon, they had enveloped and entangled themselves within their pikes; (which in the beginning of the conflict happened to the Cetræi, as they closely dealt with the targetiers, called Cetræi) and had never been able to draw that battailon untried back and coyned together. But as there was a cruel laughter committed upon the companies of the infantry in every place, save only those that flung away their weapons and fled to the soldiers of the Cavalry departed in manner late and found out of the conflict. The first man that fled, and now by this time was escaped beyond Freges and with his cohorts of horsemen which they call Sacra made haste to Felice. Anon after followed Calpurnius, and the Cavalry of the Odyris thus consequently, other troops and companies of Macedonian horsemen departed and kept their arrayes unbroken: for that the Phalanx or battailon of the footmen between which were the conquerours occupied in execution, put them quite out of remembrance to make the men of arms. A long time continued the massacre of this Phalanx about, a flank & behind. In the end they who escaped the hands of the enemies, fled without weapons to the sea, some took the water, and stretching forth their hands to them that were shoore in the ships, they humbly besought them for to save their lives: and when they saw the small pinnaces and cockboats making space on all hands toward them from the ships, they imagining that their coming was to catch them for their prisoners rather than to kill them outright, waded as it were into the water, yet some swam forward: but when they saw they were by them of the boats slain in all those manner like enemies as many as could, went back again to land: where they met with a colder welcome, and were worse plagued than before: for the Elephants driven by their governors to the shore, trode them under foot and crushed their guts out. All men generally agreed in this point, that never at any one field, were so many Macedonians defeated and killed by the Romans: for 30000 men were

A were there slain, and to the number of five (who fled to Pella out of the battail) came almainto the enemies hands; 5000 besides were taken prisoners, as they fled for nothing and disbanded here and there. Of the victors there died not above an hundred, and the grose part by sea of Pe-lignians; but a greater number of them were hurt and wounded. And if the battail had begun sooner, that the wisdom might have had day enough to follow the chain upon their enemies, all their forces had been surely defeated and devoured by the sword: but upon the night coming upon them, as it covered and shadowed the enemies that fled, so it caused the Romans not to be so hasty and forward in pursuit: considering they were not acquainted with the coasts of the country. Perseus fled to the forest Pieria by the post rode way with a great number of horsemen and his royal train about him. So soon as he was entered the forest where the way divided into B sundry and diverse parts, seeing that the night approached, he turned out of the high beaten way with very few of his most loyal and faithful friends. The horsemen being thus abandoned and left destitute of their leader, slipt some one way, and some another home into their own Cities: certain of them (but very few) recovered Pella before Perseus himself, because they rode a direct and ready way. The King was much troubled and vexed until midnight almost, what with fear and what with difficulty to find out the way. When he was come to Pella, Ennius the Governor thereof, and the Kings pages, were ready attendant at the court to wait upon him and do him service: but contrary wise, of all those friends who escaped safe out of the battail and chanced by variable adventures to come into Pella, there would not one come at him, notwithstanding they were oftentimes met for. Three only bare him company in that flight of his, to wit, Egydus of Cretes, Nabu-C a Bardian, and Archidamus the Æolian. Fearing therefore lest they who refused to come unto him, would soon after enterprise some greater matter against him: with those three he fled still forward, about the fourth watch of the night. After him there followed upon 500 Cretesians.
 Toward Amphipolis the went: but he departed in the night from Pella, making all the haste he could to pass over the river Axius before day-light, supposing that the Romans would give over the chase there, by reason of the difficult and dangerous roads.
 The Consul being returned into the camp with victory, (because he should not have the fruition of sincere and perfect joy) was greatly disquieted and troubled about his younger son, and that was P. Scipio, situated also afterwards Africanus, because he raised the City of Carthage the maternal son he was of the Consul Paulus, and the adopted nephew or grand-child of Africanus: he D was at that time 17 years of age, and (which augmented the sorrow of the father) while he followed in chase the enemies upon the spur, was carried by the press a contrary way, in such sort as it was late ere he returned: and then the Consul having recovered him again safe and sound, felt the joy as of great a victory, and not before.
 When the fruit and news of this battail was arrived at Amphipolis, and that the dames and wives of the City ran flocking into the Temple of Diana, whom they call Tauropolos, to beseech and call for her aid, Dionisius the chief Governor of the City, fearing the Thracians (who were soon in garison) lest in that tumult and garboil they would spoil and rish the City: craftily suborned a fellow on far purpose in guise and shew of a letter-carrier, and received from him letters in the midst of the market place: wherein it was written, That the Roman fleet was arrived in Enna-B chus, and that the territories all about were pitifully wasted by them; and therefore the rulers and captains of Enna-chus requested him to send a garison to succour them against these foragers. When he had read these counterfeit letters, he exhorted the Thracians to undertake this expedition and to go into Enna-chus fast to guard the coasts thereof: giving them to understand, that considering the Romans were loosely stragling and scattered about the fields and villages, they might make a foul harvest and slaughter of them, and besides raise and bring away with them a great booty with-all, he urged not to flatter as much as he could, the same of the forsaide unhappy field fought, saying, This ill had been ere there would have been messengers coming thick one after another upon their flight to bring fresh tidings still hereof. Under this pretence he sent away the Thraci-ans: and so soon as he saw they were passed over the river Strymon, incontinently he shut the P gates. The third day after the battail fought, came Perseus to Amphipolis, and from thence he sent Q. Fabius with an herald of peace. Mean-while Hippias, Midon, and Pantaneus the Kings principal friends, went themselves to the Consul, and surrendered unto the Romans Berthea, whither they had retired and fled immediately out of the field. Other Cities also stricken with fear one after another, prepared to do the like.
 The Consul, after he had sent to Rome with tidings and letters of his victory, Q. Fabius his own son together with L. Lentulus and Q. Metellus, gave the spoil of the enemies army thus lying defeated, unto his footmen: but the horsemen he allowed the booty of all the territory round about, with condition, that they should not be absent from the camp more than two nights. Then he removed nearer unto the sea, and lodged about Pella. First Berthea (as is before said) yielded, then ● Thessalonica and Pellae and consequently all Macedony well-near within two daies was surrendered.
 But the Pydneans who were next unto him, as yet were behind with sending their Embassadors:
 the reason was, for that the confused confidence rather of many nations, and the disordered multitude of those that fled out of the field, and were all met there together, hindered the counsel and consent of the whole City: so as the gates were not only shut but also mured up. Now were Mi-da and Q. Fabius but no part under the walls with Salon, who lay there with a garison: by whose means the whole troop and multitude of armed men was sent away, the City rendered up and the pillage given to the soldiers.

Perseus,

And whose only hope was in the aid of the Bithynians whom he had raised and collected; and for which purpose he had sent his Embassadors (although in vain) held a publick assembly, and bringing his son Philip with him, came forth before the people to the end that he might by some exhortation confirm and strengthen the hearts as well of the Amphipolitians as the companies of foot and horse, who either at all times continually had followed him, or were retired thither by sight for refuge. But ever as he was about to make a speech unto the audience (which he on began to do) he could not proceed for tears. Now for that himself was not able to speak, he came down from the pulpit, and imparted unto Evander the Cretensian those points, which his will was to be delivered and proposed unto the congregation there assembled. The multitude, as they lamented and wept again to see the King so preciously shed tears, so they regarded not the speech of Evander's day, some of them were so bold as to cry out aloud from the midst of the assembly, Away away, and get ye gone from hence that the final remnant of us here perish not for your sake. The stout resolution of these men stopped Evander's mouth, that he could not say a word and reply again. The King by this time was gotten to his lodging, and having conveyed into certain bottoms upon the river Strymon all his money, gold, and silver, went also in person down to the water side. The Thracians durst not go aboard and commit to sea, but stuck every man away to his own home; and so did all the sort of souldiers besides. The Cretensians only for greedy hope of gain accompanied the King, who became in sharing & dealing money among them; he should incur more offence than win thanks laid out fifty talents among them upon the river side to ramble for. When they had made quick riddance and a clean hand with it, they went aboard in a great hurry so as one barge overcharged with a multitude of passengers was cast away and sunk in the mouth of the river. That very day they arrived at Galipoli, and the morrow after at Samothracia, the very place that they intended; and thither (by report) were conveyed 2000 talents. Perseus after he had sent presidents to govern every City surrendered, to the end that no injury should be offered in this new peace to the conquered; and despatching with him still the Kings heralds and Orators, not knowing any thing of the Kings flight and departure, sent P. Nasica to Amphipolis with a mean regiment of foot and horse, to ruinat and destroy at once Strima, and also to empeach all the designments and enterprises of the Romans. In this time Melitas was forced and ransacked by Cn. Octavius; but at Aginium (to the siege whereof Cn. Amicius the Lieutenant was sent) 200 men were lost by a fallly made out of the town; for that the Aginians heard not the news of the late defeat. The Consul departed from Pydna with his whole army, and the morrow after came before Pella. Where having encamped within a mile of the City, he made abode there for certain daies to view on all sides the situation of the City, which he perceived and marked full well, to have been chosen not without good cause, for the imperial fear of the Macedonian Kings. Situate it is upon a hill that lieth to the South west, enclosed round with meane so deep as they cannot possibly be waded and passed through; and these marshes are bred and fed both winter and summer by waters overflowing out of certain lakes. Within the very marsh next unto the City side, there standeth a strong Tower by it self, bearing up above the rest, as it were an Island raised upon a terrace made with exceeding labor of mans hand, which terrace both fust smeth a wall, and is not hurt with the moisture of the marsh round about it; and a far off seemeth close joined to the City wall. Now being divided it is by a river between it and the wall, and yet united to the City by a bridge over its founts, whosoever assaileth the same without, can have no access any way to it, neither, if the King be disposed to shut and enclose any man within, can he possibly make an escape and get forth but over the said bridge; which a few men may keep and guard with ease. In this place the Kings treasure used to lie, but at that time there was no more found but the 300 talents which were sent to King Gentius first, and afterward staid and detained. During the time that the Consul remained about Pella in his standing camp many embassages had audience given them, who repaired thither out of Thessaly especially to congratulate with him, testifying their own joy and wishing his. But the Consul after that he had intelligence that Perseus had crossed over to Samothracia, departed from Pella, and at the fourth gift and journey that he made came to Amphipolis. The whole multitude went forth of the City in great numbers to meet him, which gave testimony to every man, that neither a good nor just King.

The five and fortieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the five and fortieth Book.

Perseus was taken prisoner by Emilius Paulus in Samothracia when Antiochus King of Syria besieged Ptolomæus and Cleopatra, King and Queen of Egypt. Embassadors were sent from the Senate of Rome, willing Antiochus to give over, and beseege no more an assailable King unto them: but

A when he made answer to this their message delivered, that he would consider better what he had to do, Popilius one of the said Embassadors with his rod that he had in his hand drew a circle about the King, and charged him to give him another answer before he went out of that circle: by which rude, rough, and blunt behavior, he forced Antiochus to lay away arms and cease war. Divers Embassies of States and Kings came with congratulation, and were admitted into the Senat. As for that of the Rhodians, because in the late war they stood out and took part against the Romans, it was excluded. The morrow after, when it was debated in counsel about making war upon the Rhodians, the Embassadors pleaded the cause of their country in the Senat: So, they neither had a friendly dispatch and farewell, as allied associates, nor yet were sent away as professed enemies. Macedony was now reduced into the form of a Province. Emilius Paulus triumphed, notwithstanding the contradiction of his own soldiers, discontented for that they were pinched & cut short in the pillage. & although Ser. Sulpitius Galba interposed himself & gainsaid it. He led before his chariot Perseus with his three sons. And that the joy of this triumph of his should not be entire and accomplished, he missed faultily it was with the death of his two sons: the one died before, the other after the triumph of the father. The Censors took a review of the City, in which were assessed and enrolled in their subsidy books 312805 citizens. Prusias King of Bithynia repaired to Rome, to rejoyce with the Senat in their behalf for the victory and conquest of Macedony, where he commended unto the Senat his son Nicomedes. This base minded King, made all of slavery, named himself the enfranchised vassal of the people of Rome.

The five and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

Quintus Fabius, L. Lentulus, and Q. Metellus, the messengers of the late victory, albeit they made all the hast that possibly they could, and came speedily to Rome, yet found the joy thereof to have prevented them: for the fourth day after the battail fought with the King, even as the playes and games were exhibited in the shew-place, there was heard suddenly at first, a confused humming noise, which spred over all the companies of the spectators. That a field was fought in Macedony and Perseus vanquished: afterwards arose a more cleer and evident voice, which grew at length to an open shout and clapping of hands, as if certain news had been brought of the said victory. The magistrats wondered hereat, and made search after the author of this so suddain gladness, but none would be found: and then verily it passed away as the momentary joy of some vain and uncertain occurrence: howbeit a joyfull presage of some good luck settled in mens hearts and remained behind. But after that this was confirmed by the true report and relation of Fabius, Lentulus, and Metellus, which they made at their coming, all men rejoyced as well at the fore-giving of their minds, as for the victory itself. This joyous conceit of this assembly in the shew-place, is reported otherwise, and carrieth with it no less probability and likelihood of truth, in this manner: Upon the 22. of September (which was the second day of the solemnity of Romans games) as the Consul was going up to the lifts for to set out the running of the chariots, a post, by report, (who said he was come out of Macedony) presented letters unto him decked with lawrel. The Consul then, so soon as he had set on foot the race, presently mounted up into his own chariot: and as he rode through the shew-place toward the common scaffolds, he shewed unto the people the said laureat letters: which being once seen, the people presently (forgetting all their sports and fights) ran out into the mids of the cirque & thither the Cos. assembled the Senat, unto whom when he had read the letters, by the advice and allowance of the LL. even before the publick stages and scaffolds, he published the contents thereof to all the people in this manner: That L. Emilius his colleague had fought a set field with K. Perseus. That the army of the Macedonians was discomfited and put to flight. That the King himself was fled with some few of his train, and that all the Cities of Macedony were subdued and brought under the subjection of the people of Rome. These tidings were no sooner heard, but there arose a shout with exceeding great applause, in so much as many men there, left the sight of these dispatchs, and carried these joyfull news home to their wives and children. This was the thirteenth day after the battail given in Macedony. The morrow after the Senat assembled in Curia (Hostilia) and ordained it was that publick processions should be solemnized: an Act also passed, that the Consul Emilius should dismiss all those that had taken the military oath, excepting only these soldiers and mariners: and as for the discharging of those soldiers, agreed it was that it should be moved in the Council-chamber, when the Lieutenants were arrived and come from L. Emilius the Consul for they had dispatched a courier with letters before them. Now these messengers aforesaid entered the City the 25th of September about the second hour of the day, and drew after them a mighty train of those who encountering them upon the way wheresoever they went, accompanied them to Rome, and so directly went to the market-place and tribunal seat. In fortune that the Senators sat then in the ordinary Curia or Council-house, and thither the Consul brought the Embassadors. Where they were received and held so long only as they might declare these points. How great the Kings forces were, as well in foot as horse: how many thousand were slain, how many taken prisoners: what small loss of Roman soldiers that great defeat of enemies cost: how few they were in number that the King drew with him: that it was supposed he would pass into Samothracia: that the fleet was in readiness to make way after him in chase: and that it was not possible for him to escape either by Land or Sea. And then anon they were brought forth before the general Assembly of the people, where they

they made relation of the same. And then the joy was renewed upon proclamation made by the Consul, That all the sacred temples and churches should be let open: and that every man should depart out of the assembly to render thanks unto the Gods: in such sort, that all the temples of the Gods throughout the whole City were replenished with mighty multitudes and congregations not of men only, but also of women. Then the Senat met again in the ordinary Curia: and ordained that publick processions and thanks should be made for five daies together in all Churches and Chappels and at every Altar for the happy and fortunat success of L. Aemilius, and that greater head of beasts should be killed for sacrifice. Also that the ships which were ready rigged and well appointed in the river Tyberis for to be sent into Macedony, (in case it had so fallen out, that the King had been able to have resisted) should be retired and drawn to land, and so laid up drie in their docks and arsenals: also that the mariners should be called, after the receipt of a whole years pay, and together with all those who had sworn to serve the Consul, should have their conge and passport to be gone. Item, that all the souldiers in Corcyra, Brundisium, about the Adriatick sea, or in the territory of the Larinats (for in all these there was an army set in readines, wherewith C. Licinius if need required should have succoured his colleague) should have their discharge. Also processions were published in the full assembly of the people, to begin * from the tenth day of October, and so to hold on five daies after.

Out of Illyricum also two Lieutenants or messengers, to wit, L. Licinius Neron and P. Delius, brought word that the army of the Illyrians was defeated: that King Gentius was taken prisoner, & that all Illyricum was reduced under the obedience of the people of Rome. For which exploits achieved by the leading and conduct of L. Anicius the Pretor the Senat decreed a solemn procession to be holden for three daies, like as also the Latine feast & holy-daies were proclaimed by the Consul, for to be holden the * ninth, tenth, and eleventh daies of November. Some have recorded that the Rhodian Embassadors had not yet their dispatch, nor were sent away, but after the news of this victory were called into the Senat in mockery and scorn of that sortish insolence and pride of their own. And then Agepolis the principal person of them spake in this manner, "That the Rhodians had sent them in deed as Embassadors to treat about an accord & to make peace between the Romans and King Perseus, for that this war as it was grievous and prejudicial to all Greece, so it could not chuse but be chargeable and hurtful to the Romans themselves. But fallen out it is passing well through the goodness of fortune, that the war is ended otherwise: and hath given them so good an occasion and opportunity, to rejoyce and testify their joy in the behalf of the Romans for the achievement of so brave and notable a victory. Thus much spake the Rhodian. And then the Senat made answer again, "That the Rhodians had sent that embassy not regarding the good and profit of Greece, nor yet for any care they had of the expenses defraied by the Romans but only in love and favor of King Perseus. For if they had been respective unto them (as they would make semblance and have the world to think) they should have addressed their Embassadors when as Perseus invaded Thessaly with an army, & for two years space persecuted and plagued the cities of Greece, besieging some, & frighting others with menaces of war: yet all that while, not a word with the Rhodians as touching peace. But after that they heard once that the Romans were mounted over the streights and passed through into Macedony: that King Perseus was shut up and enclosed sure enough for starting any way, then and not before, they could send an embassy for no other reason in the world but to rid and deliver Perseus out of that imminent danger which threatened him to neer hand. With which answer the Embassy were sent away.

About the very same time M. Marcellus being departed out of his government in the province of Spain, after he had forced and won Marcolica a renowned and famous City in those parts, brought home with him and bestowed in the publick treasury ten pound weight of gold, and about a million of sesterces in silver coin.

Perseus Aemilius the Consul lying encamped (as is aforesaid) neer Syræ in the Odontandian territory, when he saw the letters from King Perseus brought unto him by three Embassadors of base condition, wept (by report) himself, to consider the frailty of this world, and the fickle state of mans life; to see (I say) that he who erewhile could not rest content with the royalty of Macedony, but would needs war upon the Dardanians and Illyrians and levy the aid of the Bastarnians, was now after the loss of his army, as one exiled out of his own Kingdom, driven into a small land, where, like a poor suppliant he remained in surety, not by means of his own forces, but through the religious protection of a sanctuary & privileged place. But when he read the superscription of the letter with this stile, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus, greeting, he could no more pry him for thinking of his blockish folly, in that he had no sense and feeling of the calamity and misery wherein he stood. And therefore albeit the contents of the letter otherwise were prayers to demits and abject as little favoured of a princely mind, yet was that embassy dismissed without answer and without letters. Perseus soon perceived what aile it was that he must lay down and forget now that he was vanquished: wherupon he addressed other letters in quality of a privat person without any other addition at all: and by those as he craved, so obtained he likewise, that certain agents should be sent unto him, with whom he might parley and commune as touching the state and condition of his present fortune. So three delegate Embassadors were sent unto him, namely, P. Lentulus, A. Posthumus, Alpinus and A. Antonius. But nothing was effected in this agency of Embassy: whiles Perseus stuck hard and laboured all he could to hold still and keep the roial name of King, and Paulus endeavoured contrary-wile, that he should submit himself and all that he had to

A to the protection and clemency of the people of Rome. During these debates and affaires between them, the fleet of Cn. Octavius was arrived at Samothrace, who also presenting before their eyes fearfull objects of terror, went about to force him as well by threats and menaces, as to win him by hope of fair intresty and good usage to yeeld and submit; and herein he found some help by means of an occurrent, either hapning by chance and meer adventure, or contrived by mans device of set purpose. L. Atilius a noble yong Gentleman, perceiving that the people of the Samothracians were met in a general assembly, requested of the Magistrats that he might be permitted to make a short speech unto the people. Good leave he had, and then he began in this wise; "My masters and friends of Samothracia, I would gladly know, whether it be a false fable or a true tale which we have heard, That this is a sacred Iland, and the soil thereof holy and altogether inviolable? When they all accorded in one consent, that the Iland was as holy and sacred as it was reported: How is it then (qd. he) that a murderher hath violated and polluted it with the blood of King Eumenes? And considering that in all preambles and prefaces of sacred and divine service premied, they are commanded precisely to avante from the ministry thereof, who have not pure and innocent hands; will you suffer in deed your most secret sanctuaries and devout tabernacles to be stained with the bloody body of a thief and fellow? Now was it a ripe report and common bruit in every City of Greece, That K. Eumenes had like to have been mured at Delphos by Evander. The Samothracians, besides that they saw their whole Iland and the said Temple to be in the power and puissance of the Romans, took these reproofs and reproaches to touch them neer, and not without just cause: whereupon they sent Theondas, the soveraign magistrate (whom they call their K.) unto King Persus, giving him to understand, "That Evander the Cretenian was charged with murder: also that by custom and tradition from their ancestors, they had full power and authority to proceed by order of law, against all those that were presented and endited for entering within the liberties and sacred precincts of the Temple, with unclean and unpure hands. Now if Evander stand upon his innocency, and knoweth himself cleer and unguilty of the capital crime laid to his charge, let him come to his answer and plead his cause for his own defence, and he shall be heard: but if he dare not hazard the judicial trial of the issue, retire he and depart, that he pollute not the temple; let him shift for himself and escape away. Persus called forth Evander unto him, willing him in no case to try the process of justices: for neither would his cause justify him, nor any favour bear him out. He much feared wishal, lest being cast and condemned, he would bewray Persus himself and appeach him for the setter and author of that so horrible a fact: and no way then but one, even with patience and resolution to take his death. Evander gain-said nought in outward appearance, but pretending in words, that he had rather dye by a cup of poison than upon the sword's point, sought secret means to flie and be gone. The King upon advertisement hereof, fearing lest the Samothracians would discharge their anger upon him, as if he had wrought his evasion to avoid due punishment, commanded Evander to be made away and killed. After which murder committed thus rashly without a advisement, he be thought himself, & considered, that he should be touched deeply with the same spot of guilt that Evander was noted with: namely, that as Eumenes was by Evander wounded at Delphos, so Evander by him was murdered in Samothracia; and so the two most holy and religious temples in the world were stained and polluted with mans blood; and who but he the cause and contriver thereof? But the blame of this foul fact of his, was by the corruption of Theondas quite averted another way; and he for a sum of money bare the people in hand, that Evander was his own hangman. But Persus by this lewd and detestable act, committed upon the person of the only friend whom he had alive, (so well approved and tried by him in so many adventures, and now betraied for his labour by him, unto whom he refused to be a traitor) estranged clean the hearts and affections of all men from him: so as now every man ranged with the Romans. Thus abandoned as he was and left to himself, they forced him to cast about and devise how to escape and be gone. Whereupon he called unto him Oraander the Cretenian, a man that knew well the coasts of Thrace, (because he had negotiated and traded in those parts;) and with him he dealt to embark him in some small foist, and so to conduct him into Cosys. Now there was a certain bay under a promontory of Thrace, where in a pinnace stood in readines: thither, after sun-setting were all things brought for necessary use; and money withal, as much as closely could be conveyed. The King himself at midnight accompanied with three persons (for no more were privy to this his flight) went out at a postern or back dore of the house, into a garden neer his bed-chamber, and so with much ado having clambred over a mud wall, passed to the water side. Now was Oraander already loosed from the foresaid creek, for so soon as the money was once brought thither into the vessel, he latched into the deep and set his course for Candy. Persus, after that the bark was not to be found in the bay, walked and wandered a good while along the strand: and fearing at last the day-light approaching (yet not so hardy as to adventure back again to his lodging) lurked behind in one side of the temple close unto a blind corner and nook thereof. Among the Macedonians they called those the Kings pages who were the Printes and noble mens sons, chosen to serve and wait upon the person of the King. That company yet followed after the K. in his flight, and as hard as the world went, departed not from him until such time as by the commandment of Cn. Octavius, the publick cryer pronounced with a loud voice, That the Kings pages and all other Macedonians besides in Samothracia, if they would turn to the Romans, should enjoy with safety of life their estate entire, their liberty free, and all that ever they either had about them, or was left in Macedony. At which proclamation once published, they all immediatly revolted to the Romans, and entred their names with C. P. R. M. Humius, a martial colonel. Likewise Ian of Thessalonica, delivered into the hands of Octavius the yong infants of the King, and not one of them all was left with Perseus, but Philip his eldest son: and then he yeilded both himself and that son into the hands of Octavius, crying out upon fortune, and blaming the Gods in whose Temple they were, for that he received no aid and succour from them, notwithstanding he humbly craved and besought the same. Then commandment was given, that he should be embarked in the admirals ship: and thither also was brought aboard all the mobey that remained, and then forthwith the fleet retired to Amphipolis: from whence Octavius sent the King to the camp unto the consul, but first he had dispatched his letters to give him knowledge, that he was sure enough under his hand, and that he was at the point to be brought unto him. Panius, reputing this for a second victory, (as it was no less indeed to be esteemed) presently upon the receipt of the message, killed beatts for sacrifice: and when he had called his counsell about him, and read the letters of the Pretor before them, he sent Q. Aelius Tubero to meet the K. upon the way, and commanded the rest in good frequency to remain in his capital pavillion, and give attendance upon him. Never was there seen before, so great a multitude to run out for to see any solemn fight or pageant. In their fathers daies King Syphax was taken prisoner and brought into the Roman camp: who besides that there was no comparison between him and Perseus, either in regard of his own name or the renown of his nation, was then also but an accessory as it were to the Punick war, like as Geminus now to the Macedonian. Perseus was the very head of this war, neither was it the fame of his father and grandsire only (whom he neerly touched in birth and blood) that made him renowned, but the resplendent glory of Philip and Alexander the Great, who brought the sovereign empire and monarchy of the whole world to the Macedonian nation. Well, Perseus entred the camp arrayed in a black cloak, without any one of his own train to accompany him, who partaking his misery, might cause more compassion to be had of him. The affluence of the people was so great who went out to see him, that for the very pefe he could not march forward, untill such time as the consul sent his sergeants and hushers to void the thronging of the multitude, and make way for him to go to the consul his pavillion. The consul arose, and (giving commandment to the rest for to sit still) advanced forward a litle, and raught out his hand to the King as he entred into the pavillion: and when he bowed and debased himself to his very feet, he took him up again and would not suffer him once to touch his knees, but led him into the tent and caused him to sit down right over-against those whom he called thither to counsell. The first question that he demanded of him was this: "What wrong he had sustained at the hands of the people of Rome, that he should be constrained to enterprife and begin the war against them with so malicious a mind as he did, and so to hazard himself his whole state and Kingdom, in such extremity of danger? And when every man attended what answer he would make, he staid a good while without utterance of one word, casting his eyes wistly upon the ground, and shedding tears withal. "Then spake the consul again: If you had been but yong (qd. he) when you came to the crown, I would verily for my part marvel the less, that you should be so ignorant as not to know how important it was, to have the people of Rome either for a friend or an enemy: but now, since you both had your hand in that war which your father waged against us, and also could not chuse but remember the peace afterwards made with him, and which we observed most faithfully, What policy was it for you to entertain war rather than peace, with them, whose force you had tried in war and whose fidelity you had found in peace? When as he would yet make no answer at all either to question or accusation, the consul went on and said: "Well, howsoever these things are thus saln out and come to pass, be it through the error and frailty of man by adventure of fortune and hard hap, or fatal necessity of the destinies, be of good chear yet, and take a mans heart unto you: the gracious clemency and mercy of the people of Rome, well known and proved in the misfortunes of many Princes and States, afford unto you not only hope, but certain assurance of safety. Thus much spake he to Perseus in the Greek tongue: then, turning to his own assistants and company about him, he directed his speech to them in Latine as followeth. "A notable example and rare mixtoure you see (qd. he) of the changeable variety of this world: to you I speak especially, my masters here that are fresh and youthful gallants in the heat of your yong blood. And therefore let no man in time of his prosperity, carry himself proud and violent against another, nor yet confidently to trust upon the present state wherein he is, for who knoweth what may hap once yet before midnight? But him alone will I hold for a man of valour indeed, whose heart neither the gentle gale of this fawning and flattering world is able to lift aloft, nor yet the blustering blasts of frowning fortune cast down or dash upon the rocks. After the consul was risen and departed, he committed the charge and custody of keeping the King to Quintus Aelius. But for that day Perseus was not only invited courteously to sup with the consul, but respected also in all kind of honor, as possibly might be done unto him in that state and condition of his.

After this the army was divided here and there into garrisons for the winter time. The greatest part thereof was received into Amphipolis, and the other cities neer adjoining entertained the rest. This was the end of the war between Perseus and the Romans, which had endured four years one after another continually: and here an end withal of the most flourishing Kingdom of the greatest part of Europe and of all Asia. Perseus was counted the twentieth King after Caranus, who was the first that reigned there. This Perseus began his reign that year wherein Q. Fulvius and
